I make here two remarks: First, as regards myself, it is not to any formulas drawn up by men, that I give an absolute assent, but to the vital doctrines of the oracles of God, which those formulas express. Next, with respect to parties who reject them, I pronounce no judgment, and, in the absence of a well-known profession, I remit that judgment to the personal responsibility of each. We have no inquisition. But at the same time, I affirm that the Alliance cannot receive amongst its members (I say not amongst its auditors) all those who call themselves Christians. This may be proved by three arguments, adapted, we think, to carry conviction to every intelligent and upright mind, and which have had that effect. First, the assemblies of the Alliance are essentially gatherings of concord, peace, and fraternal unity. Now, we are aware of all the different opinions which are to be found in Christendom, especially in these times. Read certain journals, certain publications, and you will see the name of Christian claimed by Deists and Pantheists, of whom some even are (officially) ministers. We know the dangers to which we are liable from the clash of such conflicting opinions. To do what is thus asked of us would be to open the caverns of Eolus, and to unchain the winds, which would soon cause our vessel to perish. The Alliance has done well, both for fidelity and for peace, to raise as its standard the fundamental and vital doctrines of the religion of Jesus Christ. Justice obliges me to add, and I do so with pleasure, that persons of contrary views to our own, but who have sentiments of order and equity, recognise generally that these truths ought to be the soul of our Conferences, and that nothing should be said there with a contrary signification. Such is our first answer—now for the second.

Suppose this first consideration could be put aside, would it be possible for the Alliance to do what is demanded? This question is not difficult to answer in Switzerland, for, if we reflect upon it, it is analogous to this: Could the canton of Geneva, without consulting the other cantons of Switzerland, change the federal pact? Now, to consult the other cantons—that is, the different branches of the Alliance, would be not only perfectly useless, but physically impossible. The Alliance is a confederation dispersed, not between the Alps and the Jura, but throughout Europe, Asia, America, Africa, and Australia; how could the demand, then, be made in time to receive the answers? And should the brethren coming from different countries, with the confidence that the constitution which unites us will preside over all our acts, discover, on their arrival, that we have, in petto, changed the fundamental pact, what would they do? Contravened in their holiest convictions, irritated that we should have violated our engagements, they would probably either turn their backs upon us, or fill our ears with their just and loud complaints. The moral impossibility of our doing what some thus ask of us is such, that it has been publicly recognised by a distinguished writer, who is not of the Alliance, but belongs to a class of men of more understanding and juster views than those who make the demand.

Our third answer is that even if the Alliance could have been consulted on the transformation of its fundamental conditions, we should not have asked for the change. The truths it professes are, in our eyes, the holiest and most sublime revelations of the Scriptures—the very essence and soul of faith—the power of God unto salvation. The Christians of the earliest ages and those of the 16th century laid down their lives with joy rather than abandon these wholesome doctrines; and shall we sacrifice them to avoid a few words of blame, or a slight expression of contempt? "Whosoever confesseth not me before men, him will I not confess before my Father," saith the Lord, and this saying is enough.

Dr. Merle d'Aubigné then referred to the œcumenical character of the approaching Conference, and expressed his conviction that it should be kept free of all local controversies. He nevertheless hoped that it would bear fruit for Geneva, and, referring to the majority of Roman Catholic inhabitants in the State, trusted that the hearts and hands of the Evangelical community would be strengthened by this visit of their brethren from without, who would pray for their Jerusalem. He then dwelt upon his warm and intense interest in Geneva, and gave utterance to his conviction that, in the crisis through which she was now passing, three things were needful for her: First, the grand and living Christianity which was proclaimed by the Apostles and the Reformers, and which works in man a moral change; secondly, the union of all who now at Geneva profess differing opinions—their concord and unity on the basis of this true and living Christianity; and thirdly, the union of the Christians of Geneva with the Evangelical Christians of all the churches, and of the whole country, by means of this true Christianity. It is an error, said Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, to suppose that a Nonconforming Evangelical Christian must, on that account, be opposed to the Church which, in Geneva, includes the majority of our Protestant fellow-citizens. I am not in accord with many of its ministers on the most essential doctrines—I know it, but I bear witness to their zeal; I recognise in the ensemble of the institution a sensible amelioration, and I pray God to bless all the souls which that Church contains, without exception.

The President then expressed his hope that all in Geneva who loved Jesus Christ would extend the hand of brotherly affection towards all who confessed Him, and that, at the approaching Conference, there would be practical union between the National Church of Geneva, and the members of other communions. And why, he continued, should not even those who, amongst our Protestant population, do not share the convictions of the Alliance, witness its meeting with pleasure? . . . Let us be just to those who do not partake our sentiments; let us say to them with all sincerity: You are free, so far as men are concerned, to hold your own convictions, and could we constrain you, we would not. Your conscience is accountable to God alone—it is to His Word only that you are under obligation to submit. Unquestionably we should rejoice to see you possessed of those treasures which, as we know from experience, give unspeakable peace, but we content ourselves by exclaiming, with the prophet, "Draw them, O God, with the bonds of love, and with the bands of a man."

ITALY.

THE ITALIAN PREMIER AND THE PROTESTANT CHAPEL AT LEGHORN.*

(From a Correspondent.)

The Cromwell of Tuscany (Baron Ricasoli) has now been called to the helm of the Italian Government. Ricasoli's appointment is fraught with most important consequences to the Evangelical movement. If he is not in heart a Protestant, he is at least a few steps in advance of his eminent predecessor in enlightened and liberal sympathy with Protestantism, which he studied carefully during repeated visits to England. Cavour, I know from the best authority, only tolerated Protestantism for the sake of consistency, because he acknowledged it a logical result of civil liberty; but he, at the same time, regarded the Papacy as the only remaining glory of old Italy. Ricasoli is resolved to see religious liberty not only guaranteed in the Constitution, but practically exercised in the country. With this view he shielded the Evangelicals of Florence, while he held the reins as Governor-General of Tuscany. The first act of his Italian premiership has been to put an end to a very annoying disturbance in Leghorn, by the opening of the Evangelical Waldensian Church there. Only last week he remarked to a friend in Turin, that this vexatious question burned him at the heart, and that he was ashamed of the action of the officials of his country in the case. And well he might be, for it was immediately after he resigned his governorship in Florence that the priests obtained an interdict against the opening of the new church, which interdict has this week been removed by an order to Dr. Revel at once to have the church opened—instructions having been sent to the authorities at the same time, to afford every assistance and protection. The order was not sent, like former ones, from head-quarters directly to the authorities, for they actually refuse to transmit it to the parties concerned, and leave the case in statu quo. This result is the first great victory in the struggle for religious liberty, and will form a valuable precedent. Taken in connexion with the recent circular, which threw open the cemeteries of Italy to Catholic and Protestant dead alike, and the recent acquittal by the Genoa tribunal of four Evangelicals as guilty of no misdemeanour for having spoken against the religion of the State, it affords gratifying proof that the tide of healthy and enlightened legislation is flowing strong. You cannot imagine what a stir has been made in Leghorn in connexion with this case. It has been overruled for an extensive circulation of Protestant literature, and the establishment of a strong Evangelical Church. The work began through the labours of a Waldensian evangelist in a private house, about eighteen months ago. Small and inoffensive as the meeting was, it was summarily put down. The man in whose house the meeting was held lost thereby a good situation, and his wife, an excellent and well-employed modiste, lost all her customers in a single day. This first persecution of the infant Church, harsh as it then appeared, was nothing to what has since taken place. Driven from a private house, a large hall, capable of containing 150 persons, was with great difficulty found, and rented from a liberal proprietor, who, though tempted and threatened in every way, has fortunately continued for a whole year to renew the lease to the Evangelicals. This place of worship has been constantly crowded. As the agitation has increased, so has the attendance. Hundreds have, night after night, been unable to obtain admission, while not an inch of standing room inside remained unoccupied. The minister has, however, been subjected to every species of annoyance. The most serious was a tolerably successful attempt at disturbance. Strange to say, several liberal men of note were parties to it, either by their presence, or by the participation of a number of their workmen. This will hardly be believed, and needs explanation. The free city of Leghorn, which, since the time of the Medici, has enjoyed special privileges, was the last spot in Italy on which we could have expected such a drama to be enacted. Within its walls are Jewish synagogues, Greek and Turkish places of worship, English and Scotch churches—in fact, every religious rite is celebrated without let or hindrance. I have heard it jocularly remarked, that Leghorn has more cemeteries belonging to different religious denominations than any other city in the world. But the secret of all this dispeace lies in the fact, that three years ago the Society of St. Vincent de Paul established itself strongly here, in order to check the nascent Protestantism of Tuscany. The members of this Jesuit order have wrought successfully among the middle classes of the community, and several cafés and druggists' shops are said to serve as rendezvous for consultation and united action. The Leghorn authorities, influenced by the representations of these enemies of liberty, at one time exiled both Mr. Ribet and his most valuable church-member, for ten days, on twenty-four hours' notice, hoping thus to put down the movement. They also called before them all the known adherents of the cause, and, by menaces and coaxing, so wrought upon weak nerves, as greatly to diminish the attendance for a few weeks. At this juncture a piece of ground in a central locality was purchased, and the shed already erected on it was walled in, so as to form a comfortable church for 400 persons. A large schoolroom was also built beside the church. This was felt to be the only outlet from the difficulty: until the congregation obtained a house of their own, and legal sanction to worship therein, the violent opposition would continue. The thousand obstacles placed in the way of hiring a suitable hall for Evangelical service in Leghorn, Pisa, and Florence, rendered it necessary to purchase in Leghorn, as well as in Florence, where the large Salviati Palace had been secured for the Vaudois, at a cost of 4,000*l*.

While negotiations were going forward with the Government for a formal recognition of the new Church, Baron Ricasoli resigned his high office in Tuscany to take part in the deliberations of the Turin Parliament. The interdict was at once served by the bigoted Governor of Leghorn (M. Biscossi)—who is both a Piedmontese and a cousin of Cavour—prohibiting the opening of the church, on the frivolous pretext that it was too near the Roman Catholic church of San Pietro e San Paolo. As the crow flies, it certainly was not distant more than a hundred yards, but, between the doors of the two churches, the distance was five hundred yards. I do not believe that such a prohibitory law exists in the statute-book of Tuscany. If it does, Leghorn claims exemption as a free port.

But apart from any such law, there was no ground on the merits of the case for an interdict, which only displayed the hostility of the foe. Ricasoli's intervention was not attended to, as he had retired from office. Cavour was applied to repeatedly; and twice, at his suggestion, did Minghetti forward the permission. Instead of carrying out the Turin order, the Tuscan employés applied to the Vaudois to know if they would not remove Ribet from Leghorn to some other place, for the sake of peace. As this sinister wish could not be complied with, a process was began against Ribet, before the Lucca tribunal, for having spoken against the religion of the State. The process was a mere cover, and will now be allowed to fall to the ground. The deputy for Leghorn in Parliament (Mr. Fabbrizzi), to whom Cavour referred the matter, fought hard to get the Vaudois to give up their central position, and accept a shabby tenement outside the walls. When this was not consented to, he had the meanness to present to Parliament, with a few recommendatory words of his own, a petition got up by the priests of Leghorn, praying that no Protestant propagand might be tolerated in the town. For this Fabbrizzi was severely blamed in more than one influential newspaper. The church was opened on Wednesday, 19th June, without any demonstration, and it is to be hoped that the Gospel will have free course, and that God may be glorified. The victory is a most important one; for the Church of Rome and bigoted liberals have put forth all their strength and been worsted. The subject is matter of notoriety in Leghorn, and the townspeople entirely sympathise with Mr. Ribet, whom they know to have truth and justice on his side. But other circumstances have added importance to this case. Seeing that Protestantism was spreading far and wide, and that every effort to check it was fruitless, the priests during the season of Lent inveighed bitterly against what they termed heresy and Lutheran infidelity. Preaching is very unusual in the Roman Catholic Church, and yet every church in Leghorn has resounded for weeks with the most insulting misrepresentations. An eloquent monk was brought from a distance to the cathedral pulpit, and a large sum was paid for his services to his convent, and the expectation that his single arm would destroy the widespread influence of heresy. Mr. Ribet attended at the cathedral and listened to these discourses, and replied each evening in his own church to a crowded and approving auditory. This he continued to do for several months. I had the pleasure of listening to one of his controversial lectures; and a more able, pithy, and effective discussion of a question I never heard in Scotland. The Evangelical sermons of this valiant young minister, who established the church at Courmayeur two years ago, despite the intrigues of the Bishop and the threat of the assassin, are equally powerful and impressive. You can easily imagine the interest excited in Leghorn by these clerical philippics, and the conclusive replies of Mr. Ribet. But the press was set in motion by the priests as well as the pulpit. A series of cheap books (eight have already appeared), written in a popular style, and free of all the exploded arguments of the past, was started. These could not remain unanswered. A letter by a Pisan Evangelical to the Leghorn preachers during Lent, was the beginning of a regular paper war. At least a dozen pamphlets have appeared. The ablest and most popular of all was a letter addressed by Mr. Ribet to the priests of Leghorn. All of these papers circulated largely. Some went through several editions. The last-mentioned has been so popular during the last ten days in Florence, that two new editions, of 2,000 copies each, have been sold in the street, along with that remarkable document, the Colpo di Grazia, of which 25,000 copies have been circulated throughout Tuscany in a few days. Mr. Ribet, in his letter, explains quietly the origin and progress of his work, frees himself of groundless charges, sets himself right with the public, and leaves the whole blame of the popular excitement at the door of the priests. As he has been repeatedly and seriously warned that his life was in danger, he has usually been accompanied home, after each meeting, by a large number of his people, who see him safely housed before leaving. A number of young men—Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Italians—have made a point of escorting him everywhere in the evening, to prevent the execution of silly threats. There was no exaggeration of the dangers, for it was reported, on the best authority—three of the men calling and informing Ribet, in his own house—that sixty men, reckless of all consequences, had banded themselves together to murder him, and cast his dead body into the nearest ditch, should the new church be opened. Now that the Government has interfered, let us hope that these factious proceedings will cease, and that the Evangelical Church, which has been opened in such perilous circumstances, may become a great blessing to Leghorn and its neighbourhood.

GERMANY.

CHRISTIAN CONFERENCES IN PROTESTANT GERMANY: THEIR CHARACTERISTICS—THE FESTIVAL WEEK AT BARMEN AND ELBERFELD—PROGRAMME OF PROCEEDINGS—GENERAL IMPRESSION OF THE WHOLE.

Bonn, August 20, 1861.

One of the most remarkable signs of the present times is the frequency of Christian pastoral conferences. All Germany is dotted over with them during the summer, and, without doubt, the general tendency of them is towards earnestness and Evangelical religion. Sometimes the colouring is deeply theological, sometimes tinged with High Lutheranism, sometimes more pastoral and practical; but never, as far as I can learn, is it rationalistic. I have attended two of these lately, and am able, from personal knowledge, to give you and the English public some account of them.

All these meetings are perfectly free, and arise, like the Exeter Hall and Dublin annual assemblies, out of the uneasy and troubled relations that exist between Church and State. When the union of these bodies is harmonious, the Church will naturally prefer to act ecclesiastically; when the Church is brought more or less into captivity, the indwelling fulness of the body will manifest itself in new and various ways. We see this both in Germany and England. Here the slumber of death was broken by the revolutions of 1848, and in the terrific struggle the bondage that oppressed the masses, and the ligatures that bound the churches, were greatly relaxed; so that in both spheres there is a certain range for free action; and in both it is being used to the utmost. The churches, indeed, are far from being free, and some of them far from desiring or deserving liberty. Yet there has been a marvellous improvement during the last ten years. All is in motion; powers of many kinds are manifesting themselves; old ties are breaking, and new ones being formed; slowly, but steadily, the blood is beginning to flow in the veins of the old, decrepid, and disjointed corporations; and, like an invalid, or a drunken man coming to self-consciousness, their movements are often awkward and erroneous. Should these forces that are now moving in all possible directions ever come, by heavenly pressure, to move harmoniously around the cross of Christ; should the German churches, freed from external impediments, and purged from internal doubts, come in the good Providence of God to the unity of the Holy Ghost—the event would be like the birth of a new world! But there are so many kingdoms, so many constitutions, so many races, so many contradictory interests, that no hand less mighty than God's can blend them into harmonious action. Nevertheless, let us be thankful for the tendencies that are now apparent, and trust to God for the future. Let me touch now the magic lamp of Aladdin, and transport my readers to the banks of the Rhine! It is the land of song and wine. With the exception of two, or at most three, Oriental rivers, it is the most historic stream in the world, and from Varus to Wellington, the greatest battles of Europe have been fought on its banks. Here we are, then, gently sailing down its peaceful waters, and our next resting-place will be the royal city of Dusseldorf. There is an Imperial palace in it, and the surrounding gardens are worth seeing; and at the distance of three miles you have Dusselthal, with its noble establishment for the orphans of Germany. One hour more by train, and we are in the small but fertile valley of the Wupper, where the two towns of Barmen and Elberfeld meet. We shall say nothing of the inhabitants, 50,000 in number, nor of the silk and cloth and ribbon manufactories, which make the city famous and the citizens wealthy. We are rather concerned with the religious condition of the people, and this being their annual "Festival week," we shall be able to see the working of their system to the best advantage. I shall first state the programme of the whole proceedings during the week, and then make some observations on the spirit which animated the whole.

Sunday, August 11th, at two o'clock.—The Annual Festival of the Rhine and Westphalia Young Men's Association.

Monday, 12th, two o'clock.—The Annual Festival of the Berg Bible Society, in the first Reformed Church in Elberfeld, the principal speakers, Pastor Müller and Pastor Friedrich.

Tuesday, 13th, four o'clock.—The Festival of the Evangelical Society. Principal speakers, Pastor Fisch, from Paris, and Pastor Brand, from Mayen. After this there will be a friendly meeting to salute and welcome the guests, in the house of the Evangelical Society.

Wednesday, 14th, Forenoon.—The Annual Festival of the Rhine Missionary Society. Missionary sermon; then address by Dr. Fabri, the Inspector of Missions. Afternoon, a General Missions Conference; addresses from missionaries and the friends of missions.

Thursday, 15th, Forenoon.—General Church Conferences; the theme to be discussed, "How can the Evangelical Church obtain independence in reference to the State without injuring the essential interests of either?" The question to be answered with a special reference to the ecclesiastical reforms; the school and marriage laws; by Ministerialrath Dr. Bähr, from Carlsruhe. A biblical, historical illustration of the relations between Church and State; by Pastor Pfisterer. After this the discussion will be commenced by Director Zahn; Professor Plitt, from Bonn, is to be in the chair.

Friday, 16th, Forenoon.—Open Pastoral Conference in the Church of Unterbarmen: the theme to be "Prayer in the Name of Jesus;" the introductory lecture by Pastor Gess, from Basle. Afternoon, the Annual Festival of the Wupperthal Tract Society; the principal speaker, Pastor Bertelmann; meeting in the evening for tea and free conversation.

Sunday, 18th, Afternoon.—The Annual Festival of the Rhine and Westphalia Pastoral-Aid Society, in the church of Wupperfeld.

Such were the subjects brought before the meetings, and now nothing remains but to give you a few general impressions from the arrangement and conduct of the whole. 1. It was a good sign of the state of religion that, at all times, early or late, the churches were well filled, and often quite crowded; and it is a fact, that in no spot in Germany is the power of religion so strong and pervading as in Elberfeld and its vicinity. This arises partly from their free Presbyterian constitution, but mainly from the mercy of God, in giving a constant supply of faithful pastors from the Reformation till the present time. The Wupper seems in this respect to flow through the happy valley where earthly prosperity and heavenly peace have made their abode. 2. The meetings were all solemn, earnest meetings of brethren in Christ, who, though differing in many things, all recognised their common standing in the one Lord. All had a right to express their opinions freely, and they did so, nor could I discern any spirit of emulation among them. Many of the papers read were in the highest style of German exegesis; but the appeal was always, and only, to the Divine Word. 3. The method of conducting the business was this: Each subject was committed beforehand to a certain man, who took charge of it. He was "The Festredner" (the Feast Speaker), who prepared himself thoroughly on the subject, and read to the meeting the result of his researches. Then followed the free general discussion, after which the first speaker had the right of replying. The questions, of course, were never put to the vote, as the meetings were not ecclesiastical, but free, moral, and for mutual improvement. 4. Of course, it is impossible here to give even the briefest synopsis, either of reports or speeches; all I aim at is the spirit of the festival week, and from being a week among the brethren, I can testify to their prodigious activity. Elberfeld is a burning focus of Christian love, from which light and heat and power, in manifold varieties, go forth over many and even distant provinces of the beloved fatherland. Their Tract Society has popularised Christianity, and created a taste for good books among the people; their Home or Evangelical Mission seeks to carry the warm messages of life and salvation into the dead or sleeping churches of Germany; their heathen missions in Africa and India are as successful as any other from Christendom; and their Bible Society has put the Holy Scriptures within reach of the poorest of the people. Such things show the spirit of a people. 5. You may judge of the interest attached to these annual meetings in Elberfeld, from the fact that brethren from Paris, Basle, Berlin, Hamburg, Switzerland, and Holland, attend them. The little valley of the Wupper becomes, for the time being, the centre of an immense circle, whose influence extends over the world. The guests, missionaries, and strangers are distributed among the inhabitants, whose truly Christian hospitality is beyond all praise. 6. It is a fact worthy of notice that the district in Germany where earnest religion most prevails is the district of most numerous sects! All the orthodox parties in England, with the exception of the Methodists, are found in Elberfeld. In many other regions of fatherland sectarianism is nearly unknown, but in these you may expect to find, as a general rule, the silence and uniformity of the grave. Life—spiritual life—is indeed a great unity, but it seems to be impossible to confine its forth-flowing within artificial channels. It flows from the cross, and around the cross, uniting all hearts to the Crucified, but it glories in diversity of form and freedom of manifestation. Unity in variety is the law of God, both in nature and in grace. Uniformity is but another name for death.

I intended to give you the latest information about the revival in the Orphan House, but as this letter is too long already, I must reserve it for my next communication.

TURKEY.

MEETING OF MISSIONARIES AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

A Constantinople letter gives an account of the annual meeting of the members of the American Mission to Western Turkey. The delegates and missionaries from the various parts of the field were Messrs. Ball, Farnsworth, Leonard, Winchester, Van Lennep, Green and Parsons, and Dodd and Ladd, from Tuzgat, Cæsarea, Marsovan, Sivas, Tocat, Nicomedia, and Smyrna, in Asiatic Turkey; Messrs. Clark, Morse, and Byington, from Philippopoli, Adrianople, and Eski Saghra, in the Bulgarian field; and Mr. Morgan, a delegate from the Southern Mission. As most of the gentlemen were alone at their stations, they brought their families with them; so that never before was there so large a representation from the interior.

The meetings lasted a fortnight, alternating daily between Pera and Haskeuy and Bebek—the only public ones being that for the reading of the reports and the meeting of the Bible Society, both of which were held in Pera in the Dutch chapel.

AINTAB, MARASH, ETC.

At the reading of the reports, some very interesting verbal statements were made by Mr. Morgan in regard to the Southern field—a retrospect of the work from the time when, a few years ago, the first missionary was stoned out of Aintab, down to the present moment. The aggregate of souls now belonging to the Protestant community there is 4,471, of whom 1,053 are taxpayers. They have twenty-three places of worship, with an average attendance of 2,978 persons, the largest congregations being in Aintab and Marash. The church members are 722, of whom 124 were received during the past year, while the whole number of communicants from the beginning of the mission is 818. In the thirty-six schools are 1,476 pupils, with twenty-three hired teachers, the others being taught gratuitously by the women. The system of one-para. lessons given to the females, is still adopted with success; 400 women have, by this means, either been taught to read or are being taught; “and,” said Mr. Morgan, “it is not an uncommon sight in some of the districts to see in the open country a group of poor women sitting down for a few minutes at noon to rest from their toilsome field-work, and spelling out verses from the New Testaments which they had carried with them in their bosoms.”

In Marash alone, 200 women are reading or learning to read, two men and forty children going daily from house to house to help them through their ipe-per-kims—the Armenian A B C's; while these women were repaying the time and money spent upon them by giving gratuitous instruction to some fifty children—one of these private schools having in it twenty-one pupils.

The contributions of the people of the Southern field towards their various benevolent and missionary enterprises also show a spirit worthy of the times of the Apostles. To take again Marash as an example, the Protestants gave in one year—

For schools	3,000 piastres.
“Soul Loving Society,” a kind of missionary association which they had formed amongst themselves	3,000 ..
Poor	450 ..
American Board	1,000 ..
Church repairs	500 ..

A total of . . . 7,950 ..

—besides their taxes to Sdepan Agha, the civil head of the Protestants, and 25,000 piastres of taxes to the Turkish Government.

At Oorfa the people paid, during the past year, 7,000 piastres for religious and charitable objects, aside from their heavy taxes, and in the other stations the contributions were in like proportion.

Another pleasing feature of the work is the indirect influence of the Revival Melodies, which are taught in the Sabbath-schools and sung by the children in the streets and at their homes. Some of our readers may be familiar with the story of the little Armenian girl of Antioch, who, through a chink in the wall, caught and learned the words and air of “I’m a Pilgrim,” from some of the native Protestant children who lived near by, and who shortly after, being taken seriously ill, called her brother and friends to her bedside, and while telling them that she was a “pilgrim,” and a “stranger,” and could “tarry but a night,” fell asleep, it is believed, in Jesus. But all our readers may not be aware that these Revival Melodies are now sung publicly in Aintab by even the Moslem children. A native helper there gives a humorous account of a scene which he lately witnessed, where some twelve or fourteen of the most ragged and dirty urchins of Aintab, who are employed as city scavengers, were seen one day returning from the place outside the town where they had been depositing their loads, mounted on their donkeys, with their now empty mat-bags slung across the backs of the animals, and singing in Turkish, at the top of their voices, in the presence of cadi, mufti, or whatever Moslem dignitary might be passing by, "I want to be an Angel!" Surely never before did such a song come from Mohammedan lips!

TOCAT.

The report of this station, by the Rev. H. Y. Van Lennep, gave some encouraging details of the work there, dating from 1854, when the first missionary and his family took up their residence in the place. The Church, which had then been formed with eight members, four men and four women—two of the latter having been admitted by letter and two by profession—has had in all forty-seven members, thirty-five having been admitted by profession. The present number of communicants is thirty-six, of whom only one has been suspended from the Church, and he on account of being "righteous overmuch," and blaming his brethren. The members of the Church have most of them been remarkable for their great spiritual experiences. At the time of the departure of Mr. Van Lennep and his family, with no prospect of ever returning again to that field, an unusual degree of religious feeling had been excited, and even the old Armenians expressed much concern, and said: "Our last day of grace has come, because our shepherd is leaving us."

The Tocat station is now without any missionary, and, owing to the depressed finances of the Board, it will probably remain so for some time. The native Protestants deplore this greatly. "But," say they, "we have Henry Martyn's grave among us, and this will induce many Christians in foreign lands to pray more earnestly for us." Henry Martyn's grave is indeed a prominent object of interest in the city. Through the exertions of Mr. Van Lennep, the East India Company have erected a handsome monument to his memory, with an appropriate inscription cut in three different languages—English, Armenian, and Persian; there is to be a fourth in Turkish, but it is not yet completed. May those who have read with profit the "Life of Henry Martyn" remember in their prayers the people among whom he died!

There are in Tocat 100 Protestants; they have three schools—one supported by the Board with fifty pupils, another supported by a Sabbath-school in America, with also fifty pupils, some of whom are gipsy children, and still a third with thirty pupils. The present average attendance on the Sabbath is 180, and it is thought there would be more were it not for the uncomfortableness of the chapel, which since the fire is, as some one expressed it, "but a hole into which one must make his mind to sink."

The reports from other stations were unusually interesting, but we have notices of only two of them, Marsovan and Constantinople.

MARSOVAN.

At Marsovan there are 235 Protestants, and there is a fine field open for missionary labour. A missionary has, however, only been stationed there during the past year, and there he and his wife have been literally toiling amid many personal discouragements. Of these the principal one is that which has existed since the Tower of Babel—confusion of tongues—the people speaking only Armenian, while the missionary and his wife, who have been out but a short time, know only Turkish.

In alluding to this drawback upon their usefulness, the wife of the missionary says: "I have had prayer-meetings all winter long with about fifty women, but often, after preparing myself with great labour and anxiety to take the lead of the meeting, I have found that the women hardly understood a word of what I had been saying, and many times when I have prayed in Turkish and then called upon them to offer prayer in Armenian, neither of us being able to comprehend the other, I have been ready to weep aloud and give up in despair."

This is a phase of missionary trial peculiarly discouraging to a sensitive spirit. Our Marsovan friends are now about returning to their field, but they are trying to find a native helper to take with them, who will relieve them of part of the oversight of the Church, and give them time to study the Armenian.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

And now we come to the capital itself. The disaffection of the Pera Church and the secession of Mr. Williams have greatly depressed the hearts of the missionaries. The report calls the present a time of "spiritual darkness." The special prayer of Christians is needed by the missionaries that light may soon come.

The questions of retrenchment, and of the removal of the Theological Seminary and of the Female Boarding-school into the interior, were the subjects of much discussion during the meetings. Retrenchment falls heavily on every heart, but there is no alternative. A committee has been appointed to correspond with all the stations on the removal of the schools, and to report at the next annual meeting. The reasons urged in favour of it are the expense and worldly influence of the capital.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

This meeting was presided over by Sir Henry Bulwer—the first time an English ambassador has taken such a prominent religious position. The statistics from the secretary's report showed the eagerness with which the Word of God is bought and read at the capital; and the facts communicated by those who have come from Mount Taurus or from the Nile, from Bulgaria or from Smyrna, bore witness to the wonderful spread of the Gospel in all those regions. In Egypt 4,000 piastres worth of Bibles was sold during the past year, 400 piastres having been the receipts at a small village on the Nile, where a fair was being held.

A pleasing fact communicated at the Bible meeting was the permission that the Turkish Government had recently given for the printing, at the capital, of the Turkish Bible in Arabic character. It is due to Sir Henry to say that it was owing to his exertions that this was obtained.

Dr. Schauffler has resigned his connexion with the American Board, and he will now be under the patronage of the British and Foreign Bible Society, as his work of translation comes more under their supervision.

PERSIA.

REMARKABLE SCENES OF LIBERALITY AMONG THE NESTORIANS.

DESCRIBED BY A NATIVE TEACHER.*

of the English, 9, 1861.

Dear Parents in Christ, Mr. and Mrs. Perkins, Dr. and Mrs. Wright, and Miss Fisk, —I have a great matter of joy to write to you, but excuse me for writing one letter to you all five. On Sabbath-day, the last Sabbath of the English March, in the afternoon, Priest Yohannan (John) was preaching, in his turn, about the monthly collection (which was becoming very small), that it was a shame; and how much better it would be to take up more than they had been accustomed to do; that, if it were possible, there should be a double collection, that a preacher might be sent to the mountains to preach the blessed Gospel to that part of our poor people. Suddenly, there were whisperings a little on this side, and a little on that side. Priest Yohannan desired them to keep still, that there should not be whispering. But God was working in the hearts of the great and the small assembled in the church. Suddenly, one exclaimed, "I will give one tomon" [9s. 4½d.]; another, "I will give a tomon and a-half;" another, "I will give half a tomon;" another,

"Twenty-five cents;" another, "Three tomons;" another, "Four tomons;" one, "A load of wheat," or, "Half a load of wheat," or, "One measure," or "Three measures." Others promised four half-bushels of raisins, or eight, or one, or three. The women also: one of them gave a monet (a Russian dollar); another, three quarters of a dollar; another, one quarter; another, two quarters or one quarter. And others their embroidered head-dresses; and others, their jewels, and their rings and trappings; and others, one-tenth of the products of their vineyards, or the products of their clover fields; and others one-fourth of their harvest, or one-fifth, or one-sixth; or one-half of the raisins they now had in their houses.

Another woman gave four pounds of butter, from a cow she had. And one poor man, who with difficulty finds millet for the necessity of his family, who was there on the Sabbath, said, "I have a new mat which I have worked myself; I will give it." On Monday he took it on his shoulder, and brought it, and committed it to me. Another, who had come to meeting on the same Sabbath, gave the fruit of fifteen ridges of his vineyard; and another, one tope [2½ English yards] of cotton cloth. And so they went on giving in these various ways, that in the coming autumn, when their fair fruits are turned out, they may fulfil their vows. And some of them (those who have the means on hand) now give what they pledged. A lay brother, who is very poor—who even in these days was asking something from the brethren for the necessities of his family, or a certificate of his need, to have on hand, that he might go to brethren of other villages and beg something—was so much affected that he pledged two shillings with goodwill and joy of heart.

Many of the brethren spoke, stirring up and inciting those who were in the church: Mar Elima, a bishop of eighty years old, spoke; also Priest Yohannan the elder, Priest Yohannan the younger, Yonan, and others. Between the speeches there were prayers. There were still men and women making pledges; and others that made pledges a second time.

I will here write for you some of the words that were spoken by a few of them; for I cannot write all; a great deal of time would be required. But I will write these, which will suffice as a specimen. One brother of the Sabbath-school arose on his feet, and pledged a monet (Russian dollar), added to the two he had given on his own account, in behalf of his two little sons, whom he had asked of the Lord, which made three dollars. And, again, after his mother had pledged an embroidered garment for the face, he rose and said, "My mother, don't be afraid; pledge more, it is for the Lord. Remember Mary, who poured out the very precious ointment upon the head of our Saviour," &c.

Another brother rose and said, "Two men were discussing together about the expense of some undertaking, the building of a church in Jerusalem, or something, I do not quite remember about what. One of them said, 'I will give two hundred tomans.' The other said, 'I, also, will give two hundred tomans.' Then the first one increased, and the other in the manner. The first one went up to five hundred tomans, and altogether it became a thousand tomans." So he talked to incite the Christians, saying that their givings are not for a worldly object, like that of those men, but it is for the Lord, and the setting up of His kingdom and His Gospel in our village, and among our poor people, &c.

Another brother (one who had not been able to speak in church from his bashfulness) rose and said: "My brethren, I have a word. Our father Abraham and his wife Sarah were aged. In their old age God gave to them one only son; but again, God demanded of Abraham that he should slay him for a sacrifice; and he listened, and did as God willed. But the same Abraham was mindful of the covenant of God, that his seed should be as the stars in the heavens and as the sand on the seashore. So he believed, and so he received. We also, my brethren, though we are very poor, and are under the burden of oppression and extortion of the Mohammedans, yet let us give bravely of our poverty, and we shall receive of the Lord according to our faith," &c.

My brother George got up and said: "Ye women! When Moses was building the tabernacle, he asked of the Israelites the expenditures, and they brought them. The women also engaged zealously in the matter, and brought the brass on the backs of their mirrors, &c. If you will make your garments a little narrower, or diminish the tinsel bottoms, it will be very easy for you to give for the Lord," &c. After a little time he spake again: "Wake up! Behold the musicians are giving for the Lord! On their wealth (their drums and their pipes) is written, 'Holiness to the Lord!' Here was brought to remembrance a sermon of Mr. Perkins, which he preached in our village to the Sabbath-schools. 'In that day holiness to the Lord shall be written on the bells of their horses,' &c. (because those volunteers, the owners of the camels, who were going to carry raisins which I had bought to Erivan, were detained on the Sabbath-day, and not allowed to start when they were all ready to put on their loads). Perhaps you will remember it, my dear Mr. Perkins.

To sum up, there were many addresses; they remained long in the church, perhaps more than three hours, when we went out, and saw all the faces of the men and women changed to joy and gladness, and their colour and countenance like roses and open blossoms; the depth of their poverty and low estate seemed like a pleasant valley of flowers, and full of fatness and spiritual enjoyment, and in the midst thereof all precious hid treasures laid open, more precious than gold and silver, and all the perishable pearls of this empty world. And all their heavy burdens of debt were lighter than a quill or the feather of a flying bird; and all their circumstances of trial and annoyance were turned to rest and ease; and oppressions and extortions were cast aside, before the blessed feet of Jehovah, in the name of His Son Immanuel. Why not? Shall it not be said, "Come ye people! come ye nations! together let us praise the Lord; for the Lord God is to be exalted and honoured and magnified from everlasting to everlasting?"

In the evening, at meeting-time, the men and the women assembled. Some of them brought in their hands embroidered head-garments and ornaments. One of them brought a silvered border (the kind which is sewed on the garments of females for the bosom), its price being a tomon, or perhaps more. Others, who were not at meeting in the church, came in the evening with pledges in their mouths, one saying, "I will give a tomon," &c.; and another, while in his house, had said, "I will give a load of wheat (five bushels) from my own threshing-floor, as soon as the harvest is out." And when I met him I wrote him down for the load of wheat. Said I, "It is obligatory" [on your neck]. "Yes," he cheerfully answered, "yes, of course." On that evening Yonan conducted the meeting. It was a very delightful time. Sleep departed from our eyes that night, from joy and thanksgiving to the Lord, for the great work He has done in the midst of us, when we were not looking for all these things that have come to pass.

On the first Monday of the month of Nisan (April), in the morning, we went to the city to meeting. Many of the teachers and brethren and friends were assembled as usual (at monthly concert), and many of them inquired about the work which God had done in Geog Tapa, and they marvelled and also rejoiced. The bell rung in the afternoon, and we went to the large chapel. Mr. Coan conducted the meeting, and afterwards invited us to speak. Priest Yohannan, my uncle, spoke; afterwards I spoke; and after me Yonan; also other brethren from our village, and those who preach in other villages. Here also the glorious finger of the Creator wrought very great and wonderful works. (Embroidered garments of the women and their ornaments, &c. [those given at Geog Tapa] were exhibited to the whole assembly by John.) Pledgers began to pledge money and things. The same brethren from our village, who labour in other villages, increased and increased; also other brethren from the villages of the country; also of the laymen who were there. Here also, amid their pledges to give, there were addresses and prayers. And the amount of giving was after the manner I have described in our village, but many others pledged more.

One who at first pledged fifteen tomons, again promised all the fruit of one of his vineyards. And after a few minutes he rose and said: "The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, the three are one God. The fifteen tomons to the Father; the fruit of the vineyard to the Son; and a load of flour to the Holy Spirit." And others, from four tomons to five, and even up to eight, each one. And others one-tenth of all their produce, one-fourth, one-fifth, one-sixth, and so on. And one of the Nestorians first pledged a watch, and afterwards thirty tomons, so that it should be as the price of a robe for the bride (the Church of Christ).

I cannot describe or write the pleasant and joyful speeches, or about the joy of the dear missionaries who were there. Both the gentlemen and the ladies participated in this giving, with great joy. Here, also, we remained in the chapel perhaps four hours. Oh, what a delightful time it was! The girls of the female seminary also gave.

Again, in the evening, there was a meeting. Mr. Ambrose conducted it. There were many prayers and addresses. On Tuesday, the 2nd of April, our Father in Heaven caused to fall rain and snow; we could not scatter; many of the brethren remained in the city, and those other teachers, from the district of Barandooz, came down from Seir, and heard these tidings. They marvelled and rejoiced. In the evening, again, there was a meeting. Mr. Ambrose again conducted it. There were many prayers and addresses, and those brethren from Barandooz now made pledges in great love and promptness; and many others, for a second and third time, made pledges. There is one, who is a joiner, who promised to give one month of joiner work. On Wednesday, the 3rd of Nisan, the missionaries from Seir came down, very joyful. Mr. Cochran met some of them, and said, "Your faces are very happy," &c. So was his.

On the Sabbath, the 7th of April, our Sabbath-school assemblage was very large, and in the afternoon of the same day, I preached, in my turn, from these words: "Set your affections on things above." (Col. iii. 2.) Again, men and women pledged to give something for the Lord. Malek Aga Bey pledged, as a second offering, half the raisins he now has in his house. In the evening many came to the meeting. This, also, was a very delightful day.

On the 8th of April, I heard, in the seminary in the city, that there were collections there again on Sunday, the 7th of April. Mar Yohannan pledged thirty tomons. In the village of Vazerova, also, about twenty tomons were collected, as I understood, and the people of Degala have made pledges of a collection; also, the people of Charbash, on the 4th of April, were very eager to make pledges; but I have not heard since whether collections were made there on the 7th of Nisan or not.

Yesterday, Priest Abraham came from Ardishai. He says there had been a collection there of thirteen tomons, from the readers there, and he says there are many others still, who will give. Also the people of Takky will make collections on the coming Sabbaths.

My dear friends, the Lord does not permit that your toils and pains here shall be in vain; and the toils and pains of the missionaries now here. He has heard the prayers of your missionaries, and of all the Christians there in America, and of us also, poor, weak Nestorians. The Lord magnifies His work, and advances it here more and more, and in all the Eastern countries, and throughout the world.

My dear Fathers—Mr. Perkins and Dr. Wright—excuse me that I have not written to you till now. I cannot forget you, nor your good that you have done for me from the days of my childhood till the last. Peace to you, dear friends.

I trust you will greatly rejoice, in view of these wonders which God is doing among our people, and that you will not weary. Perhaps other brethren will also write to you these pleasant tidings. I had never rejoiced so much as I rejoice in these delightful days, the like of which I have never seen. All is from the Lord. Let millions praise Him. I pray that this matter of giving may still increase and advance.

My family, and all the people of my house, join me in much love to you and your children. We are much pleased with the new missionaries. They are very pleasant. We thank them and those who sent them.

The amount of collections in our village is about seventy tomons—perhaps more—besides the tithes of the produce, and the ornaments, and the garments, &c. But the amount of the collections in the city I do not well know. I think it may be 300 tomons (140*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*) or more, besides the seminaries, &c.

Your loving friend,
MOSES.

CHINA.

BAPTISM OF TWO CHINESE—PROGRESS OF MISSIONARY EFFORTS—ACQUISITION OF NEW CHAPELS AND GRATUITOUS LABOUR OF NATIVE CHRISTIANS—ASPECT OF THE MISSIONARY FIELD—PRAYER REQUESTED.

Fuh-Chau, May 14, 1861.

The work goes on slowly, yet surely, as we firmly believe, in this vast heathen city. While, and though, there are only about sixty adult native Christians in this city and vicinity, we would not feel discouraged. The work is the Lord's. Its prospects are as bright as the promises of God, and no brighter. There is nothing in the circumstances of this people to encourage us, apart from the promises found in the Bible. Here is our refuge, our tower, our stronghold. If the Lord be for us, who can be against us? We would "walk by faith," and at the same time be encouraged "by sight," in the prosecution of our labours.

You will rejoice with us to learn that recently there have been two baptisms of Chinese, in connexion with the English Church Mission; and these two are the first baptisms in connexion with that mission since its establishment in May 1850. The firstfruits have been gathered in after nearly eleven years of toil and prayer.

I would record my conviction, that the people as a mass, and even their rulers, are becoming more favourably disposed towards foreigners in this part of China; not that they are inclined to accept and practice the precepts of the Christian religion—they seem as indisposed to do that as ever. This change is probably owing, in part, to the events of last summer and autumn, in the north of China, and, in part, to the public posting up of Chinese copies of the new English and the French treaties, in various places in the city and suburbs, last January. Printed in large Chinese characters, they attracted the attention of every one, and excited considerable angry feeling. After a few weeks, this angry excitement subsided, and one of the results has been that the city is now open to missionary labour, in a better sense than ever before. Two chapels and a site for dwelling-houses, located within the city walls, have been secured since the posting of these treaties, by the mission of the American Board. That mission for several years have been desirous of renting chapels in the city, but have been unable to do so, in consequence of the known opposition on the part of the gentry and the authorities.

The American Methodist Mission, for several years, has met with considerable encouragement in the country some twelve or fifteen miles to the westward of Fuh-Chau. At the present time two comfortable chapels are being erected at two places, where they have native converts. What is worthy of particular notice in this connexion is, that a large portion of the labour spent in building these chapels, is donated by the native Christians residing in the vicinity.

Some eight or ten native Christians are employed as helpers, or preachers, by the different missions here, in publishing the Gospel to their countrymen. More Christian books are circulated among the people now than some six or eight years ago, but the truth is becoming more widely and more intelligently diffused among them by the voice of the foreign missionary and the native helper.

The mass of the Chinese do not seem, as a general remark, to discern the difference between Protestant Christianity and the Roman Catholic religion. Protestant missionaries their converts, and their doctrines, are often sadly confounded with Roman Catholic emissaries, converts, and doctrines. After calling attention to the most manifest points of difference, in regard to practice and doctrine, the people appear to assent to the dissimilarity asserted; but, after all, it is feared that they believe the dissimilarity to be more apparent than real. Both religions are foreign, and their principal propagandists are foreigners, and the monies spent by each come from foreign lands; and, above all, they both indicate the worship of Jesus. These facts seem to be sufficient for the Chinese to place them both in the same valuation, and to esteem them as essentially the same. The want of a ready spiritual perception of the nature of the Christian religion, is one of the great obstacles to the reception of the Gospel by this people.

Let ardent and frequent prayer be offered up by Western Christians in behalf of this deluded people.

NATAL EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE ANNUAL MEETING AT D'URBAN—SPECIAL REPORT ON WOMAN-SLAVERY AND POLYGAMY—SUBSEQUENT DISCUSSION—THE REPORT ADOPTED.

D'Urban, June 10, 1861.

I beg to forward you a copy of the Natal Mercury, giving a faithful report of the Annual Meeting of our Natal Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, lately held in D'Urban. If you deem it worthy of being copied, and can give it insertion, I shall be very much obliged. The subject on which the special report has been prepared excites considerable interest with us. The evil of native polygamy touches closely the interests of the Gospel throughout the land, not only among the Kafirs, but the white population also. And the fact that English law—i.e., as administered by local magistrates—recognises and sanctions the abomination, as also that of woman-selling and slavery, has a tendency seriously to injure the position of the white man in the esteem of the coloured races, and to deteriorate his moral character.

We hope that the question will continue to be agitated and discussed here, until the Government feel compelled to introduce some modification of the present system.

THE NATAL EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Evangelical Alliance was held in the Wesleyan Chapel, D'Urban, according to announcement, on Friday evening. A considerable number of townspeople evinced by their presence a personal interest in the objects and proceedings of the meeting. Mr. A. W. Evans was called to the chair at seven o'clock, when a large number of ministers and missionaries, of various denominations, appeared on the platform, and after preliminary exercises, made a few preparatory remarks, alluding more especially to the great and formidable evil which they had to consider that night. He trusted that their proceedings might result in an organised opposition, which would not terminate there, but produce ultimately some decisive effect.

The Rev. G. Y. Jeffreys (Congregational Secretary of the Alliance) read the annual report, the adoption of which was suitably proposed by the Rev. J. Jackson (Wesleyan), and seconded by Mr. J. Blackwood, who referred in forcible terms to the advantage of union on broad principles among religious bodies, who differed on matters of mode and detail, and likened this unity amongst Christian sects to the harmonious adjustment of differing focuses in astronomical fields.

The Rev. C. Scott (Presbyterian) then proceeded to read a long, able, carefully-compiled, and deeply-interesting report, specially prepared, on the subject of Woman-slavery and Polygamy, with the view of bringing the first of these enormities prominently before the notice of the British public and the Home Government. This document is altogether too lengthy for publication, however much we may desire to make its startling and telling statements generally known. As, however, it occupied one hour and a-quarter in delivery, we are necessarily precluded from giving more than a brief résumé of the leading points. The report commenced by disclaiming all desire to advocate any rash or premature measure of repression; the object of the Alliance was not to legislate, but to expose an evil of so terrible, yet insidious a nature, that it threatened disastrous consequences to all classes of the community. The first head under which the subject was considered, being the "Slavery of British Subjects," the report proceeded to state that the whole coloured female population of the colony—about 70,000 or 80,000—were liable or subjected to the most degrading slavery, and in proof thereof cited the plain and straightforward testimony of impartial and disinterested witnesses. Amongst other assertions deliberately made, was that the Kafir regards his wife as his slave, his dog, his property, and her proper place as being under his feet; that he only viewed females as having so much marketable value, and quoted narratives of cases where Kafir girls had been hunted, persecuted, tortured, and driven to suicide rather than become the domestic chattel of some repulsive possessor. It then represented that while in other free countries fugitives from slavery were protected and sheltered, here in Natal the law forbade any attempt to rescue or save the unhappy victim of persecution from oppression, cruelty, and bondage. Secondly, the "social and political dangers arising from a mixed population" were searchingly dealt with, and the evils threatened by the continuance of the present system, in a community composed of jarring elements, were pointed out by comparison with the experience of other countries similarly situated in point of population. Thirdly, the debasing effects of such practices on the social character of the whole Kafir race, were proved by facts, showing the domestic jealousies and strife which were thereby engendered—showing how husbands or women-owners cannot give play to their natural feelings, far fear of exciting the anger of their other wives or slaves; how the two sexes are divided in communion and sentiment; how productive of criminal and abominable practices the system is; how deadening and stupefying an effect it has upon the mind and temper of the native female, indicated in the indifference of their condition, and the disposition to tolerate polygamy itself, if the attendant evils are palliated or removed. Passing on, fourthly, to consider the great hindrance offered by these customs to the entrance and the spread of Christianity amongst the Kafir inhabitants, the report stated that while the existence of woman-slavery had been questioned on philological and entomological grounds, the Alliance opposed to such dialectical theories broad and established facts. Although the custom was contrary to the theory of Kafir law, yet the practice belied the spirit. Mr. Posselt had expressed his opinion that half the Kafir women were sold by force into matrimonial and polygamic bondage against their inclination. The fifth and last section referred to the "Remedial Measures" requisite for the discontinuance of the grievance. The Alliance did not ask for the arbitrary interposition of the civil arm at this juncture, neither did it advocate harsh or dangerous measures of any sort; it only prayed that the Council of the colony might be influenced to devise some steps by which the further extension and growth of the evil might be checked and hindered. The Rev. J. Ireland hoped that if no aggressive legislation was expedient at present, at least Government would cease to sanction the system by adjudicating in favour of the polygamist, and thereby directly endorsing his evil practices. Rev. A. Grout recommended the removal of the system gradually, and by piecemeal, and particularised the case of widows who might be allowed their liberty, and if they married again to do so of their own free will, and without a consideration being given. Rev. J. Tyler was aware that the natives had a keen hatred of any attempt to remove the evil, but he did not apprehend any combined resistance, believing that for many years to come the disunited state of the Kafir tribes would prevent such a result. He was satisfied that any measure of the Government, based upon ordinary justice and humanity, would not be successfully contended against. Rev. A. Abraham thought that if an end were put to the sale of women; a great deal would have been effected in the way of abolishing polygamy. With an earnest endorsement of this sentiment, and a hearty commendation of the subject to the attention of the colonists and the Government, this elaborate and complete report closed.

Rev. A. Grout (American), in proposing the adoption of the document, said he believed that for every instance given therein of the torturing and persecution of women ten others might be cited. After referring to the disheartening influence which these evils had on missionary exertions, he quoted paragraphs from the Bishop's recent pamphlet, emphatically condemnatory of polygamy, and then expressed his profound regret that a man holding such a position should have thought fit to come forward and publish to the world an elaborate apology—based upon an examination of all past ecclesiastical history—of a system so productive of vice, crime, and wickedness. He did not believe that the Bishop could be aware of the heathen practices his writings, in effect, tended to bolster up, and after stating that chastity was unknown, drew a vivid picture of the immoralities—many of which were unmentionable—prevalent amongst the natives. What could have actuated any man to write such a pamphlet he could not conceive.

Rev. L. Grout (American) distinctly denied that any of the cases instanced in the report were overdrawn, or picked out for the purpose. There were thousands of such continually occurring. He then exhibited the insidious influence of polygamy and its attendant vices, in destroying the morals of a community. They were first tolerated, then familiarised, then embraced. In England the attitude assumed by Christian philanthropists towards slavery was well known. At conferences of the Evangelical Alliance American ministers had not been recognised, because they were implicated in the national sin of slavery. In Turkey England was upholding there the rights of oppressed Christians. If the British public and the British Government were assuming such an attitude elsewhere, was that Alliance to be viewed as overstepping its limits here, in attacking a system which practically prevented the adoption of Christianity by female converts from heathenism. The Government were instructed to sanction the continuance of native laws and customs, except such as were repugnant to the principles of humanity. He would simply ask whether the practices they had exposed were so repugnant or no? Mr. Grout here quoted largely from opinions expressed by Mr. Shepstone before the Kafir Commission, and on other occasions, distinctly admitting and deploring the sale and disposal of women amongst the natives, and he regretted that different testimony should now be borne by that gentleman for a definite purpose, and still more that nothing should have been done for the removal of a grievance which was so decisively exposed in 1849.

After interesting speeches from the Revs. Posselt, Blencowe, &c., the report was unanimously agreed to, and the meeting broke up.

WESTERN AFRICA.

MISSIONARY EFFORT NORTH OF GABOON—ATTEMPTED EXPELSION OF MISSIONARIES AT CORISCO. BY THE SPANISH, PREVENTED—PROTESTANTS AT FERNANDO PO—VISIT TO OLD CALABAR—THE PRESENT AND THE PAST CONTRASTED.

Gaboon, Equatorial West Africa.

May 23, 1861.

Since my last communication,* in which I gave you a sketch of the origin, progress, and present state of the Lord's work in this part of dark Ethiopia, we have been pursuing our work with our usual encouragements, but with no especial manifestations of the presence of the Holy Spirit among the people. In the absence of any great success, we are encouraged by the thought, that in preaching the Gospel, translating the Scriptures, and training up a native agency, we are performing a work whose full results can only be realised in the future.

The next point of religious interest, north of Gaboon, is Corisco, a small island in Corisco Bay, about forty miles north of the Equator, and twenty from the mainland. There a mission, under the patronage of the American Presbyterian Board, was established about ten years since, which has been vigorously sustained, and attended with encouraging success. A church, numbering fifty native members, has been formed; the language has been reduced to writing, and into it portions of the Scriptures have been translated. A considerable number of youth from the island, and from several different tribes on the mainland, have been educated, and two of the number have been licensed to preach, and several others are candidates for the ministry. From Corisco the Gospel has been carried to many of the adjacent tribes; and we trust, ultimately, that Christian civilization may be introduced into all that region of country. The Spanish Government claim the Island of Corisco, and after having expelled the Protestant missionary from Fernando Po, about three years since, an attempt was made to do the same at Corisco, but the interference of the United States Government prevented the result. Between Corisco and the Cameroons River there are no missionary stations, though frequent itinerating visits have been made by the missionaries who reside at Corisco, and one or two native helpers have been located there.

While spending a week or two recently at Fernando Po, I found several Protestants there formerly connected with the Baptist Mission, who seemed to be faithful, but longed for the means of grace, and permission to worship God publicly. At present, only family worship is allowed; but I was informed that the governor and several other officials were in favour of toleration, and had petitioned the Government to that effect. The Baptist missionaries, who have removed to Victory and the Cameroons, I did not see, but was informed that they were encouraged in their work. I passed a week with the Scotch Presbyterian missionary at Old Calabar, and was much gratified with the progress of the Lord's work on that river.

These four missions, at Gaboon, Corisco, Cameroons, and Calabar, if well sustained, will ultimately plant the Gospel on all the coast of the Bight of Biafra, extending from Cape Lopez to Cape Formosa, a distance of about four hundred miles; and from the coast the work will gradually extend, through native agents, into the unexplored regions of Central Ethiopia. When I compare the present aspect of the cause with what it was twenty years since, when the horrid slave-trade was desolating this coast, and no ray of heavenly light or saving influence was visible, I am led to exclaim, What hath God wrought! The work is His, and He will carry it forward until the Sun of Righteousness has dispersed the darkness which has for ages enshrouded this land.

Fraternally yours, &c.,

A. BUSHNELL.

GREAT MORTALITY—EUROPEANS IN DANGER—HEATHEN WICKEDNESS—DEGRADED CONDITION OF WOMAN—THE NATIVES UNDER MEDICAL TREATMENT—DEATH OF A NATIVE CHRISTIAN—TRANSLATIONS COMPLETED AND IN PROGRESS—A CONVERT OF BISHOP SELWYN'S.

Eromanga, April 6, 1861.

We are passing through a season of imminent peril on this and the neighbouring islands by the introduction of the measles (rubeola maligna), which have destroyed two-thirds of the population in many villages. The natives in general look upon us as the cause of this scourge, and being maddened with enmity, have risen up to destroy all foreigners. They nearly succeeded in killing all the Europeans a few days ago, and made another bold attack on the sandal-wood establishment two nights since, and burnt one house, or set fire to some. They held a council before our door to kill us, but were divided in their counsel, because the fear of God seems to be upon them all. It is truly awful to live among such a savage people at such a time as this; but "the name of the Lord is a strong tower." The only Christian native on the island has taken refuge with us.

Their wickedness was very great during the two past years—crimes of burning villages and killing of helpless women and children were increasing. In warning them of their danger, but one week before the measles came among them, I taught the doctrine of a retributive Providence with unusual earnestness. That day will not soon be forgotten; for the chiefs and leaders in crime and idolatry are now nearly all dead. Many now exclaim that the Word of God is certainly true, but hate us, as the cause of bringing their sins to remembrance in the light of this new doctrine. Idolatry has received a deathblow. Some of them have so feared Jehovah as to remove their images out of the villages where the sick were lying, and I hope they will soon destroy them. They are now sorely wounded, and seem to require nothing but the balm of Gilead, after which they are beginning to inquire.

But few of the juveniles have died, and have hope that they will be like the generation of Israel that entered the promised land. This interesting class is now daily falling under our influence. Their fathers were nearly as strongly opposed to the Gospel as the Jews in their worst state, and the causes are somewhat similar—the new teaching interferes with the time-honoured traditions of the old. I may state that woman is here shut out of the camp seven days every month, and cannot be received in again till after her purification; and other such traditions are extant. It is, above all things, hateful to them that salvation by Jesus embraces woman—hated, despised woman—as it does the lords of the earth.

It is exceedingly painful to see a people fading away in unbelief upon whom you have set your heart to bring to a knowledge of the truth. When we lie down at night and rise in the morning, we hear the long, loud, and bitter cry of those who mourn without hope. None died of the measles on our premises, and but two of those who came properly under our treatment. In this the hand of God was manifest. Cases of phrenitis and meningitis were very troublesome, as they were ascribed to the influence of evil spirits. I found our most powerful astringents injurious in cases of chronic diarrhoea, which generally ensued. The man who was regarded as the murderer of Mr. Harris is dead—I cannot say “in the Lord;” and the chief, who is the only surviving murderer of Mr. Williams, is in a very humble state; and having oppressed some widows and orphans, by robbing them, has lost some of his teeth in a singular manner—they became soft, like sponge, and fell out. He says that Jehovah has taken them out—a very unusual confession here. We had a hurricane in January, which must have been about one hundred miles an hour. It left the island in a state of desolation and famine, which greatly aggravated the measles: everything was blasted. The measles have run over at least eight islands here. We had a catechumen who died five months ago—we believe in the Lord—the first and only one whom we have reason to think was a Christian. He was delirious for a few days, and could not recognise his friends; but when asked, “Do you then know who is Jesus?” he could answer, “Oh, yes! He is our dear Saviour!” That name which is above every name is a Divine charm to the soul whose eyes are opened. I have just translated the Gospel of Luke, and Dr. Campbell's Catechism, “Principles of Saving Knowledge,” omitting the scriptural names, and some of the hymns in the first edition. The capacity of this people to receive scriptural knowledge is not greater than that of European children of five years old; and I therefore doubt the propriety of translating the Scriptures in full (an error into which I was nearly falling) till this great work can be done with something like thorough accuracy. I have just published another tract of twenty-four pages, on the Old Testament, which contains the history of Joseph, of the ten plagues of Egypt, and of the glorious Exodus. A synopsis of the Four Gospels will follow (God willing), containing some of our Lord's most striking parables and sayings, such as children can readily comprehend, as most suitable for all.

While writing the above, a young man has called from the south of the island, to inquire for the Word of God. He says that the Bishop of New Zealand, whom he calls his father, took him to New Zealand several years ago, and taught him about Jehovah, but that, on his return, he followed his old ways, and thought little of the Word of God, till he became sick with the measles. Thus is this noble missionary found to be doing good when and where I did not expect to find it.

HOME.

THE NEW BISHOPS OF DURHAM AND OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

Dr. Baring, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, has been appointed by Her Majesty to the see of Durham, vacant by the lamented decease of Dr. Villiers. The new Bishop of Durham attained high distinction at his university, was zealous and popular as the incumbent of a metropolitan parish, and has displayed much wisdom and ability in the administration of the diocese he now leaves. These qualifications, together with his reputation for sound Evangelical doctrine and decided personal piety, will doubtless be recognised as constituting him a fit successor to the beloved prelate who has been so suddenly removed from the responsibilities of earth to the joys of heaven.

Dr. William Thomson, Provost of Queen's College, Oxford, is the new Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. He was the successor of Dr. Baring at All Souls, Marylebone, and has distinguished himself as a preacher and an author in defence of the truth of revelation as assailed both by the theories of Mr. Maurice and the bolder speculations of the seven Essayists. To this latter circumstance, in conjunction with his high scholastic attainments, it is understood that Dr. Thomson owes his appointment. In both these cases, Lord Palmerston, in recommending to the Crown for preferment the divines we have named, has rendered service not only to the Church of England, but to the nation at large. Substantially, the views of truth held by Drs. Baring and Thomson are those devoutly cherished by the great body of Scottish Presbyterians and English Wesleyans and Nonconformists. Be Lord Palmerston's tenure of power long or short, by these appointments he has earned a lasting claim to the gratitude of all Evangelical Protestants.

DEATH OF BISHOP VILLIERS.

The removal of that distinguished ornament of the English Church, the Bishop of Durham, is not a little admonitory. His lordship would have been among the very last, whom—as far as outward appearances might be trusted—we should have supposed marked out for speedy dissolution. Beneath that seemingly healthful exterior, however, there lay a mortal disease, which, we now learn, might at any time within the last few years have carried him off in a moment. As it was, during the few weeks he lingered, amid the alternating hopes and fears of his friends, as the symptoms improved or grew worse, opportunity was afforded for showing how widespread was the sympathy among all denominations excited by his illness. To quote the words of those who were among his severest censors a few months back, "However incautiously he may have acted upon [one] occasion, he never lost the esteem of those who knew him best; and the strong interest which vast numbers of people, Dissenters as well as Churchmen, have taken in his last illness, is the most eloquent of all comments upon his life and character."

The late Hon. and Right Rev. Henry Montagu Villiers was born in January, 1813. His grandfather was the first Earl of Clarendon in the Villiers line; his grandmother, Lady Jane the last of the historic line of Hyde. His first parochial charge (after ceasing to be a curate) was the Vicarage of Kenilworth. In 1841 he was appointed Rector of St. George's, Bloomsbury; in 1847 he became Canon of St. Paul's; in 1856 he was nominated to the Bishopric of Carlisle; and in 1860 he was translated to that of Durham. The greatest event that can take place in the history of a human soul occurred in his case after he was clothed with the responsibilities of the sacred office. "One of my earliest and dearest friends in the ministry"—is his own testimony, delivered in a public lecture in London—"one who was faithful to me before I was myself in the faith—one whose memory, now that he is entered into his rest, is most dear to me—was a linen-draper's apprentice, before we were fellow-curates together in Lancashire." The Rev. Emilius Bayley, the Bishop's successor in the Rectory of Bloomsbury, in a funeral sermon delivered on the 18th ult., stated the circumstances under which the great change took place. While Vicar of Kenilworth, Mr. Villiers was called upon to preach a funeral sermon in the neighbourhood. A brother clergyman heard him preach, and in the afternoon of the day sought his company, and, with great plainness and affection, pointed out to him the deficiencies of the sermon, and told him that, though kind and earnest in tone, it must fail to save a single soul, since it was devoid of the Gospel. Mr. Villiers listened, and after careful thought and examination, saw that his friend was right. His mind became enlightened, and he beheld Christ as he had never beheld Him before. One of his first steps after this change of sentiment was to stand up among his own people, and declare to them that hitherto he had been teaching them error, but that henceforth he was determined to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and Him crucified.

The Bishop's end was peace. His Saviour whom he had loved and served cheered him in his dying moments, and among his latest words were the repeated utterances of that pregnant passage, upon which so many a spirit in conflict and difficulty has found relief, Rom. viii. 28, "We know that all things work together for good," &c. Thus passed away one of the most catholic-minded Christians, one of the most faithful, laborious, and useful preachers of the Gospel, and one of the most estimable and beloved of prelates. His removal is a loss not only to his own comnion, but to the Church of Christ throughout these realms.

THE LATE REV. HENRY TOWNLEY AND JAMES DOUGLAS, ESQ., OF CAVERS.

Two men widely different in some respects, but alike in their long lives of devoted service to their common Lord, bade adieu to earth, within a few days of each other, during the past month. A few sentences is due to the memory of each.

The Rev. Henry Townley was early in life a sceptic. After his conversion, he became instrumental in bringing to a knowledge of the truth his brother, afterwards Dr. Townley, and both consecrated their lives to the extension of the Gospel. Henry, like his father, a man of considerable wealth, was a proctor in Doctor's Commons. He relinquished that lucrative profession; and was ordained a missionary to India. There he laboured for some years and built Union Chapel, Calcutta, until his health compelled his return. At home he laboured as a pastor and an Evangelist—raised an expiring cause into a flourishing congregation, and secured the erection of a place of worship—Bishopsgate Chapel—not only by personal effort, but pecuniary aid to an extent which led his people to express, in their own words, "their esteem and admiration of his almost unbounded liberality." When growing infirmities compelled him to retire from the pastorate, he laboured as strength and opportunity permitted, often occupying, for example, during the summer season, a temporary pulpit on the Ramsgate sands, and at a little distance from the frivolities which so often there engage the visitors' attention, seeking to allure the passing crowd to the enduring joys of true religion. These he himself tasted in this life to an extent which is unhappily far from common among Christians. "His communion with God," says one who knew him, "was constant, and often made his 'face to shine.' His religious joy was an enthusiasm. More than once, during his painful illness, he spoke of his spiritual rapture as almost unbearable." The physician's announcement, that he would die within two months, he thus spoke of to a friend: "I can hardly believe it; it fills me with joy!" Mr. Townley was the originator of the Union Prayer-meetings in the parish of Islington, where he passed the latter years of his life.

James Douglas, Esq., of Cavers, was a consistent Christian, of considerable natural talent, combined with high culture. He served his day and generation by a long career of practical usefulness; but he is best known as an author. His writings, which are often marked by originality, and always by the attractiveness of their style, have deservedly acquired for him a wide-spread reputation. Among them may be mentioned, "The Advancement of Society in Knowledge and Religion;" "The Structure of Prophecy;" "The Philosophy of the Mind;" and "Errors Regarding Religion."

To the poor the Gospel is still preached, and some of the brightest illustrations of the power of religion are to be found in humble life. But Christianity claims the allegiance of men of every grade, and in the long and honourable career accomplished by each of the men we have named that claim is fully vindicated. Mr. Townley's genealogy could be traced, it was said, to the Conquest; Mr. Douglas is spoken of as the eighteenth in descent from Archibald, son of the Earl of Douglas, who was killed at the battle of Otterburn, in 1388. Would that other men, who can boast of as ancient an ancestry, might imitate them in their works of faith and labours of love!

RECENT WORKS ON THE BOOK OF GENESIS.

Liber Genesis Pentateuchicus ex recognitione EDUARDI BOEHMER. Halis Saxonum: Impensis Orphanotrophei. 1860.

A Commentary on the Book of Genesis, for the use of the readers of the English Version of the Bible. By HENRY CHARLES GROVES, M.A., Perpetual Curate of Mullavilly, Diocese of Armagh. Macmillan and Co., Cambridge and London. 1861.

WE have placed these two publications together for review, because they are both on the same book of the Bible, although, as may be seen from their titles, they are of a very different character. The first is a critical text issued by a German scholar, and intended for the learned; the second a commentary, designed more for the use of the people, though in advance of anything of the kind we have seen, and by no means deficient in scholarship and critical taste.

There is another great distinction to be drawn between the works. The commentary is written by a believer in the Divine character of the book commented on; while the text is edited by one who does not seem to regard the Book of Genesis as an inspired production.

Mr. Boehmer's opinion of the authorship of the Book of Genesis, as we learn from his preface, is that there are four hands discernible in its composition. The most ancient author, he supposes, wrote his portion at the period when David had fixed his royal seat at Hebron, or, possibly, even at a somewhat later date; while the second and third writers belonged both to the Kingdom of Israel, as distinguished from that of Judah—the former living in the time of Eliah, the latter under the reign of Jeroboam II. The editor of the complete work Mr. Boehmer considers to have been a learned Jew, who lived during the reign of the good King Josiah, and endeavoured to restore the sacred writings (which had, long ere that period, perished), and to unite all Israel under one sceptre. This editor, it appears, met with considerable difficulty in his endeavour to combine the sacred writings, as the works of the second and third writers of Genesis differed on this hypothesis very considerably from each other in their accounts of the same narrative—so much so, indeed, that traces of their difference are supposed to be still extant in the combined Genesis, after all the labour which the pious and learned editor took to reduce them to harmony.

We are glad to see the attention of scholars drawn towards the revision of the text of the Old Testament, for, although we dissent very widely from Mr. Boehmer's opinion and his fanciful speculations, we view his work as one tending in a useful direction. Mr. C. H. H. Wright issued in this country a critically revised text of Genesis, with a commentary, about two years ago. With the readings adopted by Mr. Wright, Mr. Boehmer expresses his general agreement, though we have noticed very important deviations from them. But what Mr. Boehmer looks upon as the chief excellence of his text, and in which he considers Mr. Wright's edition as defective, is the distinction that he has therein made, by the use of various type of larger and smaller size, between the portions of the book which he regards as belonging to the first, second, third, and fourth writers respectively. We are promised a more elaborate work in the shape of a German commentary, in which Mr. Boehmer proposes to defend at length the views here propounded.

Throughout his text, Mr. Boehmer has substituted the form יהוה (Yahveh), for the Masoretic יהוה (Jehovah). In this he has gone a step farther than Mr. Wright, who has, in his edition, left the name unpunctuated. Mr. Boehmer is, we think, justified in making this alteration, as there is of late a very general, indeed almost universal, belief, among scholars, that such is the proper vocalisation of that name. Similarly, Mr. Boehmer has ignored the Masoretic form אלהים, naturally punctuating always

But though there are various critical alterations of this kind well carried out in this edition, we regret to say that most of the alterations in the received text, peculiar to Mr. Boehmer, are of a most rash and unauthorised kind, and seem dictated only by a foolish desire to produce something novel and unheard of before. They are sometimes defensible only on the wholesale adoption of his theory of the composition of Genesis, which in its turn rests for support very much, we conceive, upon such readings, thus involving our critic in a vicious circle. Before we direct attention to some of these, we would note that Mr. Boehmer supposes the word "God," throughout chapter ii., to be an addition to the original narrative made by the editor or redacteur of the work in the time of Josiah, who, we are coolly informed in verse 9 of the same chapter, inserted the mention of the tree of life—that verse having, according to Mr. Boehmer, originally stood, as written by the second author, thus: "And out of the ground made the Lord to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food, and in the midst of the garden the tree of good and evil." (We have adopted the translation of our A.V. in order that our readers may the more easily note the difference.) We suppose we shall be informed, in Mr. Boehmer's forthcoming book, that the idea of "a tree of life" was an improvement on the story made by the last editor, as, we observe, he considers verse 20 to have been interpolated by that Jew, and the narrative of the fall to have ended abruptly, in the composition of the second writer at the time of Elisha, with: "And Jehovah made for Adam and his wife coats of skin and clothed them"—the remaining portion, down to chapter v., being considered to be the work of the editor. We ask in vain for any proof to be given us that these things were so; and, notwithstanding that we are sure to be looked upon by Mr. Boehmer as ignorant for making the comment, we must remark that, if this be "higher criticism," it is absolutely worthless. We do not take it for such. We await, with some curiosity, Mr. Boehmer's defence of this position.

As an instance of unauthorised tampering with the text, we refer to chapter xi. 29, from which place, down to the end of chapter xvi., Mr. Boehmer has avowedly, without any MS. authority, altered the names Abram and Sarai into Abraham and Sarah in the portions of that section which he regards as written by the second and third writers—as he views the former names as only used properly in the writings of the first author, and imported from thence by the redacteur into those portions of the other two writers, which he thought worthy of being incorporated into his complete Genesis.

The word מגן, "shield," in ch. xv. 1., he alters into תּוֹמֶנֶת, "a gift," because, as he remarks, Abraham had no need of God's protection after his enemies had been defeated, and it would be more suitable to consider the Lord to have promised to be "a gift" Himself, as Abraham had refused to receive gifts from the King of Sodom. This reading would, no doubt, agree with the parallelism of the passage, but is quite unsupported, since the word מגן, though an admissible form, nowhere occurs, and the authority of the ancient versions and MSS. is entirely in the opposite direction.

In chapter xlix. 22, we have notable alterations. In the first clause Mr. Boehmer reads בֶּן פֶּתֶל twice instead of the Masoretic בֶּן פֶּתֶל, which he would translate "son of a lamb." This alteration, we suppose, is made in order to make the reference to Rachel plainer, as Rachel means "aewe." He supports the vocalisation by a reference to the Syriac, and to the Hebrew פֶּתֶל; but, though admissible, we do not see what he gains by such an alteration, which derives no support from ancient MSS. or versions, since the ordinary reading of the Masorites is easily explicable, as signifying "a wind," and is in perfect harmony with the context. See Mr. Wright's note on the passage.

But it is in the second clause of the verse that Mr. Boehmer proposes the greater alterations. He punctuates the Hebrew בְּנֵי אֶצְרָה עָלֵי שׂוּר, which he explains: "in pascuo adscensus ad montes (Taurum) agnam, Rachel suam, juxta fontem inuenerat." We need not enlarge on the fanciful character of this reading: the construction is most harsh, and leaves unsupplied an awkward ellipsis. The fact said to be asserted, as to the locality where Jacob found Rachel, is not true. And how the word שׂוּר, "an ox," can in Hebrew be made referable to a mountain range, because a high mountain range in Lycia bore the name of Taurus, is not easily divined. We hold that the entire proposed reading is absurd and unsupported.

With all its defects, we would recommend the lovers of Hebraistic studies to peruse Mr. Boehmer's edition of the Book of Genesis. We fancy that, independently of its good points, it is itself the very best refutation of the theory of its editor; for we admire, though we certainly cannot coincide with, the criticism that affects to discover a fragment of the first writer in the latter half of verse 26 of chapter xxv.; of the redacteur himself in the latter half of verse 40 of chapter xxx.; of the second writer in the introductory words, "and Laban said," of verse 48 of chapter xxxi.; as well as in the portion of verse 50 of the same chapter, "No man is with us; see, God is witness between me and thee;" and of verse 53, "The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, the God of their father, judge between us"—the intermediate sentences being considered to have been written by the redacteur himself.

We have no time now to speak of the second work placed at the head of this article, neither does it need a lengthened notice. When we inform our readers that it renders many of the results attained by the labours of the Biblical critics of our time available to the unlearned as well as the learned, we have said sufficient in its praise. Students of the Book of Genesis who desire to know the passages therein which have been amended, as respects translation, by modern scholars, and those who wish for an introduction to such studies, may peruse with profit, as they will with pleasure, Mr. Groves' "Commentary on the Book of Genesis."

Literary Correspondence.

"THE BIBLE FOR THE PANDITS."

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

LETTER II.

Sirs,—Availing myself of your permission to correct, through your columns, certain misconceptions in regard to the "Bible for the Pandits," and to missionary efforts in India generally, I plunge at once in medias res, and take up the Calcutta Review (of September 1860) to begin with.

The Calcutta reviewer (though genial and candid in his criticism, as well as acute) charges me with inconsistency; and I am not at all disposed to let him remain under the impression either that I admit the charge, or that I cannot rebut it. That I have not been able sooner to set myself to the task of reply will not surprise the reviewer; and it matters, moreover, nothing to the question in hand.

The alleged inconsistency is between my "normal practice," as the reviewer calls it, and a passage (in p. xi. of my Introduction) which runs thus:—

Selecting, then, that division of labour which I have marked out, and bearing in mind the philosophical considerations already noticed, which prescribe and justify the "division of labour," I shall confine myself, as hitherto, within its strict limits, and I shall make no idle or disingenuous expenditure of power in seeking to perform, with supererogation, what I do not find wanting. I am content to be blamed for this. I will not, to conciliate favour, consent to betray my trust by harding the slightest chance of disguising or obscuring the desideratum which I insist upon. I address "the head" exclusively, because I find "the heart" too exclusively, and not very successfully, appealed to by others.

The "normal practice" of the commentator, as contradistinguished from the principles supposed to be conveyed in the passage just quoted, is intended to be shown by the reviewer when he says:—

In his Commentary he does appeal (and most justly) to those sentiments of modesty and humility and docility which are indispensable to any profitable examination of moral or religious subjects. He does, also (most reasonably), recommend his pupil to pray to God for His illuminating grace. No sensible, religious-minded man could do otherwise. Why, then, after this spontaneous endeavour to put the heart in a right frame, should our author have allowed himself to accept the Record's view of the impossibility of addressing head and heart simultaneously? Why this supposition of implacable hostility between the intellectual and moral parts of man?

Now the answer to all this is simply, that I never accepted (explicitly or implicitly) any one's view "of the impossibility of addressing head and heart simultaneously." I have expressly declared my belief in the possibility, while at the same time I have declared that my aim is a more limited one. My words, in the page (viz., xii.) immediately following that on which the reviewer animadverts, ought, it seems to me, to have made him cancel the charge which, by anticipation, I had there repelled. The words were these:—

In the list, then, of the kinds of criticism which are of no use to me, I place that which goes upon the assumption that I ought to have proposed to myself some other end than that which I have proposed to myself. My aim is "to satisfy the requirements of a subtle intellect," in the case of my friends the Pandits, as far as, with God's grace, it shall in me lie; and what I invite is criticism suggestive of rectification and improvement in the means employed for the accomplishment of this aim. Counsel in regard to the selection of another aim I shall feel justified in neglecting. It is needless, for instance, to tell me that, granting the utility of what I aim at, still I am more systematically one-sided than those whose alleged onesidedness I object to, and that a book—or rather a complete and congruous theological literature in the languages of India—would be all the more serviceable if it sought to meet the just claims of the head and heart alike. Unquestionably; and I trust—and anticipate—that in God's good time such a body of theological literature will be in the hands of the missionary, and at the service of the Hindu inquirer.

Is there here any assertion of that "impossibility" of addressing head and heart simultaneously, which the reviewer charges me with maintaining? I have declared that it is perfectly possible, but that it is not the task which I felt it my vocation to undertake. The continuation of the paragraph gives my reasons, as follows:—

But the very grandeur and the desirableness of such a prospectively eventual body of theological literature confirm my intention to reserve such strength as I have for that portion of labour which, as I have affirmed, I find unwisely disparaged and practically neglected. I shall at all events have indicated the way in which I think we might, both harmlessly and profitably, attempt, in some measure at least, to "satisfy the requirements of a subtle intellect"—of an intellect which will not enter upon the consideration of the Christian Scriptures with that childlike docility which would be, no doubt, as convenient for the missionary as the "belling of the cat" would have been for Esop's mice—if the cat would only have consented to it.

Having thus shown (as my Introduction ought, I think, already to have shown to the reviewer) that I recognise no incongruity in addressing the head and the heart simultaneously, let me ask—Is there anything wrong in seeking to show the disbeliever that the acknowledged difficulties of the Christian scheme, when submitted to the most searching and dispassionate examination, furnish no ground to justify its rejection? If this can be shown to the reasoner—who, like the Brahmin, regards with absolute indifference our coaxings and our threatenings alike—are we justified in not showing it to him? If the slightest admixture of the pathetic element awakens, in him whom we address, the instant suspicion that we are trying to beguile the judgment through the feelings—and thus places a wall of adamant between our words and the conscience of the man—is it not our bounden duty to deny ourselves (for the nonce) the indulgence of our favourite talent? We can imagine this act of self-denial's being acutely painful to many: actually unendurable, indeed, to one who has no other talent at all, and who is, therefore, "nothing if not pathological;" but then, such an one is precisely the man who is of no earthly use among the Brahmins. Such is the kind of well-meaning, but misplaced, personage who too frequently deforms the missionary reports of India with marvellous accounts of subtle objectors as being silenced and abashed by some felicitous quotation, the relevancy of which is not always patent on the surface. In these cases one cannot help thinking of Esop's picture—as painted by the man—of the combat between the man and the lion. Let us see, for once, how the lion, if entrusted with the pencil, would represent the matter. At p. xl. of the Introduction there occurs the following passage, written by one of the most learned Pandits of Benares, and signed by fourteen others of the élites of the learned world there. It deserves the attention of those entrusted with the drawing up of missionary reports:—

In the newspaper which you showed me [says the Pandit who drew up the document referred to], the writer says that our theories are the results of delusions brought forward by the chief of devils to blind us, and our minds are to be conquered by such peculiarities of discourse as are not employed to satisfy the subtle intellects, on the contrary, which are averse to such intellect. I think perhaps such modes of discourse are meant by "a mouth and a wisdom which their adversaries are not able to gainsay or resist," with which he himself, like missionaries, says that the missionaries are able to silence their opponents. But missionaries mistake our silence. When a reply, which we think nonsense, or not applicable, is offered to us, we think that to retire silently and civilly from such useless discussion is more meritorious than to continue it. But our silence is not a sign of our admission of defeat which the missionaries think to be so. We are not averse to hearing reasons on the side of a religion which our masters hold, and we think that there will be an interest, on the attempt's being fulfilled—which you undertake—to show us, by a Sanskrit Commentary, that Christianity is not so unreasonable as it appears to be when preached without reasons.

Here I stop for the present, for fear of taking up more of your space than you may be inclined to spare me.

Faithfully yours,

India-office Library, August 20, 1861.

THE ALLIANCE AT GENEVA.

M. ADRIEN NAVILLE—the President of the Evangelical Alliance in countries speaking the French language—may congratulate himself upon a great success. For many months he had been labouring indefatigably to secure such a meeting of the Alliance in Geneva, as should be worthy of the city of Calvin, and of the social position enjoyed by many of its earnest professors of Evangelical truth. The result must have surpassed his largest expectations. Multitudes flocked to the assemblies who were not members, and, until this Conference, would scarcely have classed themselves amongst the friends of the Alliance. While some were sincerely desirous of promoting the growth and manifestation of Christian Union, others were attracted by the beauty of the locality, by the celebrity of its modern divines, or the grand historic memories of the past, and some, doubtless, by the novelty of witnessing an orthodox gathering within the cathedral of modern Rationalism. Whatever their motives, they came in crowds. Switzerland sent its most eminent pastors and godly laymen. France was represented by the leading Evangelical pastors, both Established and Free. Dr. Frederic Monod would have been amongst them, had he not been suffering in health. As it was, Grandpierre, St. Hilaire, Fisch, Descombaz, G. Monod, and others, well sustained the character of the Gallic Evangelicals. Italy sent the venerable Moderator of the Vandois Church, the able and devoted pastor of Turin, the President of the Theological College at Florence, and the eloquent and catholic-hearted Mazzarella. Germany had reason to be proud of Krummacher, Herzog, Dörner, and others, who represented her learning, piety, and orthodoxy. Copenhagen and Stockholm sent some of their most earnest Christians; and America, notwithstanding her agonies, spared some faithful men to plead for the prayers of the united brethren. England took a prominent position through the presence of the President of the British Organization of the Alliance, and a little army of its members and friends; and Scotland sent many of the wisest and best, both of the Free and the United Presbyterian Churches.

The hospitality of the Genevose was exercised on a liberal scale, and even those who dissented from Alliance principles, or were indifferent to its objects, yet threw open their homes and their hearts to its members. The weather was resplendent. Day after day the sun shone with a brilliancy unknown in the vapoury atmosphere of more northern climes, and the Lake responded with its brightest blue. A happy spirit reigned amongst the brethren, and altogether it seems to be admitted that the Ecumenical Conference at Geneva was one of the best gatherings of the kind which has been held.

The Genevan Committee deserve credit for their selection of subjects to be discussed, as they were all of vital importance to the Church in the present day. Rationalism and Scepticism, Sabbath Observance and Sunday-schools, Home Missions and Foreign, were all treated by capable and experienced reporters and speakers. The papers will be gathered into a volume, and, when carefully studied, will prove of the highest value. As uttered in the Church of St. Pierre, they failed to impart either pleasure or profit to any except those immediately surrounding the speakers. The gentlemen in the nave and the ladies in the transepts alike stretched their necks and strained their attention in vain. The lofty arches of a cathedral are not favourable to speaking, and few of the orators seemed to be aware that the deliberate and clear enunciation of each word and syllable would convey the sound more intelligibly than the loudest bawling, if rapid and indistinct. In addition to this, many of the papers were unreasonably long, considered in reference to the numbers who were to engage in the afternoon. At that hour a single speaker occupied more than the time allotted to four or five long papers within the prescribed limits. This created a feeling of uneasiness, and some of the best parts of some of the papers were unheeded, because felt to be at least unimportant on the time appropriated to others who in the audience were anxious to hear.

The presentation of such papers may serve to reduce the character of the assemblies in the eyes of the very persons who were at all times anxious that the Alliance should do something. But those who understand the principle and aims of the Alliance feel that no such justification is required. The mere occasion for swelling from active and regular work the meeting is a formal union of those who are engaged in different parts of the Lord's vineyard; the cheering expressions of a generous sympathy; the united utterance of prayer and praise and blessings in themselves. The sense of isolation, with all its depressing influence, generated by exclusive attention to an allotted spot, gives place to a joyful consciousness of union with a vast community, and of co-operation with multitudes in a divine and world-wide work. Jealousies and misapprehensions, which embitter and divide, are repelled by frank and gaily intercourse. Sectarianism is lost in catholicity, and even nationality rises into the higher union of the Universal Church. It may be safely affirmed that those who attended the reunions at Geneva have returned to their countries and their stations baptized afresh with the spirit of Christian Union, invigorated for labour, and animated by a high resolve to guard against offence, and walk in love.

This result would have been secured had not a single paper been read, and had all conferences and discussions been free and extempore. And this is a practical result of the highest benefit to the Church of Christ. Ever keeping this, its proper aim, steadily before it, the Alliance must recommend itself to thoughtful men. The Alliance at Geneva was so conducted as to give no room to the rebuke addressed of old to the Thessalonians, "Study to be quiet and mind your own business."

Besides the general effect experienced by all the nationalities in common, the meetings can hardly fail to exercise a specially beneficial influence on Geneva, Italy, and America.

In Geneva it may be hoped that an impetus will be given to Evangelical religion. The great ability of the pastors of the Oratoire, and the social standing of many of its members, would always redeem Evangelism from contempt in the minds of the citizens, whatever efforts might be made by the National minister to identify "Methodism" with superstition and vulgarity. Within the National Church itself a demand has been rising for something more fervent and impressive than the cold negations of Socinianism, and some of the preachers have endeavoured to meet the demand by adopting a more Evangelical phraseology, even while personally retaining a private rationalistic interpretation. Now the bold ununciation of the essential principles of orthodoxy in the Cathedral itself must give rise to a consideration of these principles; and the assembling from so many countries of able, earnest, and devout men, pledged to maintain those principles as the bond of their union, will make that consideration candid and perhaps favourable. At first, the exclusion of their own ministers from religious gatherings in their own Church may excite a passing irritability, but that very exclusion will force the question—What is it to be a Christian? Is it enough to assert that Christ Jesus the Lord was a wise and good man—a prophet taught of God? or must one believe in His deity, His propitiation, and His gift of the Divine Spirit, to be entitled to the name of His disciple? The agitation of such a question cannot but issue in the extension of the truth.

Another question which the meetings of the Alliance will compel the Genevan pastors and people to agitate is, the true nature of Religious Liberty. In this country, by religious liberty has generally been understood the right of all persons to constitute Churches according to the dictates of their own consciences, and to carry on their worship without impediment from the State, or molestation from society; but by religious liberty the Genevese understand the right of an individual teacher to proclaim his private views in the congregation, even when diametrically opposed to the principles of the Church itself. It is such liberty as is now being claimed amongst ourselves by the Essayists and Reviewers—a liberty to repudiate and oppose Calvinistic teaching while holding office and emolument in Calvinistic Churches. But is this religious liberty? Is it not rather religious lawlessness, which strikes at the very existence of Church life? The agitation of the question may be the beginning of a return to the old paths in the National Church of Geneva.

The Italians are another section of Evangelical Christians who may derive special benefit from the Conference. It is well known that while the Vaudois Church has received a considerable number of converts from amongst the Piedmontese, there are many Italians who are not prepared, on leaving the Church of Rome, to attach themselves to any existing organization. These Italians are generally supposed to be "Plymouth Brethren," opposed to any settled Church organization, or appointed elders, or paid pastors. That some of them are so is indisputable. But others of them have pronounced no judgment on these points. They are waiting until a native pastorate shall be raised up by the Spirit amongst themselves, for the natural development of their assemblies into organised bodies. Between the Italians, as they are denominationally called, and the Vaudois there have been misapprehensions and jealousies, which have been considerably promoted by injudicious British friends reporting to the public press in this country all the little scandal that might be floating about the several communities at Florence or Turin. Now the Alliance afforded an opportunity for personal intercourse between the leading men of both parties, and for a public declaration of their true feelings towards each other. Mazzarella of the Italians, and Meille of the Vaudois, both spoke as became men and Christians; and if the English and Scottish press will but cast all communications tending to divide these brethren into the wastepaper basket, the breach will soon be healed. The old organization and the new will continue, side by side, to labour for the extension of the Gospel, and will practically instruct the whole Italian nation in the great truth, that Christian unity is not an external uniformity, but a unity of spirit subsisting under a great diversity of forms.

Another country may derive some benefit from the Alliance, because it will learn that the deepest sorrow is felt in Europe for the sufferings of America; and it will comprehend, at the same time, the secret of the apparent want of sympathy exhibited by European Christians towards the North in its present struggle with the South. North American Christians see in the strife a grand anti-slavery crusade on their parts for the emancipation of the slave. Had European Christians regarded the strife in this light, their sympathies, their prayers, nay, their active co-operation, would not have been wanting. But to minds on this side of the Atlantic, the struggle of the North seemed to be exclusively for the Union—which appeared to mean the conservation of the slavery of the South by the whole power of the Federal Government, and, amongst other plans for that conservation, the continuance of the Fugitive Slave Law intact. For the abolition of slavery, the enthusiasm of Europe would be awakened; but for a corporate union between the Free States and the Slave, which gives all the strength and character of the Free to the preservation of the Slave States, it is impossible to lift up the voice. Nothing could be more noble than the utterances of the American delegates; and had the American Church all and always spoken in such strains, and had the American Government re-echoed the voice of the Church, England, at least, would have clapped her hands with joy, and our American brethren would have been preserved from the utterance of reproaches which are wholly undeserved.

The meetings afforded occasion for smaller assemblies, many of which were of a deeply interesting character. The saloons of the President were open every evening for social intercourse, and Dr. Merle d'Aubigné held a reception, which was largely attended. Colonel Tronchin gave a déjeuner to about eighty of the members of the Alliance at Bessing, at which a report was read of the Genevan Italian Committee, and addresses delivered by Professor Mazzarella, Prebendary Burgess, Sir C. E. Eardley, Dr. Davis, and others. Many of the English ministers were engaged in preaching in the various chapels and in the open air. Amongst others Mr. Denham Smith, an Independent minister of Dublin, held several revival meetings, which were not unattended with blessing; although his modes of procedure, his confident assertion of the conversion of all who professed to be converted, his assurance of the complete salvation of every convert the moment he said, "I believe Christ died for me," and his teaching that Christ is made to us sanctification in the same manner in which He is made our justification, naturally gave rise, in some minds, to doubt and controversy.

May all that was truly from above be strengthened and confirmed in the hearts of all who were present; and for the rest—may the good Lord pardon the imperfections of His servants, and overrule even their weaknesses to His glory!

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION AT MANCHESTER.

IN our last we said something respecting the forthcoming Conference of Evangelical Christians at Geneva, and in the present number there will be found reports of what was done at that Conference. Now, running almost parallel with the Genevan meetings, there has been a remarkable series of gatherings at Manchester. But what, it may be asked, have we to do with these? Are not matters pertaining to science quite different from matters religious? Is there no danger of secularising your pages, by discussing what took place at the meetings of an association for the advancement of science? We do not intend to give a formal reply to such inquiries, but hope that what we are about to say will be a sufficient answer to them. In the meantime, we only remark that modern science touches on questions closely, yea vitally, connected with religion, and often seriously affecting the Holy Scriptures. Not a few of the memoirs read at the Manchester meetings, for instance, are tantamount to commentaries upon parts of the Bible. Some of them may be friendly to that book, but others may involve statements which are, or seem to be, in opposition to its teachings. Therefore, let it not be said that we are not concerned with the movements of scientific men, for it is a fact that, at the present moment, some of their discussions are of the utmost consequence, as to the truthfulness of the sacred record, as to its meaning, and as to the light in which we are to regard our fellow-men. To some points connected with these questions we shall call attention in what we shall now proceed to say.

We may begin with the address of the learned President, Mr. Fairbairn, in which we meet with the following passage:—

The history of man throughout the gradations and changes which he undergoes in advancing from a primitive barbarism to a state of civilisation, shows that he has been chiefly stimulated to the cultivation of science and the development of his inventive powers by the urgent necessity of providing for his wants and securing his safety. There is no nation, however barbarous, which does not inherit the germs of civilisation, and there is scarcely any which has not done something towards applying the rudiments of science to the purposes of daily life. Among the South Sea Islanders, when discovered by Cook, the Applied Sciences—if I may use the term—were not entirely unknown. They had observed something of the motions of the heavenly bodies, and watched with interest their revolutions, in order to apply this knowledge to the division of time. They were not entirely deficient in the construction of instruments of husbandry, of war, and of music. They had made themselves acquainted with the rudiments of shipbuilding and navigation in the construction and management of their canoes. Cut off from the influence of European civilisation, and deprived of intercourse with higher grades of mind, we still find the inherent principle of progression exhibiting itself, and the inventive and reasoning powers developed in the attempt to secure the means of subsistence. Again, if we compare man as he exists in small communities with his condition where large numbers are congregated together, we find that densely-populated countries are the most prolific in inventions, and advance most rapidly in science. Because the wants of the many are greater than those of the few, there is a more vigorous struggle against the natural limitations of supply, a more careful husbanding of resources, and there are more minds at work. This fact is strikingly exemplified in the history of Mexico and Peru; and its attestation is found in the numerous monuments of the past which are seen in Central America, where the remains of cities and temples, and vast public works, erected by a people endowed with high intellectual acquirements, can still be traced. There have been discovered a system of canals for irrigation; long mining galleries cut in the solid rock in search of lead, tin, and copper; pyramids not unlike those of Egypt; earthenware vases and cups, and manuscripts containing the records of their history—all testifying to so high a degree of scientific culture and practical skill, that, looking at the cruelties which attended the conquests of Cortes and Pizarro, we may well hesitate as to which had the stronger claims on our sympathy, the victors or the vanquished.

It will be noticed that this paragraph speaks of "the gradations and changes which man undergoes in advancing from a primitive barbarism to a state of civilisation." This allusion to "primitiva barbarism" at once provokes inquiry. Have we any right whatever to assume that such was the original condition of man, and that from it he emerged into a state of civilisation? Certainly the Bible does not suggest the idea that Adam was created in a state of barbarism, and there is nothing in the early portions of Genesis to encourage such a notion. There is very much which leads us to the contrary conclusion, or at least to the belief that if the wants of the first men were few, if their scientific attainments were small, and if their mode of life was simple, they were not barbarians. How could they be barbarians with the knowledge of God, and the privilege of worshipping and communing with Him? The truth appears to be, that barbarism was a secondary, and not a normal condition, and that human depravity was the cause of the intellectual, moral, and social degeneracy of after ages. It is quite certain that the state of nations has varied, and that those who were once civilised have become barbarous. Mr. Fairbairn may speak of the "inherent principle of progression," but he can find no case in history in which a nation has become civilised apart from foreign influences. We speak only of those nations the origin of whose civilisation can be traced. There are many cases of spontaneous degeneracy; none of spontaneous civilisation. And this fact confirms us in our belief that the Bible is a faithful record. This theory of "primitive barbarism" ought to have no place among us, because it is not proved that barbarous tribes are in their primitive condition, and because the Scriptures lead us to believe that savages have become such by the regular operation of moral depravity through a long course of ages. In connexion with this subject, it is worthy of notice, that the preservation of the worship of the true God among the Jews has preserved them from barbarism; and that wherever the Gospel has been planted, it has put an end to barbarism.

There is nothing else in Mr. Fairbairn's splendid address which here calls for especial remark, and we only allude to this point to show how, by the incautious use of language, sceptics may be supplied with an argument, and Christians led to fear that science and the Bible do not agree.

We pass over many highly-interesting papers to call attention to those in which light is thrown upon distant countries and strange nations, hereafter, if not now, to be the theatre of missionary enterprise. The information thus conveyed is important, because it enables us to know beforehand the character of a territory, and the habits, &c., of its inhabitants. Thus, for instance, M. du Chaillu, the gorilla-hunter, read a paper on the geographical features and natural history of a hitherto unexplored region of Western Equatorial Africa. He is reported to have said that this singular region explored by him during the years 1856-7-8-9, lay within two degrees on either side of the equator, and extended for 400 miles into the interior. Having described its physical features, its partly swampy, partly mountainous character, and its dense forests, which ascend to the very tops of the mountains, its rivers—the Muni, the Moondah, and the Gaboon—all rising in the range of mountains known as the Sierra del Crystal, sixty or eighty miles from the west; also the Nazareth, the Mexias, and the Fernand-vas—the latter chiefly fed by the Ogobai, and this last fed by the Rembo Ngouyai and the Rembo Okanda—the traveller, reverting to the mountains, said :—

Judging from my own examinations, and from the most careful inquiries among the people of the far interior, I think there is good reason to believe that an important mountain range divides the continent of Africa nearly along the line of the equator, starting from the west from the range which runs along the coast north and south, and ending in the east, probably in the country south of the mountains of Abyssinia, or perhaps terminating abruptly to the north of the lake Tanganyika of Captains Burton and Speke.

To the existence of this range, and of the flat, wooded, damp country at its foot, he attributed the fact that Mohammedanism had never in Africa spread south of the equator.

Another interesting paper was that read by Professor Owen, F.R.S., on the natives of the Andaman Islands, lying to the west of Siam, in the Bay of Bengal. The Professor gave in this paper a condensed account of the physical characters and habits of the natives, from the official reports of the superintendents of the convict settlements established by the East India Government, and from the statement of one of the Brahmin Sepeys who were expatriated to these islands after the Indian Mutiny in 1857 :—

The diminutive black aborigines of these islands, not exceeding five feet in stature, have no notion of a Deity, of spiritual beings, or of a future state; both sexes go naked, without any sense of shame. No human beings are lower in the scale of civilisation than the Mincopie of the Andaman Islands, although the accusation of cannibalism brought against them is unfounded. Their chief weapons are bows and arrows, and they practise tattooing and scarification with pieces of glass and iron which are cast ashore from the wrecks. Their sight far exceeds that of ordinary Europeans or Hindoos. Their only arts consist in spinning ropes and making wicker-baskets.

With regard to this paper and that of M. du Chaillu, who describes the habits and character of the gorilla, we may add an observation or two. According to some recent sceptical writers, man is but a development of some inferior animal. Now, probably no mere brute so nearly resembles man as the gorilla does, yet he is but a brute after all, with neither speech nor reason; and the President is said to have remarked that the gorilla was the king of all monkeys—though, by-the-by, Professor Owen had shown that his brain was smaller than that of the smallest chimpanzee. Professor Owen, in his observations on the Andamans, expressed himself to this effect :—

Their cranial structure exhibited most analogy to the Asiatic races, but not the smallest approach to the gorilla or chimpanzee. In many European types an equal amount of cranial degradation could be observed to that offered by the Mincopie; and the observations of the Professor were chiefly directed against the theory that any general constant laws could be predicated respecting the peculiarities of the skulls of different nations. Had it not been known that the skull under consideration was that of an Andaman cannibal, the supposition might have been entertained that it belonged to a stunted and diminutive individual of some of the more debased European types.

We are therefore justified in concluding that, however perfect the organisation of the gorilla may be, it is in the one great point, that of the brain and skull, separated from the lowest types of the human race by an immense gulf. So that, apart from reason and speech, even the physical relations of the gorilla to man are most distant, and no connecting link between man and the brute has yet been discovered. Here then, again, science is the minister and interpreter of the Word of God.

In the department of zoology and botany, Mr. H. Fawcett produced a paper on the work of Mr. Darwin, the well-known advocate of the production of new species by natural processes. The main aim of this essay was to prove the theory of Mr. Darwin not illogical; in other words, that it is reasonable to believe in the introduction of new species without a creative act. We thoroughly sympathise with the views of the Right Hon. J. R. Napier, who wished to oppose this scheme on scriptural grounds, but was prevented. We so far sympathise with him, at least, as to believe that it is opposed to Scripture, and that both cannot be true. At the same time, we do not fear investigation, and we feel satisfied that when Mr. Darwin and his followers have done their best, the old doctrine will stand. It is, we confess, with somewhat akin to astonishment, that we notice the pertinacity with which these gentlemen ply their task, and labour to prove that man is but the descendant of the monkey tribe. This is their highest ambition, and we do not envy them. Hitherto they have only succeeded in building upon theory, and we are assured that their supposed facts will never be so multiplied as to overthrow the Biblical record of an original and independent creation of man. Not that there is any ground for apprehension that many will be led astray. Even if Professor Owen had not pointed out the striking differences which exist between man and the gorilla, there is the great fact, already alluded to, that the gorilla is a brute, and that he is without the slightest traces of what man is, as man. There is no faculty of speech, nor reason sufficient to devise any means for bettering his condition. The gorilla never kindled a fire, nor clothed himself from the cold. He has no moral sense, he has no religious instinct. He is not even a gregarious, but a solitary animal, clothed with long brown hair, and as savage in his disposition as he is terrible in his aspect. We may then safely dismiss the subject, and wait till the advocates of development are furnished with better facts and arguments against the Bible record.

But the collision which appeared between men of science and the Scriptures was not confined to these two points. At the meeting of Monday, Sept. 9, Mr. J. Craufurd read a paper to the Geographical and Ethnological Section, "On the Antiquity of Man, from the Evidence of Language." Probably the author of the essay on the "Education of the World" would have found something in this production to gratify him, for if he has not advocated a development of man from some other animal, he has advocated a development from a very low and imperfect condition. Mr. Craufurd, in fact, defended one phase of the development theory akin to the one which Mr. Fairbairn seemed to favour, when he spoke of "primitive barbarism." This paper abounded in fallacies, and we are glad to know that it was not allowed to pass unchallenged. The speaker said at the outset "that the period usually assigned for man's first appearance on earth necessarily dated only from the time when he had attained such an amount of civilisation as to enable him to frame some record of his own career, and took no account of the many ages which must have transpired before he could have attained that power." Here we have a hypothesis set forth as an unquestionable fact. "The period usually assigned for man's first appearance," is the period of his actual creation, as recorded in Genesis, and has nothing to do with long previous ages, during which man was unable to record his movements. Apart, however, from the Bible, the theory is absurd, inasmuch as even barbarous tribes have, by tradition and other means, preserved a record of their experience more or less correct, and reaching far back. As to the amount of civilisation required for such a record, it is not much, because, as we have just observed, many savage tribes have had and still have ancient traditions. Perhaps Mr. Craufurd refers to the art of writing, but even he says what sufficiently refutes his opinion, although what he says is not true. He is reported to have stated that "The poems of Homer, composed before the invention of letters, were as perfect Greek as any that was ever after written." We will not quarrel with him about the perfection of Homer's Greek, but we ask by what authority he says Homer's poems were composed before the invention of letters? Were these poems the composition of one man at all?

or of one age; and if they were, when? Certainly not before the fall of Troy, and in all human probability not more than a thousand years before Christ. And was this before the invention of letters? Why, there are books in India, and there are portions of the Old Testament, far older than this. Not only so, there are in our museums and cabinets inscriptions from Assyria which were written before Homer was born. It is, we know, a common thing to say that Homer knew nothing of writing, but even this is not so easily proved, as the following fact will show: In the sixth book of the Iliad, Homer makes Glaucus relate his family history, in the course of which he says that Proetus refused to slay Bellerophon, when his wife wished him to do so, but sent him to Lycia to her father-in-law. Before he left, Proetus entrusted him with a "folded tablet," upon which he had written, in "fatal characters," many things which might work his ruin; and charged him to give it up on his arrival. The unsuspecting Bellerophon conveyed the missive, which was received by his entertainer, who waited till the tenth day before he asked to see the document. Bellerophon was forthwith exposed to a series of perils, in which it was hoped he would fall, without bringing upon his host the suspicion of having violated the rights of hospitality. There are obscurities in this account we admit, but it proves to demonstration that the author knew of the use of written characters, and that he regarded them as by no means of recent origin. It is of little consequence whether the "signs" σήματα were alphabetical or hieroglyphical; the king is described as having "written them on a folded tablet"—γράφας ἐν πλίνακι πτυκτῷ. Here then we have Homer attesting that, several generations before the siege of Troy, writing was known in Argos and in Lycia. Yet Mr. Craufurd tells the British Association for the Advancement of Science that Homer's poems were composed before the invention of letters! The truth is, that even if Homer had not named the art of writing, it would have proved nothing, because his plot did not require it. The "Paradise Lost" of Milton probably contains almost as few allusions to the art of writing as does the Iliad itself.

To return to Mr. Craufurd, who pointed to the formation of language as one of the many facts which attested the high antiquity of man. Language, he said, was not innate, but adventitious—a mere acquirement, having its origin in the superiority of the human understanding. The prodigious number of languages was given as a proof that language was not innate, and their extraordinary differences were strongly insisted upon. With regard to language not being innate, that is not the question, for we all know perfectly well that a child brought up apart from other human beings would be a savage, and would have no perfect language. The question is, how long the race of men remained without language, and whence they obtained it. Plain Christians are satisfied with the Bible narrative, which records the fact that the first man was endowed, not only with intellect, but with the use of speech. Our philosophers, however, shut up the Bible, and try to discover the history of language in its present forms and modern changes. The phenomena have convinced some of them that "the first rudiments of language must have consisted of a few articulate sounds, in the attempts made by the speechless, but social savages, to make their wants and wishes known to each other; and from those first efforts, to the times in which language had attained the completeness which they found it to have reached among the rudest tribes ever known to us, countless ages must be presumed to have elapsed." What shall we say to this? Here is a gentleman who says countless ages must be presumed to have elapsed from the first introduction of language to its appearance in the rudest forms we know! All this is mere assertion, and does not weigh a feather; would, indeed, not be worth notice if it had not been propounded at Manchester the other day. We have written documents which we know were composed not less than 3,300 years ago, and as they represent not one of the rudest, but one of the most artificial forms of language, it is impossible to imagine how far back Mr. Craufurd would go to look for its first rudiments. The truth is, however, that he is no philologist, whatever he may think, and is in error on his fundamental theory. He looks upon language as a tree which springs from a small seed and gradually grows and extends, and becomes remarkable for symmetry and beauty. Facts are against this. Languages appear primarily not to have grown like a tree, but to have been cast like a statue. In all languages which can be called primitive, this seems to have been the case. Like Mercury, whom the ancients fable to have sprung into the world full grown, and fully armed, so language. It is impossible, of course, to say what language was spoken before the flood of Noah; some say Hebrew, but in truth no one knows. To appeal to the names of the antediluvians as Hebrew, proves nothing, because they may all be translations. Our only safe starting-point for the history of languages, is the Plain of Shinar, just as our only safe starting-point for their origin is the Garden of Eden. From Eden a voice comes which tells us that when God made man, He made him able to hold converse with his Maker; but Mr. Craufurd's school want us to believe that man existed for "countless ages" before he could use his "tongue, the glory of his frame," in prayer and praise to God! We stand aghast at such profane trifling—science we will not call it. Again, a voice comes to us from Shinar, and tells us that, by an act of special intervention, God introduced diversities of speech. But the new philologists tell us that these diversities "imply a separate and distinct creation for each tongue." Now, which shall we listen to, the book or the man of science? They both profess to account for the origin and diversities of human speech; only the book was written 3,300 years ago, and the man of science lives now. The one was much nearer the events it records, the other believes that he has still greater advantages. Well, then, we abide by the book, and we will mention a reason or two why we do so: 1. As to the origin of language; it gives a far more rational account of the fact than is supplied by the theory of growth. 2. As to the diversities of language; it will be seen in Genesis that these were at first, probably, but few, and that they are accounted for by an adequate cause. All who believe in a personal God, as the Ruler and Director of the world, must believe in the possibility of a miracle; and all such must believe that the confusion, or rather the multiplication, of languages, could have originated as reported by Moses. We do not mean that no languages have been formed since, but what we mean is, that they have been mainly fashioned out of existing materials, and have been more the modifications of language than positive additions to it. Take the English of the present day as an example, and after careful analysis you will scarcely find a new word in it. It has borrowed from half the languages under heaven, and it has new moulded and clothed with a Saxon uniform its noble array of foreign words. But it has created almost nothing. It has destroyed more than it has created. This destruction has been threefold at least—of grammatical inflexions, which become fewer and simpler; of words which have fallen out of use; and of idioms or peculiar combinations. The materials out of which our most admirable language is formed are known to be older than the language itself. We can anatomise it, and refer its elements to their sources, just as an architect can say from what quarries the various marbles of a splendid palace have been brought. The same process is applicable to many other languages, to such an extent, that the best modern philologists trace them all to three or four sources. Such a fact is worth all the theories in the world, and furnishes a striking corroboration of the Biblical narrative. It is, moreover, an incontrovertible proof of what we say, that languages are made, and do not grow.

With regard to the parent stocks from which derived languages have come, we said that they were cast like a statue, and did not grow like a tree. We cannot illustrate this at length, but we may mention a fact or two. One great fact is, that the most ancient languages are highly artificial and complicated; another is that those very languages in course of time became more simple. The Hebrew is very ancient, but in the progress of ages it lost some of its finer and more delicate features. The Sanskrit is more artificial and minute in its details than its modern descendants. The Greek underwent a similar change, as is shown by its contractions, and the rejection of old forms. The English is less furnished with grammatical inflexions than was either Norman French, or Anglo-Saxon. All the languages which come from the Latin abound in changes by which facility of utterance is purchased at the expense of old forms. Even the Latin itself, in its classical purity, is known to have undergone a like modification. In every case, the nearer we come to the source, the more perfect and minute is the organization. It will be seen at a glance how utterly this is opposed to the theory of growth and development, from the rude utterances of men but little better than brutes, to the elaborate systems and perfect structure of Sanskrit, Hebrew, or Greek. Equally plain it is, that facts rightly viewed are in harmony with the Bible, which represents languages as originally given by the will and act of God. We cannot stop to explain the bearing of all this upon the unity of the human race, and its common origin, as set forth in that same marvellous Book.

Mr. Craufurd had it not all his own way. Mr. Gresswell placed the matter in its true light when he affirmed that, "instead of advancing, language had changed in the way of degradation." Dr. Hincks also pointed out the fact that all our inquiries tend to confirm the idea that the different languages had a common origin. Other speakers made additional remarks, and we hope proved that the views of Mr. Craufurd are untenable.

There were many subjects discussed by the British Association in which the philanthropist and the Christian are interested, and we have no doubt their discussion will do good. It is an advantage to allow speculative men to come forward and publish their speculations, however erroneous they may be, because an opportunity is afforded for canvassing and refuting them. When those speculations are favourable to truth, they are made known, and stand a fair chance of adoption. To record the progress of science, and the discoveries of travellers, is an unmixed benefit; and we cannot be too thankful that by their means so much has been done to promote the present and future welfare of the world. But, to end where we began, after all, the objects aimed at by the British Association, and the subjects discussed, dwindle into insignificance, compared with the aims and conferences of the Geneva Congress, which has inscribed upon its banner, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and goodwill towards man."

THE TRUE TITLE TO EARTHLY BLESSINGS.

IN what sense may the Christian understand the announcement, "The world is yours?" If not literally, yet in this sense may the world be said to belong to the Christian, that he only has a legitimate title to the benefits and blessings he enjoys in it. Return to God, let your soul be brought back into living union with the Father of spirits through His dear Son, and thenceforward the world will become yours, because you are God's. In harmony with the Great Centre, you will be in harmony with all things in His universe. Nature will serve him who serves her God; and all her varied power and agencies will rejoice to obey the behests and minister to the welfare of one who is the loved and loving child of their great Master and Lord. The earth will be fulfilling its proper function in yielding you bread, and the heavens in shedding their sweet influences on your path. For you the morning will dawn and the evening descend. For you "the winds will blow, earth rest, heavens move, and fountains flow." You will be able to claim a peculiar property in the works of your Father's hand, and the bounties of your Father's providence. You will have served yourself heir to Him who is the Universal Proprietor, and become "heir of God and joint-heir with Christ." And so "the world," and the fulness thereof, will become "yours," because "ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."—Dr. Caird.

Foreign Intelligence.

WONDERFUL as are the achievements of the modern printing press, it is yet inadequate to the reproduction of the varied phases of thought and emotion which must be called forth at any such gathering as that which has lately taken place at Geneva. We have done our best, however, to secure for our readers a faithful, and, as far as allowed by our space—which this month is greatly extended—a full report of the proceedings. The most conscientious care has been taken in its preparation, to which several hands have contributed. To notice at length every paper read, and every speech delivered, was, of course, impossible; but we have endeavoured to select the most important. It is scarcely necessary to solicit notice of any in particular. The attention of the reader cannot fail to be arrested by the paper of Professor Rosseeuw St. Hilaire, on Irreligion and Immorality among the Peasantry and Operatives of France; by that of Dr. Merle D'Aubigné, on Geneva and the Genevan Reformation; and by that of Dr. de Pressensé, on Religious Liberty. One or two speakers we have been compelled to dismiss with a brief mention, to whom, next month, we hope to do justice by a full report or a copious abstract.

Our French correspondent continues to keep a vigilant watch upon the doings of the Pope and his myrmidons. There is a novelty announced in the way of brotherhoods. We have our cadet members of Rifle Corps; and somewhat similar in relation to the main body of the monkish orders seem to be Pio Nono's "little domestics." The appointment of M. Colani, a rationalist, to a theological professorship at Strasburg, has given rise to a keen controversy.

The letters from Italy give recent information of what is doing in different departments of labour in the South. Our readers will not fail to observe the testimony to Gavazzi's disinterestedness and self-denial.

From the North of Europe we have two communications; one of which presents a report of the proceedings of the assembly of the Scandinavian Churches, held at Christiania. The other relates to the Schleswig-Holstein question.

The missionary intelligence from China informs us of the baptism of the first native convert at Tien-tsin. We regret to observe that Protestant missionaries are forbidden to enter Peking, while no such restriction is placed upon Roman Catholics.

We regret to announce most mournful tidings from Polynesia. The Rev. George N. Gordon, one of our correspondents, who had laboured for some years as a missionary in Erromanga, has, with his wife, fallen a victim to the ferocity of the natives of that island. In connexion with the account we now give, our readers will do well to turn to Mr. Gordon's last letter (Evan. Chris., September, 1861: p. 549).

FRANCE.

Paris, September, 1861.

OPINIONS OF THE FRENCH PRESS UPON THE ROMAN QUESTION.

I referred in my previous letter to the hesitation of our Government respecting the temporal power of the Papacy. This is one aspect of that question; but there is another equally important: What is the public sentiment with respect to the Roman question? and what is the attitude of the French press on this grave subject?

It is an indubitable fact that the great majority of enlightened French citizens are becoming more and more desirous that Rome should be evacuated by our soldiers. No doubt, in certain ignorant provinces, such as Lower Brittany, the peasantry make common cause with the priests on this question. The aristocratic classes, in general, maintain the cause of the Roman Government for political reasons. There are also some old partisans of the Orleans Dynasty (M. Guizot, for example) who would blame the departure of our troops from a spirit of contradiction and opposition. But these different categories of defenders of the temporal Papacy constitute but a feeble minority. The majority of the men who exert any influence on the sentiments of the nation are of an altogether opposite opinion. This fact has recently been confirmed by the appearance of a pamphlet entitled, "The Emperor, Rome, and Italy." Public opinion has warmly approved the conclusions of the author, which are to the effect that the Roman people themselves should have accorded to them the right of pronouncing, by universal suffrage, on the maintenance or the fall of the temporal authority.

Of the Paris press, only four journals—the Gazette de France, the Monde, the Union, and L'Ami de la Religion—plead on behalf of the Roman Government. These prints have but few subscribers, and little reputation. Their readers are principally recruited from the ranks of the priests and the nobles. Their sympathies are in the direction of the Pretender, Henry the Fifth. This fact should put Napoleon the Third upon his guard, and induce in him serious reflections. The advocates of the Pope's temporal power are the enemies of the Napoleonic Dynasty, and would deprive it of the crown, if they were the stronger. How then can the Emperor hesitate so much?

The Liberal press, with unanimous voice, demands, by its most moderate organs equally with others, that Rome should at length be given back to the keeping of Italians. I may specify the Journal des Débats, the Siccle, the Presse, the Opinion Nationale, the Courrier du Dimanche, the Revue des Deux Mondes, &c., &c. Most certainly these journals are opposed to each other on many questions, but they perfectly agree in demanding the prompt evacuation of the Pontifical States by our troops. Is not this a proof that they express the true wishes of France, and so much the more as the number of their subscribers is very considerable? With respect to the Ministerial journals, the Constitutionnel, the Patrie, the Pays, they are much embarrassed, and their fluctuations are sometimes visible. As they must await the word of command from the Government, they know not either what they may concede, nor what it becomes them to refuse. When the breath of the Imperial Cabinet blows on the side of the Italians, this portion of the press attacks the conduct of the Cardinals. But soon the state of the atmosphere is changed, and the same journals apologise for the Pontifical authority. In the midst of these variations, the poor editors have an uncertain step, and an obscure utterance, and the perpetual confusion of their ideas provokes cutting sarcasms.

In brief, the equivocal situation of the Emperor and of his Ministers cannot much longer continue. The Italians are beginning to lose patience. The French are somewhat ashamed of the part which is assigned them. Our officers at Rome are wearied and dissatisfied with lending the support of their arms to the Cardinals, who give them no other recompense than ingratitude and disdain. It would seem that occult influences—specially that of the Empress Eugenie, who is herself ruled by the suggestions of the priests—are doing their utmost to retard the critical moment. But this is simply a question of time. Napoleon III. will be morally constrained shortly to yield to the double pressure of France and of Italy.

THE POPE'S "PETITS DOMESTIQUES" SOCIETY.

Whilst thus awaiting the decision of the Imperial Government, the Popish clergy have recourse to all the means imaginable for increasing their reputation with the inferior classes. They are multiplying, under the most different forms, the associations of St. Vincent de Paul, the brotherhoods of workmen, the schools of the Brethren of the Christian Doctrine, convents, both of men and women, affiliated societies of lay devotees, and so of the rest. Recently, a Parisian journal has discovered a new clerical institution, styled "La Société des Petits Domestiques du Pape." Every one has naturally inquired, Who are these "petits domestiques" of the Pope? Has Pius IX. need to seek in France for new domestics? And to what service will they be called?

The founder of this association has written a long letter, to explain his ideas and his object. The little domestics of the Pope will not be domestics in the proper signification of the word, but in a figurative sense: "That is to say" (I quote the words of the letter), "they will be devoted to the [Roman] Catholic Church, founded by Jesus Christ, of which the Pope is, and always will be, the visible head, and the head the more venerated, in proportion as he is outraged, as he is at present." These domestics are chosen at the age of twelve years; they must be orphans, deprived alike both of father and mother. These details suffice to reveal the spirit of this new institution. The Pope's little domestics are carefully chosen at a very tender age, in order that they may be absolutely subject to clerical action. They must no longer have a father or a mother, for fear the language of the parents should contradict that of the priests. Should such an association include a great number of adherents, it is clear that the French society would speedily receive an infusion of bigots and fanatics, always ready blindly to execute the orders of the sacerdotal body. These little domestics of the Pope would resemble the brigands of the kingdom of Naples, who commit the most atrocious crimes, with the belief that they are defending the interests of God Himself.

Happily, the good sense of the public will rightly appreciate these attempts at perversion. It is probable that the Pope will not obtain many domestics of this sort in our country; but this strange association proves that clerical institutions must be subjected to an active and severe surveillance. What a sad spectacle to see charity itself, that sublime duty, enjoined by God the Saviour, becoming a pretext for selfish calculations, and serving as a cloak for evil passions! Could not the ministers of the Roman Church receive and educate orphans without making them the domestics of the Pope? But the fact is that they place their interests of caste far above the virtues which the Gospel recommends.

PUBLIC ATTACKS OF A PRIEST UPON THE GOVERNMENT.

There has recently occurred at Chinon, near Tours, in the department of Indreet-Loire, an event which has produced a painful sensation. The occasion was the day of an important distribution of rewards in the school of the Brethren of the Christian Doctrine. The sub-prefect, the chief judge, the procureur imperial, the mayor—in a word, all the civil functionaries—all the magistrates of Chinon—were present at the meeting. A certain abbé, named Bordeaux, had undertaken the task of delivering the opening discourse. Simple decency would have required that this priest should abstain from all attack on the policy of the Government. The fête was got up only for the children. The authorities, who honoured the assembly with their presence, might surely be allowed to suppose beforehand that their sentiments would not be wounded! But the Abbé Bordeaux, who aspired, apparently, to the glory and to the crown of a martyr, had chosen this precise occasion to utter violent invectives against the emancipation of Italy, and even against the Emperor. "The Revolution," said he, amongst other things, "after having turned France upside down, has invaded Italy. . . . It has enrolled, under its sinister and bloody standard, the sectaries and impious men of all countries, the journalists, the diplomatists, the politicians, the statesmen, the kings, and the Cæsars; it advances, armed with swords and rifled cannon. . . . But the Revolution will be overcome: its ruin is approaching and irremediable." You may judge how great was the scandal. The sub-prefect and all the other functionaries did not await the conclusion of the ceremony; they immediately quitted the hall, giving tokens of profound discontent. The parents, the children, all were agitated and troubled. There was no distribution of prizes. The Abbé Bordeaux was summoned to appear before the tribunal of Chinon, on the charge of having offended the Emperor, and excited the people against the Government. The priest made pitiable excuses, alleging that his words applied, not to the campaign of Italy, but to some isolated combats between the Pontifical troops and those of the King Victor Emmanuel. The judges were not the dupes of these false allegations. "Considering," said the sentence, "that the Abbé Bordeaux is the more culpable, inasmuch as he has not hesitated to teach the pupils of a Christian school a lesson of contempt for the Sovereign and for public institutions, the Court condemns him to six months' imprisonment and a fine of 500f." The priests, in fact, must learn that they are subject to the common laws of the country.

THE TRADE IN MASSES, AND OTHER SOURCES OF PROFIT TO THE CLERGY.

Another affair, presenting some curious particulars respecting the means employed by certain Roman ecclesiastics to obtain money, has been decided by the Court of First Instance at Paris. The Abbé Vidal is an able and intriguing man. As he possessed some reputation, he established several journals, such as the "Ecclesiastical Conferences," the "Parochial Missionary," the "Auxiliary of the Clergy in Town and Country," &c. These publications were not very successful. What did the Abbé Vidal then do? He thought he would set up a traffic in masses. You are aware that, according to the ordinances of the Papal Church, payment is made for the masses sung by the priests for the deliverance of souls from purgatory. Each mass costs about one franc. There are priests who have not the time to celebrate all the masses which are proposed to them. The Abbé Vidal conceived the idea of paying them for these intended masses at a third or fourth part of the price, whilst promising to confide them to other priests. But instead of executing his engagement, he put the money into his purse, and thirty or forty thousand intended masses remained in his hands without being celebrated. This was a manifest robbery. The relations had supplied the funds for these masses, which were never pronounced! At the same time, the Abbé Vidal founded a savings-bank, and endeavoured to obtain depositors by means of imaginary advantages and delusive guarantees. His prospectuses were filled with unworthy falsehoods. Credulous people remitted to him their savings, and lost the whole. The judges have pronounced on him also a severe sentence. The Abbé Vidal has been condemned to three years' imprisonment, and five years' suspension of his civil rights. The defenders of the Papacy say that this is an individual fact, and that it is not just to deduce from it general conclusions. Granted. Let us note, however, that payment for masses is established by the discipline of Rome, and that this pecuniary undertaking easily enabled the Abbé Vidal to conduct a dishonourable traffic with intended masses. The first fault lies with the Church of Rome.

DOGMATIC CONTROVERSIES IN THE LUTHERAN CHURCH.

You have often been furnished, in my letters, with melancholy details respecting the new theology which has invaded the Calvinian communion of France. The same disorder must be referred to as existing amongst the Lutherans of our country. The members of this Church are very numerous at Strasburg and in Alsace; they have also a numerous congregation at Paris. The Lutherans of Strasburg maintain constant relations with Germany, and several have adopted those rationalistic opinions, which exert so fatal a sway beyond the Rhine. The ascendancy of this anti-Evangelical spirit has been manifested by a fact respecting which I must give you some information. A professorship of theology was vacant in the Protestant seminary of Strasburg, and the Directory or Superior Council of the Lutherans appointed M. Colani to this post. M. Colani is the chief editor of a theological review, the opinions of which are also negative, and perhaps even more hardly than those of the authors of the "Essays and Reviews." Undoubtedly M. Colani is a man of talent, of learning, and of very honourable character. His intellectual and moral qualities are not in any way disputed. But that is not the question. The point is whether a chair of theology should be open to a teacher who rejects the doctrines of original sin, the Divinity of Jesus Christ, the expiatory sacrifice of the Redeemer, the Divine and complete inspiration of the Bible—in a word, the essential articles of the faith. What will ensue? The future pastors of the Lutheran communion will be brought up by a man who is in flagrant disagreement with Luther and the Confession of Augsburg. You should note, moreover, that it has always been the practice, amongst the French Lutherans, to demand from their pastors an engagement to respect the fundamental points of that Confession; and nevertheless, M. Colani, who has publicly attacked those fundamental points, is named professor of the Protestant seminary! What a contradiction, what an offensive anomaly!

This election has, in addition, aroused a vehement controversy. M. Hosemann, a Lutheran pastor at Paris, a pious and zealous man, has written a pamphlet, in which, after having quoted numerous extracts from the writings of M. Colani, he demands whether such a theologian can legitimately be entrusted with the preparation of young students for the holy ministry. All the other Lutheran pastors of Paris have given in their adhesion to the courageous protest of M. Hosemann.

M. Colani has essayed to reply, but his apology is singular. He attempts to prove that his ideas are in accordance with the spirit, the method, and the doctrines of the Confession of Augsburg! In truth, this cannot be serious! It is unquestionable that if Luther and Melancthon, the authors of that Confession, were still living, and could be acquainted with the negations of M. Colani, they would declare him a heretic and infidel. The new professor announces I know not what religion for the future, far more remote from Lutheranism than Lutheranism itself was from Popery. M. Colani is persuaded of it in his inmost conviction. How then can he pretend that he still admits the fundamental points of the Confession of Augsburg? There are, connected with all these matters, designed equivocations, which it is high time should be renounced. Let every one say plainly, without subterfuge or mental reservation, what he believes or what he disbelieves! The Church will then judge between the contending parties.

EXACT INFORMATION RESPECTING THE PROTESTANT SCHOOLS OF THE HAUTE-VIENNE.

You announced in your last number (page 528) that the Academic Council of the department of the Haute-Vienne had authorised the opening of the Protestant schools. This intelligence is correct, but the affair is not yet concluded. The principal organ of the Government, the Constitutionnel, has published several articles, in which it undertakes to justify the acts of the authorities. This is a difficult and ungrateful task; for the rights of religious liberty have been positively violated in the department of the Haute-Vienne. Other journals blame the condition imposed on the teachers, to receive into their schools only the children of their co-religionists. This reproach is just; for a formal provision of the law permits fathers of families to choose for their children the schools which they prefer. Let us hope that the Government will at length give the example of respect for legal ordinances. X. X. X.

Evangelical Alliance.

FOURTH GENERAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS OF ALL NATIONS, AT GENEVA.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 1.

In accordance with the announcements which have repeatedly appeared in these pages, the Fourth General Conference of Evangelical Christians from all parts of the world, convened by the French Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, was opened at Geneva at the commencement of the month. On Sunday, September 1, at five p.m., a prayer-meeting was held in the hall of the Rive Droite, which was crowded to overflowing. Earnest prayer was offered by different brethren in French, English, and German, that the Divine blessing might rest upon the sittings of their large assembly. M. BARDE, of the National Church of Geneva, presided, and the Rev. Daniel Wilson, Vicar of Islington, was among those who led the devotions. It was intimated that a meeting of the same kind would be held daily, at seven a.m.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 2.

MORNING MEETING.

OPENING ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH ALLIANCE.

On Monday, at nine a.m., crowds were seen wending their way to the ancient cathedral of St. Pierre, which had been kindly put at the disposal of the Alliance by the "Venerable Company of Pastors" of the Established Church. Lists of the members present at this or subsequent sittings will be found at the conclusion of our report.

After singing, prayer, and the reading of the seventeenth chapter of St. John's Gospel,

M. ADRIEN NAVILLE, the President of the French Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, read the following declaration of principles of that organization, the doctrines embodied in which could not be attacked or called in question, as constituting the basis upon which the Conference met: "The French Branch of the Evangelical Alliance admits into the number of its members all Christians who, desirous of living in fraternal love, manifest their willingness to confess with it, in conformity with the inspired Scriptures, their common faith in God the Saviour, in the Father who has loved and justified them, by grace through faith in His Son; in the Son, who has redeemed them by His atoning sacrifice; in the Holy Spirit, the Author of their regeneration, and of their sanctification, one God blessed for ever, to whose glory they desire to dedicate their lives." He then spoke as follows: "Our hearts are filled with joy that we are enabled to welcome you to this city. Brethren from all countries—Welcome! Brethren of Great Britain, you among whom our Alliance was formed and developed—Welcome! Brethren of Germany, from that land of science and thought, whence you bring us, for the defence of our faith, arms so much the better prepared that you have long been exposed to attacks—Welcome! Brethren from France, you sent us, three hundred years ago, the torch which now lights us. You will ever find in this little canton of free Helvetia the welcome which rejoiced the hearts of your brethren on their arrival within the walls of our ancient Geneva—Welcome! Brethren from Italy, among whom the day-star from on high is beginning to dissipate the darkness; who see the Gospel at length freely preached, liberty of conscience and worship succeed the narrow prohibitions of priestly authority—Welcome! Brethren from Switzerland, who are one with us—Welcome! Brethren from America, who have left your distant homes in a solemn moment to join your prayers with ours—Welcome! You are at this moment tried even to blood; but it is that the plague from which you have suffered so long may at length be cured. What thanks will the Christians of Europe, as well as those of America, give to the Lord on th day when your noble country will only count free men! Welcome! then, all who have responded to our fraternal invitation!" The President then took a general survey of the present state of the Christian world, and in conclusion alluded to the crisis of the day: "In these last years a science hostile to our faith has emerged from the obscurity of the schools. Infidelity applauds the sight of divines working for its profit, and sad experience shows already that, going on from doubt to doubt, people at last reach the point losing the certitude of a life to come."

SPEECHES AT THE OPENING MEETING.

Sir CULLING EARDLEY then spoke in French, and brought before the meeting interesting information upon religious liberty in Turkey, Syria, Spain, and Italy. In referring to Spain he paid a warm tribute of admiration to Sir Robert Peel, who, as British consul, was formerly well known in Geneva. He concluded by expressing a hope that the labours of the Conference would not terminate without some practical efforts of Christian love.

Pastor GUILLAUME MONOD, of Paris, followed. "Who," he asked, "would have said, a hundred years ago, that such a meeting as this would be held at Geneva, and that the greatest number of deputies would come from the countries of Gibbon, Voltaire, and Frederick II.? The man who would have ventured such a prediction would have passed for mad. God is teaching two lessons by this—1. That when a Church is unfaithful, He threatens to take away its candlestick, but He does not put it out. He may transplant the faith of Rome to Alexandria, but He does not allow it to perish. The age of the Encyclopedists, which ended in blood, has produced the era of Bible Societies, and of an outpouring of the Spirit, of which, perhaps, the Church had never seen the like. 2. The awakening of piety must bring about the union of the nations. The great doctrines of the Gospel occupy the foreground more and more; the spirit of the age, the good sense of the public, warn Christians to unite; the sectarian spirit is an anachronism. This proves the reality of our revival: We are here gathered from different countries. What does it signify? Is it not written, 'Take one stick and write upon it, for Judah, and for the children of Israel, his companions: then take another stick and write upon it, for Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel, his companions, and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in their hand?' The Lord has written upon a stick the name of each nation, and this stick is one, and is called the Cross of Christ."

DR. KRUMMACHER ON CHRISTIAN UNION IN GERMANY.

The Rev. Dr. KRUMMACHER, chaplain to his Majesty the King of Prussia, said: I heartily rejoice, dear brethren in the Lord, to breathe again the air of an assembly which, as I hope, is free from the reproach which is raised in our day against many other conferences—viz., that everything is found in them that can constitute a Christian conference, except "love." And yet the Apostle instances it as an essential sign of our having passed from death unto life, that we love the brethren, and gives to understand that the most correct orthodoxy, the most scrupulous self-denial, if charity be wanting, is as a white sheet covering a corpse. Thank God, all that we hear in our midst—be it fraternal salutations, be it our common humiliation and confession of sin, be it our common hymns of praise—is no sounding brass or tinkling cymbal. We have met here as brethren, to whom Christ and Him crucified is all and everything; and thus we embrace each other (unhindered by whatever may separate us doctrinally or ecclesiastically) as members of the spiritual body, whose head is Emmanuel, and as called to the same inheritance of the saints in light—in that love which never faileth, while tongues, prophecies, and knowledge shall cease. Yes, we embrace each other, as do two of our friends, who, widely separated in life, are now closely united, and sing as with one mouth the song of the Lamb. I speak of Bunsen and Stahl, both of whom became as little children, and died in the faith of the atoning blood of Jesus Christ, after having descended, the one from the heights of human speculation, the other from the vain attempt to erect airy bridges between faith and unbelief. I am come from a country, beloved brethren, where love has grown cold among believers in consequence of theological and ecclesiastical strife and contention. Yet those are not wanting who deeply lament this state of things. A small number of the latter salutes the Conference through me. I say, a small number. For, though there are many friends of the Evangelical Alliance in my country, yet the number of the real members is very small, especially in the north of my native land. What is the cause of it? Allow me to give a frank reply. First, you must know that in our country believers recede more and more within the bulwark of their ecclesiastical institutious and Church confessions, in order to defend themselves more efficiently against the attacks and opposition of the Rationalists and Pantheists. The pastors consider it as their principal object to awaken in their congregations, so long neglected and injured, the confessional (or denominational) conscience, and to revive a conservative enthusiasm for the faith of their fathers, in the first place, as a venerable, sacred, and inalienable inheritance. Thus one hears in the congregations, "Will you not die in the same faith in which your fathers died? Will you not remain good Lutherans, or good Reformed, and contend for the treasures of the Reformation, which your ancestors have left to you? For you must know that these treasures are endangered by another confession by the Union [of Lutheran and Reformed, forming the United Church, as in Prussia], or by the Evangelical Alliance." Such is the language used, and it is thought that much has been gained when the congregations enthusiastically exclaim, "We remain faithful to the faith of our fathers," although this faith is to them but something external, the substance of which they entirely ignore. These men are of opinion that the Alliance opposes or is adverse to the revival of the confessional conscience, because, as they say, the Alliance removes the churches from their historical foundation; it makes the distinctive creeds appear as of secondary importance, and weakens very essential doctrines, in order to secure a union of heterogeneous elements. It ruins the churches by pretending to build up the true Church. We do not cease to expose and to combat this truly horrible prejudice again and again as entirely unfounded; and again and again to assure our accusers that the Evangelical Alliance does not aim at a fusion of churches, or at an abolition of ecclesiastical symbols, but merely at a closer fraternisation of believing individuals of various denominations for common Christian labours of love. However, who believes our preaching? Yet this truth cannot be pronounced too often and too loudly. In the second place, the Evangelical Alliance is again and again blamed for not undertaking practical objects, like the Bible, Missionary, Tract, and Gustavus-Adolphus Societies. They forget that the strengthening of the bonds of cordial, fraternal love, among all believers, the practical manifestation of the unity of higher communion in Christ, notwithstanding diversities in secondary views and tendencies, the brotherly intercession for oppressed and persecuted fellow-believers, the connecting of dispersed friends of the Gospel with the great body of the Church of Christ—that all these are practical objects—objects of the noblest kind! But they ask for still more manifestly practical objects, and wish to see, for instance, refuges for those who have suffered for the Gospel's sake, seminaries for Christian ministers of all denominations, asylums for converted Roman Catholic priests, grand literary efforts in defence of revealed truth against its adversaries—and what more? We simply reply to those who most blame us: Pray, join our Alliance; place at its service all that God has given you of gifts and power, and you will, with your co-operation, see all those things carried out which you desire, and which you now miss. A third objection, which in our country has estranged many from the Evangelical Alliance and continues keeping them aloof, is—I speak freely and frankly—the not always Evangelical and judicious mode in which many of our Baptist brethren pursue their propaganda. The Evangelical Alliance, which embraces them also, has suffered on their account. They often call the National Church, within which they endeavour to establish their congregations, "Babel"—its members are called "unbaptized Christians"—and they at once place themselves in a hostile position towards her pastors. Our earnest prayer and desire, that these things might not happen, is as great as our desire of seeing the Evangelical Alliance gaining more and more ground in our country. I honour the Baptist community, especially in America and England. I acknowledge that their ecclesiastical order and discipline, as well as their moral earnestness, may frequently serve us as a model. But I must repeat what I have said, the Baptist brethren in Germany hinder the extension of the Evangelical Alliance, if they continue to manifest their zeal in the same manner as heretofore. A fourth reason for not joining the Alliance in Germany is the supposition, that those who become members are obliged to adhere to the principle of unconditional liberty of conscience and worship. It is well understood that in countries in which Romish or Greek hierarchism or Cæsaropapism predominates the Branches of the Evangelical Alliance may be obliged to stand up for this principle. But we ask our accusers again and again, Where then is the law or statute of the Alliance which demands this unconditional religious liberty which would lead to serious irregularities, and countenance the formation of even atheistical bodies and communions? Lastly. That which is especially a great impediment to our believing brethren joining the Alliance is the opinion entertained by many of our best Christian friends, that (allow us to speak frankly) the Alliance, in at least some of its Branches, sympathises with a political tendency, which, before the tribunal of the Word of God, can never be justified. We assure our accusers that this grave reproach is based upon a misunderstanding. They regard as expressive of sympathy with revolution what is nothing more than admiration of those ways which Divine Providence opens up, through the sinful commotions of the nations, for the advancement of the kingdom of God. We have declared again and again, that the Evangelical Alliance detests and abhors the principle that evil should be done in order that good may come out of it. Whenever good comes out of evil the Alliance gives honour alone to the grace of Almighty God, while it makes a very clear distinction between the instruments, so often sinful, and the pure and holy Ruler in heaven. "Reformation, not Revolution," is the motto of the Evangelical Alliance. I declare this again, in the name of the German Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, as frankly and loudly, here in Geneva, at the frontier of France and the kingdom of Italy, as in Berlin and Potsdam. May the Lord grant that this great festive day, at Geneva may tend to dissipate these prejudices! All eyes are turned to the Geneva Conference. Much depends for the future of the Evangelical Alliance in Germany upon its proceedings. Let us rally round the standard of the cross; let us not trespass upon foreign ground in our discussions; and, thinking alone of the interests of the kingdom of God, let us make the Word of God in everything the ruler and regulator of our thoughts and words. Then from this city, where the Lord once planted a pillar of His Church, the pure Word again will proceed, if not as, 300 years ago, a mighty stream, yet as a fertilising and refreshing rivulet of Divine blessing to the whole Church. The Lord grant it in mercy!

Pastor OLLIVIER, from Lausanne, said: Fourteen years ago there was at Lausanne a meeting held to establish the basis of an Evangelical Alliance there. The president of the English Branch was present. Oh, said he, if there could be a meeting of Christians from all countries at Geneva, it would be the finest day in my life. Why, does he not remember his words to-day?—to-day, when we can almost realise the words, "They shall come from the east and from the west, and from the north and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God." And is not the city of Calvin at this moment the blessed city where light comes from the four cardinal points of grace?

Dr. Baird, of New York, followed, and Messrs. des Mesnards and Descombaz; after which the meeting was closed with prayer by Pastor Barde, of Geneva.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

PROFESSOR GODET ON THE OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S-DAY.

The second meeting took place at two P.M. At this, as at all the other meetings, the proceedings commenced by singing a hymn from the selection prepared for the use of the Conference, by the reading of Scripture, and by prayer. The subject appointed for discussion was, "The Lord's-day, and the Best Means of Sanctifying it."

Professor GODET, of Neuchâtel, said that he believed all present were agreed as to the utility of the Sabbath rest, considered in relation to the individual, the family, the Church, and the State; but he feared that were he to question them as to the duty of the sanctification of the Sabbath, he should find two very marked opinions; and that until all Christians could agree upon that point, all remedies proposed would prove merely palliatives. Some would go forward in the name of the fourth commandment; others would appeal to ecclesiastical order. "In the face of this difference my task is difficult. I ought to unite, and not to divide. Let us then fix our attention on the following three points—I. The principle of the duration of the Sabbatic institution. II. The change from the seventh to the first day of the week. III. Conclusion as to the sanctification of the Sabbath, and the means of advancing it. I. God established the Sabbath in Eden, while man was yet holy, as a means of developing in him the higher spiritual life. Neither Plato nor Socrates, nor the best of the Pagans, recognised the need of the Sabbath, because they had not the key to that higher spiritual life. What relation does the Mosaic Sabbath hold to the Primitive Sabbath? The Primitive Sabbath was given to all mankind; by the fault of the other peoples it became a national and Israelitish institution.

and took a more fixed and definite form. But there is no change as to the principle; it is the same as with the marriage law. Jewish marriage is only marriage which had been instituted in paradise, only the primitive institution is grafted on the theocratic trunk, and is renewed in drawing a new life from it. But, it may be said, Christ is the end of the law. How then can the carnal ordinance of the weekly Sabbath still exist? (Gal. iv. 10, Col. ii. 16, Rom. xiv. 5, 6, Matt. xii. 8.) Spiritual life has been added to moral life to sanctify it. Doubtless a new creation has taken place, but in the moral point of view, though we are 'seated with Christ in heavenly places,' we are not the less in the flesh. Man remains subject to the Sabbath institution, for in this heavenly citizen there is also the earthly citizen. For those who demand a positive precept in the Gospel, we answer, the Sabbath institution exists in the Gospel, just as does the whole economy of nature—by positive Divine appointment, and not by positive Christian appointment. The Gospel tacitly accepts it as a legitimate element of natural life, until the time that we shall be like the angels of God. (Luke xx. 34—36.)

II. If the ancient ordinance still subsists, was it allowable to modify the form of it? The Gospel is not simply a doctrine or a law. The new Adam brings in a new creation. Genesis teaches us that Sabbath and creation are two notions which imply each other, and therefore the new creation calls for a new Sabbath. The Church was between two shoals, the status quo and suppression. The Gospel answered by the change which, while maintaining the old creation, showed the reality of the new. There was no caprice in this, but a moral and historical fitness. Doubtless it was not by accident that Jesus finished His work on Friday, which was the last working-day of the ancient week; that the Saturday, the ancient Sabbath, was the day of rest of His body in the tomb, and of His soul in paradise; and that the first day, that which commenced every week, was the day on which the new creation broke in—the day of His resurrection. There was preference—will—for the choice of the first day was repeated eight days later, on the second appearance of the risen Jesus among His disciples. It was also on that day that the new life was shown forth in humanity by Pentecost.

III. How ought the Christian Sabbath to be sanctified? What are the means for advancing the observance of it? The New Testament speaks of the first day of the week as a special day on three occasions. John, when alone, was in the Spirit on the Lord's-day. Paul meets with the brethren of Troas, and celebrates the Lord's-supper with them on the first day of the week. The Churches of Greece and Asia resolve on the first day of the week to set aside the tribute of their Christian beneficence. Therefore the Sabbath is a day for private meditation, for public worship, and lastly, a day for the exercise of Christian philanthropy. But it is easier to say what ought to be done than what ought not to be done. Let us remember that the Church did not give herself the Sabbath, and that duty transformed into privilege is none the less duty; but it is manifest that Christian love enjoys a liberty to which simple legal obedience does not rise. Love interpreting the law is an author interpreting his own work. It was for the liberty of love, and not for the license of the flesh, that Jesus wrestled. He never claimed liberty to work in behalf of an earthly calling, but only in view of the necessities of life, or of assistance to those who suffer, or of the great work of His kingdom. As for the means for advancing the observance of the Sabbath, would it not be a good thing in the city where Calvin struggled against Libertinism to create a Universal Association in favour of the Lord's-day, of which the aim would be to sanctify the Lord's-day ourselves, to avoid whatever might hinder others from sanctifying it, and to labour to increase the number of those who sanctify it?"

Pastor GOULIN, of Geneva, then addressed the meeting; and Dr. A. THOMSON, from Edinburgh, spoke on the observance of the Sabbath in Scotland. He stated—1. That the ministers and the Christian public in Scotland, almost without exception, believe in the Divine authority of the Sabbath. 2. That a feature in the Sabbath-keeping of Scotland consists in the fact that the entire Sabbath is consecrated to religion. 3. That within narrower limits than this the Sabbath must fail to work out its beneficent designs. 4. There exists two opposite representations of the Sabbath-keeping of Scotland (against which the speaker protested), a caricature and an overcolouring exceeding the reality. 5. The conviction that Sabbath observance sustains the very roots of national life, morality, and religion. 6. Testimony of medical and scientific men. 7. That the Sabbath even in Scotland is not without its enemies and its dangers.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 3.

MORNING MEETING.

PROFESSOR ROSSEUW ST. HILAIRE ON IRRELIGION AND IMMORALITY AMONG THE PEASANTRY AND OPERATIVES OF FRANCE.

M. BOVET DE MURALT, of Neufchâtel, presided. After prayer and reading of the Scriptures, a paper was read by Professor ROSSEUW ST. HILAIRE, upon "The Means Suggested by Wisdom and Experience of Remedying the Evils Resulting from the Want of Religious Life and the State of Immorality in which a Large Proportion of our Population are Lying." "The (1) Peasantry and (2) Working Classes of France:" such was the division of the subject. The plan of the Professor's elaborate paper embraced the condition into which the French Revolution has brought those classes, their vices, their sufferings, and the remedies which Christianity alone can bring them. "The peasantry and the operatives form two classes totally distinct. The obligation to work is the link which unites them. To begin with the French people in general, as the Revolution has made them. The Revolution destroyed the bond which united lord and vassal. Before 1789, landed property was out of the peasant's reach. Since that period the bending bough has enabled him to touch the fruit. He has hastened to enjoy it. The laws will not permit the forming anew of large properties. The law of equal division imposes respect for equality in the family, and property cannot anew be concentrated in the same hands. But that was done by violence. The State sold, the peasant pillaged, and afterwards it was necessary to indemnify the families that had been dispossessed. Thence arose hatreds, and two parties were formed—that of the past, which will accept nothing of what has been done; the other, which accepts everything, and renders it more fruitful, for it has discovered that law and liberty in the possession of the soil are the only rules in transactions. But the administrative laws have not been developed in the direction of these principles. Our centralization has attained its highest degree. Life flows to the heart of France; death has gained its extremities." Passing to the difference between the peasantry and the operatives, as the Revolution has left them, M. St. Hilaire continued: "The fundamental vice of the French peasant is Avarice. The peasant worships the soil; it is his passion, his frenzy.

He saves from his food, his health; from that of his wife and children. He forgets even the simplest notions of prudence; he borrows at 7 or 8 per cent., to draw at the sweat of his brow 3 per cent. from the corner of land which he buys with borrowed money; and so, if a bad year comes, he is ruined. From this overweening attachment to the soil springs another vice—Mistrust. When the whole existence converges towards one aim, all seems allowable for its attainment. What place, then, remains for religion? Alas! his morality consists in buying cheap and selling dear; in coming on Sunday to the church door to chat with his acquaintances on the price of grain, and then going and drinking in the publichouse. In a religious point of view we have no hold on the peasant; but the peasant becomes a soldier, and we can act upon the soldier. Ready to embark for the Crimea, have our soldiers been seen refusing to receive the Gospel? But has not Catholicism some hold on the peasant? No, the sale of Church property put a barrier between the priest and the peasant, and simony has done the rest. The morality of the peasant is not so low as that of the operative. The morals of the French peasantry are (taken together) not so bad as those of the surrounding countries, excepting Britain. Education is thought by many to be the grand panacea; but instruction, without religion, does more harm than good. Let us sow the seed of the Gospel. It will spring up. Our peasantry do not refuse it. They do not know it. Wherever it has been proclaimed to them they have accepted it." The speaker next passed to the operative: "What is the operative in general? A displaced agriculturist. There is a strong migratory movement from the country to the towns. The first generation is the most wretched; the second, born in the alleys, can live in cellars without air, but for the parents it is an awful apprenticeship!" The Professor went on to draw the portraits of the Parisian operatives: "The French operative, but particularly the Parisian, is not simple. Look at him when he is speaking to you; he attitudinises, he puts on the air of an orator who is perorating, he is a fine speaker; the clubs seem to have been invented for him; he feels at his ease there, and enjoys them, having just enough of intelligence to understand all, enough self-love to play a part, and of credulity to be the dupe of his empty declarations. He becomes at once the prey of the rogue, who takes advantage of him.

always ready to be enamoured with the same chimeras, and to fall into the same temptations which he deploras, and then begins anew. He thinks that he loves liberty, but he has never loved anything but equality, and would very easily content himself to have some one beneath him, provided he had no one over him! In politics he is a republican at heart, but that does not hinder a certain weakness in favour of absolute power. In contact with religion he is accessible to the influence of the Gospel, but under the eye of his comrades he becomes indifferent, if not hostile. That fatal spirit of mockery (which is in the blood of our race), that passion and fear of ridicule, are the greatest obstacles to the Gospel in France. But I know the good qualities also of the working men. I have seen them during the cholera. Abandoned by every one, the operatives did not abandon each other; they nursed each other, assisted each other, and waited with a sombre resignation their hour to lie down and die. It is there that I have seen the operative struggle hand to hand with misery, without aid from on high, and he was not overcome! It is impossible to know him without liking him. In his domestic relations he is the mildest of men—not quarrelsome, always ready to laugh; and then he has that gift of heaven, sympathy, which makes us forgive France for its many sins. To judge the operative fairly, we must compare him with the peasant. The operative is more corrupted perhaps, but he is more amiable. He is at once more selfish and more susceptible of self-denial. He ruins his family by drinking, and adopts his neighbour's orphan. Possessing nothing, he is always ready to give away, and to risk all. He speaks openly, without caring for the consequences, and in religion he is upright; no cowardly compromise; show him the truth, he will go straight to it! In conclusion, the Professor exhorted to kindness to the working-classes. "They prefer Protestants; they do not like the priest, and, though they think they do not need religion for themselves, they like it for their children. Let us try to establish more religious journals; bad literature is one of the plagues of France, and we have only one or two journals to oppose it. But the most important means of action is apprenticeship, an immense question, which our churches are endeavouring to solve. Trials have been made, but on so small a scale, that they can only serve as waymarks for the future. To work then! French Christians, and you beloved foreign brethren, pray for us

Let us not be discouraged, and if, towards evening, we become weary, we may say, with Wesley, 'I need to go there where I shall sin no more, and not see others sin.' "

Pastor BOUVIER, of Geneva, examined the subject as regards Switzerland under three points of view. First, the religious state of the country; second, the means hitherto made use of for its amelioration; and third, those which experience and wisdom may suggest in the future. With the increase of business an industrial fever has arisen. Ambition has penetrated to all classes. Immorality has made way. Formerly, when the family spirit was diffused through the country, the opinion of others was dreaded; now it is less cared for. The friends of the Gospel have laboured to stop the evil. The means used have been education, evangelization, and philanthropy. Let us continue following the same means. The people seize the spiritual science of the Gospel more easily than we imagine.

Pastor JOHN BOST, of La Force (Dordogne): The great evil of France is irreligion. It has been said, "France is getting weary" (s'ennuie). I say, "France is amusing herself." The love of display is penetrating everywhere through our country, even into the most secluded retreats. In France, as everywhere else, let woman take a more active part in the diffusion of the Gospel. Let woman bring her heart to the work of salvation—to console and cure; with her heart she will be sure to succeed.

DR. GUTHRIE ON RAGGED SCHOOLS.

Owing to the length of the above meeting, the English brethren were invited to hold an extra session. They accordingly met in the Oratoire, Sir C. E. EARDLEY in the chair.

After prayer, by the Hon. and Rev. B. Noel, Dr. GUTHRIE rose and pleaded in favour of Ragged Schools: "I found, the other day, in an hotel at Verona, an inscription on a box which describes better than I can those for whom I am proud to stand as an advocate—'Per la miserabile infanzia—infanzia!' Is there anything more lovely than to see an infant smile? And to my eye there is nothing so painful as to see a poor skeleton of a child, with rags hung on its back, laying its little head on the foul shoulder of a drunken mother. It is in favour of such that I am here to plead." The Doctor then entered into details, picking out at random cases of children who had been saved from vice and wretchedness in Edinburgh by means of ragged schools. After giving statistior he said: "To this table may be applied the words of the Prophet, 'Written within and without with lamentation, mourning, and woe!' These children are the germs of our criminals. Had it not been for our schools, 250 out of the 300 whom we have at present would have been in prison. These children are taught by their parents to steal, and if they do not bring home enough, they are beaten. They are not the guilty party. When that child is brought before the court, the crime is there, but not the criminal. In Scotland we have a happy way of pronouncing a verdict. In England you have guilty, or not guilty; in Scotland we have, as a variation, not proven. Here is a boy at the bar; he has never seen a court of justice before; he stares about him like a wild beast; he sees before him three fat men in black gowns, or red, with horsehair on their heads, and often more outside than in, who never in all their lives knew what it is to be hungry. The boy has been caught in the act of stealing; the evidence is there, but I say the verdict ought to be proven, but not guilty. Who, then, is the guilty party? Judgment shall begin at the house of God. This is the law, Sir. That child is condemned by law, but not by justice. It reminds me of the answer of a justice's servant, who was asked by some one who wished to see her master, 'Is the justice in?' 'No, Sir, but the law is.' Who, then, is the guilty party? 'Judgment must begin at the house of God.' The ministers of the Gospel are guilty—I and my brethren, who did not stretch out our hand to pluck that child as a brand from the burning. The judges are guilty. The ladies and gentlemen who went to church or chapel to pray with their Prayer-book or Bible, and passed those perishing little ones, saying 'What a plague those children are!' are guilty; and I truly believe, Sir, when God sits in His judgment-seat, He will tell the angels to take away that child, and bring to the bar the ministers, the judges, the ladies and gentlemen who passed by on the other side. 'For where no law is, there is no transgression.' These children furnished materials to fill our prisons. They begged in swarms through the streets of Edinburgh. Talk of the mosquitoes of Venice, they are nothing to those we had in Edinburgh. But we have cleared the streets of them. Now we have neither begging children nor begging friars in Edinburgh. Begging is next door to thieving. Before ragged schools were commenced, some fourteen years ago, five out of every 100 prisoners were under fourteen years of age. Walk along the corridor of a prison, put your eye to the grating, and see there, between four cold walls, a little boy, pale and solitary, who should have been on the busy school-bench, or playing in the fresh open air, or at his mother's fireside. I saw a little fair-haired, blue-eyed girl sitting there. Pity seized me. But as we pass in a moment from one feeling to another, my soul was filled with indignation. 'Who on earth put that child in here?' said I to the turnkey? 'The sheriff, Sir.' 'Well,' said I, 'if I had the sheriff here I would put him in there himself and lock him up!'" The Doctor then went on to describe the organization of the ragged schools in Scotland, and finished by a warm appeal to continental friends to take up the subject in earnest. "If I could prevail upon one lady (woman's heart is the steam, man is the strong iron part) to set up a ragged school in her city, I am amply repaid for having come so far to plead the cause. I feel that there are many things in my ministry I would fain change, but the one bright spot which will remain when this head shall be pillowed on the cold ground, is the having been allowed to do something in this cause. I bless God for having given to this tongue to speak on this behalf. You say, where are the means? I live in Salisbury-road, Edinburgh. The domestic servants in that road, who have but little means of laying money by, have spontaneously resolved to support two ragged-school children. Oh, the satisfaction of doing good! We may say of ragged schools, 'Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all.'"

The Hon. and Rev. B. NOEL next addressed the meeting. He insisted especially on the necessity of all classes joining in working in the good cause. "If you cannot get people to your churches and chapels, get them to the halls; if you cannot get them to halls, get them to the theatre or to the open air. Let working-men speak to working-men. They like freedom to come without a coat, to ask questions, and they rarely make a bad use of it. One day I was preaching in the open air, when a half-drunken man addressed me: 'Did you ever see God?' I answered: 'I am not a brute; I can believe what I do not see.' Those round about tried to silence the man. 'I suppose you will put me into prison?' said he. 'No, I want to let you out.' The people said to him: 'You must come to our prayer-meeting, and we will pray for you.' They took hold of him and prayed for him."

Dr. G. H. DAVIS, Secretary of the Religious Tract Society, spoke of the characteristics of a good tract: 1. Fundamental truths, free from particular or individual views, must be stated in it. 2. It must be written in language familiar to the people. 3. Tracts ought to be written by the most talented men. It is a very difficult thing to write a good tract.

E. BAINES, Esq., M.P. for Leeds, spoke of the City Mission, and the agency of Bible-women.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

This meeting was held at St. Pierre, Dr. GRANDPIERRE, of Paris, in the chair.

M. CHRIST SABARIN, of the Mission House of Basle, gave a survey of the progress in the whole missionary field since the Berlin assembly.

M. CASALIS, President of the Paris Mission-house, made a powerful appeal for young men to come forward and devote themselves to the missions.

Rev. J. MORRISON, of the Lodiana Mission, gave details on the work going on in the Punjab.

M. ARBOUSSET, French Missionary from South Africa, went over the history of the work there from the beginning, thirty-five years ago.

Pastor SAMUEL BOST closed the meeting with prayer.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4.

MORNING MEETING.

M. ERNEST NAVILLE ON MODERN FRENCH SCEPTICISM.

The meeting took place as usual at St. Pierre. The chairman was Pastor LOUIS BURNIER, of Vaud. After singing, reading the Scriptures, and prayer, Professor ERNEST NAVILLE, of Geneva, delivered an address, which had been previously announced in the following terms: "Critical Examination of Modern Scepticism in France." "Socrates," said M. Naville, "the wisest of the Greeks, counselled his disciples to get rid of the prejudices of education by a bold yet modest doubt. Descartes began by imposing upon himself the most complete doubt. The shaking of all belief is the means he used to find a solid rock on which to place his feet. But scepticism declares the possession of the truth an impossibility; it ought therefore to sit down in silent despair. As a modern poet says, 'The mortal who thinks is a fool, all thought is error;' therefore, 'Let us live and die in silence.' Why then do sceptics speak? Is it like the incendiary, to spread destruction round them? No, but because a vague image of truth floats before them in spite of what they say." The Professor proceeded to examine scepticism. I. In man's general and ordinary pursuits. II. In the special domain of science. III. The conclusions to be drawn from the examination. "Under the first head we meet with politics, religion, and literature. Politics have never formed a ground of stability; still less so in our day. Rarely has an earthquake like the French Revolution been seen. Few spectacles have occurred like that of the Soldier of Fortune marching his victorious armies from one end of Europe to the other, tearing the crowns from the heads of kings, and overthrowing the frontiers of empires. These events have given a popularity to politics; ideas formerly confined to the heads of the people have become matter of conversation in cafés and public-houses. But what passes in the domain thus opened to the public? The aim of politics is to succeed. The maxim of the day is 'The end justifies the means.' Even the wisest learn to make up their minds to this. It has always been so. What is to be done? This is an evil for society, but above all, for the conscience. There are laws which teach us that there are honourable defeats, and victories more shameful than defeat; but those laws must keep silence before the accomplished fact. But what of religion? That ought to consolidate the thoughts of men. But this light is not without its shady side. True, the Gospel continues to conquer the world; but too often religion has been compromised by its very triumphs: it has become one of the things of this world—a means for becoming rich, an instrument for acquiring domination. Doubtless, within the last fifty years, there has been an awakening of conscience, a serious return to the Gospel. But a spirit of controversy has also arisen; and, as an irresistible instinct of reason persuades us that the truth is one, these controversies sow the seeds of doubt in many minds. In these modern controversies there appears a struggle between the principle of authority and that of liberty. Faith in its plenitude is the reconciliation of these two principles. Faith is not slavery; it is obedience. Vinet says, 'Without liberty, there is no obedience.' The principle of liberty, isolated from faith, brings a dangerous support to doubt; liberty is the means necessary to arrive at the truth; free and living unity is the only term to our efforts. These elementary principles are being forgotten. We see forming around us a Protestantism affirming diversity to be an absolute good; declaring that there is a truth for every individual—that is to say, that there is no truth. A false spirit of liberty makes the pleasure of thought, revelling in an endless search, preferable to the giving up of ourselves to recognised truth. Pascal stigmatises this as one of our miseries; Lessing makes a boast of it. In modern France the German finds many admirers. We wish to be free, but truth imposes an obligation; let us, then, give up the truth, that we may keep the pleasure of being independent! You will not be astonished to find analogous tendencies in our literature. Journalism, under every form, invades the domain of publicity. And to what sort of journals does this great publicity belong? To periodical writings which offer the most complete mixture of contradictory opinions—an article of the most moral tendency side by side with a poisonous novel; an apology for Catholicism, a defence of the Protestant principle, an eulogium upon Deism, under the same cover, which will equally screen a theological essay and doctrines proclaiming annihilation. Literary criticism is distinguished by 'that exquisite toleration which tolerates all the evil, and even the good.' From this there results a great shaking of conviction. Formed in this school, our young people contract the habit of hearing with the greatest indifference the most sacred truths by turns affirmed or denied. We must labour to put down this press, the direct heir of the sophists of old Athens. A serious opinion must be formed and brought to reckon with the writers who place themselves as the organs and directors of the public mind. II. Modern science derives its title to glory from two sources, its discoveries in the domain of nature, and its investigations in the domain of history. Does not nature reveal to the most inattentive the perfections of its Author? And what shall we say of history? The divine woof appears through all the hideous or fantastic tissues of human liberty. History and nature equally invite to faith, and this faith ought to be vivified and increased by every conquest of science. Too often the contrary effect is produced. The study of the laws of the universe and of the destinies of humanity nourish faith; but to be nourished, it must exist. The spirit of scepticism finds, also, a powerful auxiliary in a philosophy unfaithful to its mission. You are taught that no other unity exists than that of a collection of facts, in nature and history. It is affirmed that there is nothing stable, eternal, except the revolutions of the world. If we must use school terms, to become has taken the place of to be. 'Everything flows on,' said Heraclitus, 2,000 years ago. And a legend—ingenious in the depth of its meaning—shows us Heraclitus weeping and mingling his tears with the torrent that carries all away, and himself with the rest; whilst our modern Heraclituses sadden us with their satisfaction, and laugh with a smile more lugubrious than tears. But still their need of faith becomes apparent in them. In spite of reason, they clothe the passing realities of our life with the characteristics of the Infinite Being. They adore, in their own way, the eternal wave which is carrying away all existence. They deny God, the true and living God, but they will not be Atheists. It is the cry of the soul protesting against the delusions of the mind. III. We have seen the negation of God and the negation of truth united. This is the streak of light to guide us to our conclusion—God and truth are in strict, indissoluble union. In order that reason may find a base to lift it out of the phenomena of the visible world, there must be an act of faith, which lays hold of God. This is what Descartes saw. Descending into the depths of the human heart, Descartes discovers there the reflection of a Divine light, and, rising again to the source of that light, he proclaims God, the first, the most certain of truths. He confesses that all the strength of his proof depends on a belief which precedes it; that without this belief, man is condemned to irreconcilable doubt. What, then, is the barrier we must oppose to the invasions of scepticism? Let us answer boldly, faith in God. I know of no other. But is this affirmation of God arbitrary? Shall we allow it to be said that we have no other refuge than a caprice of the mind? By no means. The intellect alone is not the whole man. If God is the only answer to the will seeking His law, to the heart claiming an object worthy of its affections, to the conscience asking the moving cause of His commands and the sanction of His decrees, shall we call arbitrary the movement of the soul, raising itself in all the harmony of its faculties, towards the light which alone gives it to understand its own nature? Do we wish to combat scepticism? Let us proclaim God; the living and the true God; the God of the Gospel. Let us proclaim Him by our life; let us show what faith in Him that is invisible can do: and let it become visible to all eyes. Let us not be uneasy, though storms of doubt are passing over our age. There are indeed clouds upon the horizon; but be calm. God sustains the human mind in its weakness. He has said to the aberrations of the human intellect, as to the waves of the sea, 'Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further.' The struggle between good and evil will always last, but scepticism shall not spread its cold shadows, or rather its creeping fogs, over the face of the whole intellectual globe; and the future will always show that the worst of errors is, that there is no truth."

This remarkable and eloquent address—one of the few opening the topic for discussion which was not read—produced a deep impression. The assembly rose simultaneously, and sung part of a hymn.

Pastor BASTIE, of Bergerac (Dordogne), spoke upon the characteristics, the causes, and the remedies of scepticism.

M. CHANTEPIE DE LA SAUSSAYE, Pastor at Leyden, spoke on scepticism in the Church. He said: "I came from a Protestant country, mined by scepticism. I inhabit a town which is the very centre of European Rationalism. This would seem to accuse traditional Protestantism of insufficiency. There is a scepticism which merits our respect—that which is not shocked by the severe exigencies of the Gospel, but which cannot accept its mysteries—I mean, the supernatural either in the doctrines or in the facts. Shall we preach to these souls the abdication of the conscience? Shall we ask of them, in the name of a doctrine which they do not accept, that of the fall, that they should treat as a snare of the evil one what they call the imprescriptible rights of conscience? The remedy is worse than the disease. How will you present to them the great doctrine of the fall, which is at the basis of all true faith? By what means will you render acceptable to them the great doctrine of the fall? Will you say, by the authority of the Holy Scriptures? Prove it. But the historical proofs are based upon a foundation of moral principles, which must first be struggled for and obtained. This basis wanting, they create a new and a worse kind of scepticism, that of fear and moral blindness." The speaker went on to say that the most direct means of acting upon the sceptic is to endeavour to bring his conscience into contact with Christ: "Between Christ and the conscience there are certain affinities which will prove the salvation of our sceptical and critical age."

AFTERNOON MEETING.

THE CONVERSION OF THE JEWS.

The Conference met at the Oratoire. Professor GAUSSEN, D.D., presided.

Dr. CAPADOSE, of the Hague, delivered an address on "Israel and Jesus Christ." The subject was divided into two parts, History and Prophecy. In the first part the speaker treated of the promises, the apparitions, and the symbolical worship. And in this triple manifestation he showed that all pointed to Christ—Christ appearing in His turn to accomplish His work on earth, and then return to heaven, whence He had come. "But with His death His history is not finished, since He has risen again. Therefore the history of the people from whom He sprung has not finished with Him. This people has still a vocation to fulfil. It has still a future." Here Dr. Capadose examined several passages of Scripture, particularly that of the 1st of Acts, "Lord wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" and he maintained that by His answer, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons," Jesus confirms them in their belief, while He blames them for wishing to know the time of this restoration. "The error here lies in the negation of a spiritual Messiah, not in the expectation of a restoration. Is it not as if He had said to them, 'The day will come; but have patience and confidence?' Take, again, Hosea iii. 4—'For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king,' &c., which has been literally fulfilled. It follows, therefore, that the next verse (5)—'Afterwards shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord their God, and David, their king; and shall fear the Lord and His goodness in the latter days'—will also be literally fulfilled."

Pastor WILLIAM PETAVEL, of Neuchâtel, said: "In the land of Egypt, Israel seemed lost as a people; but when the Divine power united itself with human infirmity, this infirmity was transformed into almighty power. Modern Israel is lost as a people. They care but little about the conversion and restoration which are predicted of them. They would be very sorry (as an Israelite said to me) 'if the Lord took them at their word when they pray, "O God, let us celebrate the Passover, next year, at Jerusalem."' Nevertheless, the Lord is the same now as in former days. His promises are positive and unchangeable. His glory is interested in the restoration of Israel." The speaker then showed the motives for which we should love Israel: "1. For the Lord sake, who hath made the promises. 2. For the sake of Jesus Christ, the Messiah, King—Jesus Christ, who loved Jerusalem, and wept over it—Jesus Christ, who shall overturn the citadel of Rome and that of Mahomet, and who will not fail before that of Zion! 3. For the sake of Israel. We owe to Israel Jesus and our civilisation. Israel is our benefactor. They are a monument of grace. Why should they not believe in it? 4. We have wrongs to redress; wrongs which still subsist to this day, and which prevent Israel from being converted. 'Despised as we are,' say many of them, 'we are obliged, in order to succeed in the world, to use all our efforts to become rich, for who cares for a poor Jew?' 5. In view of the whole of humanity, how the world will be shaken when a people so favoured of heaven (metaphysicians, poets, linguists, &c., able to be 'all things to all') shall be converted! What the conversion of Paul was for the West, the conversion of the Jews will be for the world. 6. In view of nations as nations, we must have a Christian people. A people has existed of whom God has been the Lawgiver. 'The Lord is our Judge; the Lord is our Lawgiver; the Lord is our King: he will save us.' 7. In view of our Churches, we must have a form of worship. Will not God give a form again to the people of Israel? 8. In view of every one of us, something is wanting to our Christianity. It is tenderness. We have sages, but where are our Johns?"

Professor GAUSSEN said: "Let us not forget what we owe to the Jews—'Salvation is of the Jews.' It is from them in many senses—1. We worship a Jewish Saviour, and we all profess that Abraham is our father, and that our greatest happiness is to be linked, through the election of grace, with the promises made to Abraham. 2. The oracles of God have been confided to the Jews, and all the Prophets, the Apostles—the eight authors of the New Testament—were Jews. 3. The Jews are a living proof of the truth of Scripture; they are the accomplishment of it by their origin, their misfortunes, &c.; they are the prophetic people, the miraculous people, and God has allowed this miracle to walk through the earth for centuries. They are the dispersed and yet unadulterated (infusible) people—the exiled, wandering, and yet indestructible people. The Jews have existed 3,702 years. What are we to conclude from that? 1. We ought to love and respect the Jews; we ought to show them sympathy and gratitude, independently of the reparation that we owe them;

we ought to cry, 'My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved!' I add that Jesus Christ loved them. 'O Jerusalem! if thou hadst known the time of thy visitation.' 2. Let us continue this time of visitation by offering them the Scriptures, by saying to them, 'We have found the Christ of whom Moses told you.' Jesus said. 'They have Moses, if they do not believe him, neither would they believe, though one rose from the dead.' So that, were you to work miracles before the Jews, you would do less for them than Moses and the prophets can do. The Word is powerful to overthrow the strongholds of Satan. When I have happened to meet with serious Jews, I have felt constrained to say to them, 'Dear Sirs, become more Jewish; we are more Jewish than you; we believe in your Moses.' But there is a very great obstacle for the Jews; it is the doctrine of the divinity of Jesus Christ. 'Oh, we respect Jesus Christ,' say they; 'He is a second Moses, but He was sent for the Gentiles. The people of Israel have no need of a mediator: a mediator is good for the Gentiles. Take away that doctrine of the divinity, and perhaps we will come to understand each other.' I answer: It is Moses who has made me a worshipper of Jesus Christ. I will relate you a personal experience. I was a very young boy, and attended the class of a minister in this city. Socinianism was then reigning. In the course of our religious instruction a passage in the Epistle to the Colossians (upon the nature of Jesus) struck me as not being conformable to the holiness of religion. It was said: 'All things were created by him and for him.' All things created by Him! This language seemed to me too harsh. For Him, that seemed still harsher, applied to a creature. A friend of my childhood came to me: he was reading Abbadie's 'Demonstration of Truth' with his venerable grandfather. Abbadie establishes the truth of the Christian religion by basing his argument upon Moses. Abbadie's reasoning—Abbadie, whom Madame de Sevigné respected so highly—is as follows: 1. Moses is a great character, a fine genius. 2. Moses had a deep conviction, which was the ruling principle of his life—the unity of God; such was the corner-stone of his life. 3. Well, this Moses (so consistent), from the very first page of Genesis, admits a mysterious plurality. In the passages where the angel of the Lord is mentioned Moses ascribes to him the names, the attributes, the works, and the worship of God. One of the three men who came to Abraham is always called the Lord, and speaks as the Lord. The angel who appeared to Jacob, says, 'I am the Lord who appeared to thee in Bethel.' The angel who appeared to Moses in the midst of the bush, says, 'I am that I am.' Remember also the 'anger of the Lord.' 4. This language can only be explained by admitting that this man spoke by the Divine power against his conviction, or that he had the knowledge of the Trinity. My friend was troubled, and I too; but it was by these anxieties and perplexities that the doctrine of the Son of God was revealed to us. Such I should wish to be the experience of every child of Israel."

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 5.

THE BARTHOLOMEW FAST.

This being a fast-day at Geneva (the anniversary of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, which, by the alteration from old to new style, now falls on the 5th of September, instead of the 24th of August, as formerly), the Conference held no regular session in the morning. Two extra meetings, however, took place, the first in English, at the Chapel of the Rive Droite, on behalf of Missions, Sir Culling Eardley in the chair—Speakers: Captain Van de Velde, Rev. J. Morrisson, of Lodiana; Dr. Kalkar, of Copenhagen; Rev. G. Smith, London Missionary Society; R. Baxter, Esq., London; W. Brooke, Esq., Master of Chancery, Ireland; Rev. W. Jamieson, English Chaplain, Amsterdam. The second in favour of the Jews, Chapel of the Pelissier—Speakers: Rev. Ridley Herschell, Prof. Cassel, of Berlin; M. König, Dr. Capadose, and Prof. Petavel, of Neufchâtel.

MORNING MEETING OF BRITISH MEMBERS.

ADDRESSES ON MISSIONS.

"It is due to the Star and Dial to say that, so far as we have observed, it is the only daily journal which has regularly reported the transactions of the Conferences as they proceeded. The abstracts of the papers read are of course very far from being as copious as those which the reader now has before him, from our own correspondents. In some cases, however—as, for example, in the following report of proceedings, which did not, strictly speaking, form part of the Conference—we have quoted from our contemporary.]

met in the Salle de la Rive Droit, with a view of bringing about some practical results from the series of meetings being held in Geneva. The meeting was presided over by Sir CULLING EARDLEY, who explained its object, and said it had been resolved to devote the first part of it to the consideration of a distinct portion of the mission-field—namely, the Holy Land. He detailed the many efforts made by different Christian bodies for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the inhabitants of that country, and the assistance rendered to those bodies by the society recently established in London for that purpose. The suggestion, he said, had been made to ask the whole of Christendom for some small contribution for the welfare of the Holy Land (say a sou a week), and Mr. Schmettau, an agent of the Alliance, had been in personal communication on the subject with Christians in the different parts of Protestant Europe, by whom the proposition had been gladly welcomed, and cordial co-operation promised.

Captain Van de Velde, who has been engaged in surveying Palestine, spoke of the needs of the inhabitants, and of the means of meeting them, and commended their cause to Christian benevolence, especially urging the necessity of relieving physical need, as the best way of preparing the native mind for the reception of Christian truth. The degraded state of the Mohammedan population in Lodiana was described by Mr. Morrisson, who has for some time laboured among them, and who recommended continued Christian effort in their behalf. Dr. Kalkar, of St. Petersburg, having obtained permission to speak in German, briefly remarked upon the importance of the Evangelical Alliance manifesting the love which they professed in deeds as well as in words, and particularly pointed out the opportunities which seemed to have been placed in the hands of England by Providence for the extension of civil and religious knowledge. The meeting was next addressed by the Rev. G. Smith, of London, who, in the outset of his observations, paid a tribute to the Republic of Geneva for the successful struggle it had made in behalf of freedom in times past. This mention of "republicanism" called up Sir Culling Eardley to remark that it was not republicanism, but the remains of piety in Geneva, which secured to the people freedom of thought and freedom of speech. In the neighbouring canton of Vaud, which prided itself upon its democratic spirit, a law had been passed within the last few days disentailing certain men from holding high official positions on account of their religious opinions. "Let no one," added Sir Culling Eardley, "go away with the idea that republicanism is favourable to liberty." Mr. Smith, in resuming, made a passing allusion to the growth of the conviction in the minds of Christians that it was their duty to convert the world, and then presented a variety of interesting details relative to the progress of missionary work in Madagascar. The condition of things in Spain was communicated by Mr. Baxter, of London, who had just arrived from a tour in that country. He stated that the power of the Romish Church had failed in Spain, as shown by the abolition of the Inquisition, the dissolution of monasteries, and the confiscation of monastic property. He regretted to add, however, that the upper classes, though emancipated from the influence of Catholicism, were rapidly passing into infidelity, and that the exercise of Protestant worship and the circulation of the Scriptures were still interdicted. Before the close of the meeting a suggestion was thrown out that some testimony of their love towards Geneva should be manifested in a practical manner by the British members of the Conference before their return to England, and a resolution to that effect was proposed by Mr. Brooke, Master of Chancery in Ireland, and unanimously adopted. The specific mode of carrying out the resolution was submitted to the executive committee of the British Branch of the Alliance.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

PASTOR MEILLE ON THE GOSPEL IN ITALY.

Thursday afternoon was devoted to an Italian meeting at the Oratoire, the Hon. ARTHUR KINNAIRD, M.P., in the chair. After prayer by Pastor Malan, Moderator of the Vaudois Table, Pastor MEILLE, of Turin, read a report on the subject of "Italy and the Gospel." "My task," said Pastor Meille, "is not to present Italy in a literary, artistic, or political point of view, but to speak of the efforts which are being made to spread the Gospel in that country, of the encouragements we meet with, the obstacles we have to surmount, the prospects which present themselves, and the importance of this work on the destinies of the great nation which is in the act of being constituted. The most far-seeing would hardly have dared to pronounce, ten or twelve years ago, that Italy could take her place to-day at this conference without fear of fines or dungeons. I shall examine the help that the events of the last ten years have brought to our work. I. And first in order I would reckon the repeated checks that the Papacy has had to undergo. Its wounds are not so deep as has been said. No, Rome is not so near her end as people think. The essential principle on which she stands has not lasted its time. So long as there are timid minds who like a Gospel brought down to their own standard, so long as there are people who would willingly discharge the responsibility of their faith upon others, there will be a soil quite prepared to receive Romanism. Too many material interests (particularly in Italy) are bound up with the Papacy, from which it derives strength, for us to cry victory at this hour; but still it must be acknowledged that the wounds are deep. What a triumph for the Gospel is there in the statute proclaiming that all citizens are equal in the eyes of the law! What a check for the triple crown of Gregory VII. in the decree secularising Church property! What a check for the Sacred College in the refusal of the priests to abstain from celebrating the national festival, in spite of the Archbishop of Milan! And lastly, what an avowal of weakness in the funeral honours rendered to that man whom Rome had a good right to excommunicate, and for whom five-sixths of the excommunications she has been fulminating were intended! II. In what measure have our efforts to spread the Gospel been crowned with success? Here I must state that the glowing accounts published in many religious journals are neither more nor less than pure fictions. No; it is not by 20,000 that we can count those who embrace the Gospel. The truth is, that there may be about the tenth part of that for the whole of Italy. No; there are not multitudes pressing to listen to the good news. No; it is not fishing with the net, but with the line. All the brilliant reports on the progress of the Gospel in Italy are a mirage! Garibaldi knew full well to what feelings he was appealing in England when he uttered the famous words, 'The Bible is the cannon which will free Italy.' He would not repeat it in Italy, for he knows with what haughty disdain those words would be received. It cannot be otherwise. Many years and many labours are necessary for the establishment of the religion of Christ. I do not complain that the foundation has been too deeply laid. On the contrary, I should wish it deeper. But we cannot expect to reap when we have hardly sown. The Spirit of God has not been restrained from us; but where is the great outpouring to form such a work? As for time (that great agent with which God Himself reckons), our oldest stations have not been established twelve years. Then consider the state in which Italy is; is it not full of scepticism? We have to create anew the conscience in Italy. We have to combat that facility with which Italians take hold of everything by the imagination. In spite of this, I affirm that the evangelization of Italy is not a still-born work, if we look back upon the last ten or twelve years. Let us suppose an Italian who might have left Genoa twelve years ago, and who, from that time, might have been hid in some unknown country of Africa, without any communication with his native land. Well, twelve years ago Rome had absolute power throughout the Peninsula. There did indeed exist, in a few Alpine valleys, a little people, who had never bowed beneath her sway, but they were obliged to celebrate their worship in a foreign language. Here and there were a few pulpits, generally in an ambassador's mansion, and only existing under condition of not endangering the faith of the world. Not even a shadow of liberty of the press. The same vigilance in regard to the introduction of the Holy Scriptures into the country—the most worn-out copy was stopped at the frontier. No civil rights for proselytes, but exclusion from all professions, and vexations of all sorts; and when death put a period to these sufferings, a ditch in a high road, dug during the night, received the man who had dared to turn his back upon the infallible Church! Our emigrant returns. At Marseilles he finds bales of Bibles. Who are these books for? He thinks to himself, 'for Maltese Protestants,' and he continues his voyage; but at Genoa he finds the same bales again; they enter the harbour, and no one opposes their passage; no custom-house officers come to inspect their contents. He hears that since his departure the Word of God has been printed in all parts of the country, and that millions of tracts have been distributed, that new Protestant churches are being built, that religious meetings are held even in the villages, that the efforts of the priests have almost everywhere failed, before the determination of the Government to maintain liberty of conscience, and that quite lately an ex-Catholic, well known for his zeal for the Gospel, has been appointed professor in a university; and lastly, that a Protestant Theological College is established in a palace that formerly belonged to a cardinal! Let us suppose that our exile has also learned to love the Bible, and that he has not ceased, during his twelve years of absence, to pray for his beloved Italy: with what joy will he welcome these great things? and will he not feel the need of retiring to give thanks? And we, carnal-minded men that we are, who wish to reap before we have sown, we would disdain these small beginnings! III. The difficulties of the work. 1. The instinctive repugnance with which the Italians view Protestantism is the great argument to which our brethren who have quitted the Vaudois Church (I say it without rancour) appeal. But those who would not be Protestants have not escaped the appellation of 'Protestants.' On the other hand, is it certain (as M. Pilatte affirms) that the prejudice does not exist? I do not think so. There are in Italy souls seeking the Gospel, whom the word Protestant keeps away, because of the idea of infidelity that the priests have attached to this name. We must wait till true Protestantism is known. 2. Political preoccupations.—Does that astonish us? Ah! the astonishing thing is that any one should find time to think of religion in this general fermentation. But still we believe that when once the political unity shall have been attained, and that accomplished facts shall have taken the place of mere hopes, that the Divine seed will produce an abundant harvest. 3. The watchword is to avoid the religious question! Without doubt the Gospel is excellent, say many, but for the present let us adjourn this question. The only aim is national independence; and such is the dread of the Gospel message, that the preacher of the Gospel is almost confounded with the raiser of sedition! The people do not understand that the Gospel is peace. IV. Encouraging prospects. 1. The disposition of the different parties to cherish a more pacific spirit. There is no question of an alliance between the parties. There are too many recollections of the past, too many recriminations; but, thanks to the trials which have been made, and to the progress of the Gospel, the day will come when, in a confederation such as this, deputies will come and say, 'We are the members of the Italian Branch of the Alliance.' 2. Fruits of the transference of the Theological College to Florence. Some friends have blamed us for not remaining at La Tour, but had we done so, it would have been an abdication of the duty of evangelising Italy, a duty imposed on us by our father-

When the question was brought before our Synod, no discussion arose on the subject, for it was one of those questions which impose themselves with all the force of an absolute necessity! In future our young men will not present themselves to Italy as strangers; they will learn to speak the Italian language in the Athens of Italy, and will claim the right which we (more than any other) have of evangelising Italy. 3. The manner in which the question of the separation of Church and State is being discussed. It is a question of life and death for the nation. As regards religious liberty, Count Cavour always made liberty of conscience respected. Baron Ricasoli has surrounded this precious liberty with even greater guarantees than his predecessor. [Here the speaker read a letter addressed by Ricasoli to the Moderator of the Vaudois Table, which contains, among other things, these remarkable words: 'I consider liberty of conscience as the principal product of modern civilisation, and I believe it is destined to restore unity to the Church. For my part, I am happy to live in a time when every one, respecting the sanctuary of conscience, lends a hand to every thing just.'] 5. The chasm which is widening between the Papacy and the country." The speaker concluded by saying, "Two facts remain—a large country opened to the Gospel, and the command of the Master to preach the Gospel to every creature."

Professor MAZZARELLA then spoke in Italian. His address was characterised equally by fervid eloquence and piety, and produced a thrill of emotion in his audience.

Professor GREYMONAT (Florence) said: "The principle on which our work in Italy reposes is perfectly expressed by the subject proposed: 'The Gospel and Italy.' 1. The Gospel, and not Rome. Rome has ascribed to the Church all the glory due to the Gospel. What but the reality can overthrow this fiction? 2. The Gospel, and not Protestantism. Protestantism is only a particular form of Christianity. We shall do all in our power to avoid the errors into which Protestantism has often fallen."

Professor REVEL then spoke: "It is often said that Italy must be evangelised by Italians; but the Italians who are fit to evangelise their country are very few. Besides, a certain experience is required in these things. My colleague (M. Mazzarella) and I are at work in the heart of Italy, and we have come to say to our brethren of different denominations, Is it not the time for you to send us your young men? It will be said they are foreigners; if that argument holds good the Apostles should not have left Palestine. Send us your young men. 'You are a professor,' it will be said; 'you want pupils in your college.' I answer, 'If you send them, they will see our weaknesses;' but what does it matter, we shall work together, and when they have seen our difficulties, they will tell you of them."

Pastor SCHMIEDHEINI, from the valley of Bregaglia, in the canton of the Grisons, said: "I come from a little Italian valley in the Grisons; but though insignificant, I think it is worthy of your sympathy, as being, along with the valley of Peschiaro, the only remaining fruit of the Reformation in Italy in the sixteenth century." The speaker went on to give a sketch of the origin of these churches, and of their present religious condition. "When the celebrated Paul Vergerio was obliged to flee from the pursuit of the Holy Office in Italy, he took refuge in the Grisons, and spread the Gospel there. Therefore these little isolated churches continue to look with gratitude and sympathy to Italy as their mother in the faith." The work was also continued by the Italian exiles who fled across the frontiers by thousands. "The Italians have also given us Diodati's translation of the Bible, though we know it best in the elegant binding of the British and Foreign Bible Society."

Pastor MALAN, Moderator of the Vaudois Church, concluded by an earnest appeal to the sympathy of the brethren.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 6.

MORNING MEETING.

DR. MERLE D'AUBIGNE ON CALVIN AND THE GENEVAN REFORMATION.

M. CHRIST SARASIN, State Councillor, and Director of the Missionary Institution of Basle, occupied the chair at the morning session, at St. Pierre. The proceedings commenced with singing, and reading and prayer by Pastor Viguet, of Geneva.

DR. MERLE D'AUBIGNE read the report upon "The Character of the Reformation and of the Reformer of Geneva," as follows: "No one will think it strange that Evangelical Christians from all countries, meeting together in Geneva, should desire to recall the character of the Reformer and of the Reformation of Geneva. The Alliance counts among its members brethren whose opinions do not entirely agree with those of Calvin. I must confess that at first this thought troubled me."

for I do not wish to wound any one's conscientious convictions; but I soon felt relieved when I remembered that in the rich development of Calvin's doctrine there are points which are common to all Christians. I shall not speak of Geneva in the eighteenth century; hardly even of Geneva in the sixteenth. I shall speak of the Reformation which has proceeded from Geneva. Calvin, besides his work in our city, received from God a universal task. His essential work was the new development of the Reformation, characterised by a tendency to bring into union all Evangelical Christians. Luther was the first to fire off the alarm gun. Farel and Zwingle had done the same. At their cries the nations had arisen from a sleep of centuries; they had flown to arms, but many had taken wrong ones. Some seized the Bible, others lighted faggots, others drew the sword; there was a great tumult, tremendous disorder. Then Calvin appeared, calm in the midst of this agitation, advancing firm and intrepid among the balls that were whizzing on the right and on the left; he was calm, because he took the infallible word of his Heavenly Captain. Nothing disturbed the majesty, the serenity of his bearing. He fixed his eyes upon the combatants, and sought out the friends and enemies of the good cause. The divided leaders had to be reconciled, and obedience to the Supreme Head was claimed from all. After the great Luther, the indefatigable Farel, the bold Zwingle, comes the conciliatory (modérateur) Calvin. Luther, Zwingle, Farel, hold the sword, Calvin holds the sceptre. What would have become of the Reformation without this leader? Despotism would have destroyed the Church. Calvin was like one of those salubrious winds which chase away the miasma, and after which some broken branches are perhaps found; but the air has been purified. This brings us back to the Alliance. The idea of the Alliance (which will always be greater than the Alliance itself) was embodied in Calvin. He wished to save the Church by inward unity—unity in knowledge, as regards doctrine; unity in charity, as regards persons. Thus, you see, Calvin was not a piece of copper money, circulating through all hands, but a mine. What was the characteristic of Calvin's teaching at Geneva? The contrary of what is generally imagined. It is thought that it was harsh, exaggerated, intolerant, while it was moderate and conciliatory. Understand what I mean. Calvin would not have made any accommodation with the Rationalists or the Papists; but except that, he sought the conciliation of opinions, and the union of Christians. M. Ernest Renan says: 'The individual right of each one to create his own symbol was hardly suspected in the sixteenth century.' But, in fact, that was the new method, not the new religion. Scripture was the touchstone by which all doctrines were to be tried. Doubt was springing up on every hand. The divided stream was forming everywhere pestilential miasmas. Calvin saw the evil in all its magnitude, and his noble soul was troubled. He uttered a cry of grief. If he went too far in his opposition, he had, at least, always in his mind the thought, shall Christianity live or die? Calvin was not exempt from errors or defects; but no one (not even Melancthon) was able to re-establish unity. He had a firm character, a well-balanced mind. Here I feel somewhat embarrassed. Calvin has been called a great theologian, and Geneva a theological city. But in our time theology is not in good odour. To animate my exposition, then, let us suppose that a conference is held here between the three great Reformers—Luther, Calvin, Zwingle—and their disciples. You will not wonder at our choosing this place. We are here in Calvin's church. From that pulpit which you see there he raised his voice against 'those brats (marmousets) who vomited out their gall against the Gospel.' From the spot on which I stand, where the sacred table was spread, he said to the libertines, 'I would sooner expose myself to death, than give that which is holy to the dogs.' I see first, on the left, a man in whom the affections are dominant, with a quick, decided look: it is Luther. On the right, I see another: his face is lighted up with intelligence, and his whole demeanour bearing the impress of the hardy sons of our mountains: it is Zwingle. Lastly, in the middle, advances slowly a man of a pale countenance, exhibiting traces of suffering, in whom the will is dominant: you have described Calvin. Let us interrogate these men. The first question we ask them is this: 'What relation is there between faith and the Scripture?' Wearied of scholastic rationalism, Luther replies, 'I am mad; I understand nothing about it: I have seen nothing, heard nothing, experienced nothing; but because God has said it, I must believe. There is no acting the doctor here; we must take off our hats. I too wanted to make a hole into heaven, and see the Almighty in His secret chamber; I became giddy. We must believe what God has said to us in the Scriptures.' At these words, Zwingle—nurtured up in the philosophy of the Greeks—frowns; he wishes the Word of God: 'But,' says he, 'must not what we are to believe be probable? Must we sacrifice the rights and the wants of the intellect? If a man be in Christ, Christ is his reason: what does he want with an external authority?' Calvin says to Luther, 'When we read the Scriptures, we must hold for a certainty that we are listening to God.' He says to Zwingle, 'Faith does not consist in ignorance, but in the knowledge of the Divine will.' Let us now interrogate them on the nature of man. All three admit the doctrine of sin; but they regard it in different aspects. Luther is overwhelmed by the thought, 'The intellect is vitiated; it cannot know God. Original sin has poisoned our whole being.' Zwingle—in love with the heroes of Pagan antiquity—says, 'Evil is a privation. Man has lost God: he is a ravaged vineyard. Calvin—giving his hand to Luther—'Yes,' says he, 'our soul is like a burning furnace throwing out smoke, and yet there are little flames (flammettes). But, in spite of the good remaining in us, it needs a new creation.' He gives his hand to Zwingle too. 'Yes,' says he, 'there are sparks of light in our soul; but all that is stifled by the darkness.' Shall we ask them a third question? 'You admit a work of Christ—the atonement; and a work of Christ in us—regeneration. Which is first in rank?' Luther answers, 'The atonement; for God cannot see our sins.' Zwingle does not approve—'The essential thing is to feel our faith.' Doubtless you do not mean to say, O noble Zwingle, that the death of Jesus Christ is useless; but that it becomes so if we do not believe in Him? From that there might arise a formal morality. Calvin again solves the problem: 'In Christ we have a double grace—reconciliation by His death, and sanctification by His Spirit.' Shall we question them as to the nature of Christ? But I hear a voice—'To the point! To the point! Question them upon election.' There are antinomies in the relation of God and man. Many persons have their minds so constituted that they cannot admit the two terms. You admit the sovereign will of God, but will you deny the freewill of man? Calvin admits the two, but he insists particularly on the human part. 'Let us contemplate,' says he, 'the cause of the condition of man in his corrupt nature, where it is evident, rather than in the predestination of God, where it is hid.

The election of God is the cause of salvation; faith is the sign of it; and the certitude of salvation is in the faith of the heart.' It is therefore an exaggeration to say that redemption loses its significance in Calvin's doctrine, and that man disappears in the great drama of the world. But it is particularly in the discussion upon the Lord's Supper that the conciliatory character of Calvin appears. Luther admits the real presence in the Supper; Zwingle considers the sacrament as a memorial; Calvin admits the spiritual presence of Christ—the presence which comes from faith, and exists by virtue of the Holy Spirit. The conference is ended. Let us form the jury. Calvin is not above or below Zwingle or Luther, but between them. God and man are the two poles of religion. Religion is a Divine and a human fact; and while Luther looked particularly at the Divine side, and Zwingle particularly at the human side, Calvin looked at both sides. He completes the two Reformers, and embraces them in Christ. Calvin's task was of the greatest importance. That his work might be strong, it required to be well-balanced. The balance of forces gives power. Coal alone is not enough to make steel, neither is iron, but in combining them you obtain a solid blade. Calvin forged a sword of Damascus, and will make the Reformation triumph to the ends of the earth. Calvin loved his brethren, and wished to unite them. He began with those who were nearest him—his two principal colleagues. What ardent affection there was between these three, Calvin, Viret, and Farel! 'When I exercised the pastorate with you two it seemed to me as if we were only one.' When the first circle was gained, Calvin cast his eyes farther off upon German Switzerland, where a great discussion was dividing the Church. Zurich will hear no one but Zwingle; Berne is for Luther; Basle rejects Luther and Zwingle, and follows Oecolampadius. Calvin sets to work; Zwingle is dead, and Bullinger has succeeded him. 'I press you to my heart,' writes Calvin. 'Our churches must be united. Have we not the same Christ?' After useless efforts he returns to Geneva. God takes from him his last child, then his wife Idelette. 'I have lost her,' he writes to Viret—'she who would never have left me, either in exile, in poverty, or in death.' God upheld him. A gleam of reconciliation appeared in the direction of Zurich. Calvin sets out; conferences are established at Zurich. 'We are agreeing,' writes Calvin. In all the churches of the Confederation, in France, in England, it is repeated that the Church was found in living communion with Christ its Head, an internal unity. It is said that Calvin is the chief and the author of it (dux et autor erat). Let us pass on to the third circle. But how could he bring over Dr. Luther? Calvin loved Luther. The latter had published a book in which he attacked Zwingle and Eccolompadius. 'Consider,' said Calvin to them, 'what kind of man Luther is. Even if he were to call me a devil, I would not cease to honour him.' Will Calvin tame this bull, who, with a movement of his muscular neck, tosses in the air whoever he likes? Calvin writes to Luther, in 1545: 'If I could fly to you, and enjoy the happiness of your society but for a few hours! But it will only be in heaven. Adieu, most renowned minister of Christ, my ever venerated father!' The union could not, however, be accomplished, for this reason: Calvin had thought proper to send his letter to Luther through the gentle Melancthon. And as Luther was at that time furious against the Swiss theologians, Melancthon dared not give it to him. He returned it to Calvin, with a note ending thus: 'I can only think of exile.' Thus the only letter which Calvin wrote to Luther was not read by him. Calvin answered Melancthon: 'Even if your Pericles chooses to throw the thunderbolt, we all love him; we shall always be glad to see him occupy the first place.' Luther at length allows himself to be moved. It was on a Monday, in 1545, as Luther was returning from a lecture he had been giving on one of the first chapters of Genesis, he passes before the shop of the bookseller Maurice, who had just returned from the book-fair of Frankfort. 'Well, Maurice, what are they saying down there at Frankfort? Are they always speaking about the Wittenberg monk?'—'I have not heard about him,' answered the bookseller; 'but they speak of Calvin: I have brought from the fair his book "De Cœnâ." Luther began to read; then, returning the volume, 'Maurice,' said he, 'that man is pious and learned, and I might have entrusted him with the affair from the first.' Melancthon made a change in the Augsburg Confession in favour of Calvin's views, and at present the most illustrious doctors of Germany profess a doctrine upon the Lord's Supper very similar to that of Calvin. I ought to speak of Calvin's influence upon France, Scotland, &c., but I must forbear. A few words only on England. In

1548, Calvin proposed to Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, appointed Protector at the death of Henry VIII., a plan for the Reformation of England; and Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, conceived the thought of crowning the work of concord begun by Calvin. Beginning by the teaching of the Gospel as the true means of establishing peace, he convoked a council to restore the truth. Calvin wrote: 'I would not hesitate to go across ten seas for the union of Christians. But here my sight fails; my imagination grows confused. Not far from the place in which we are—upon that height at Champel—are flames, an executioner, soldiers, an excited multitude, a victim! O men, what are you doing? It is a heretic, condemned by the ecclesiastical tribunals of France, and put to death by the magistrates of Geneva. Wretched men! by what right is this pile erected? The majesty of God has been offended. But when did God charge you to revenge offences committed against Him? I seem to see Christ at the foot of that scaffold crying, 'Fools, what are you doing? the Son of Man came not to destroy, but to save!' For nearly ten centuries it was believed that human tribunals ought to condemn doctrines contrary to the Scriptures. Let us deplore this error; but let us not boast: let us not get up on the stilts of our age, to chastise the giants of the sixteenth century. The death of Servetus was a remnant of Popery. It is not the less true that Calvin revived the Gospel torch. He diffused its light throughout the world, and this torch is at the same time that of civilisation and liberty!'

At the close of this address, the meeting, under deep emotion, rose, and sang with enthusiasm a portion of Luther's celebrated hymn, "A strong tower is our God" (Ein feste burg ist unser Gott).

PROFESSOR HERZOG AND DR. BUNGENER ON CALVIN AS AN AUTHOR.

Professor HERZOG, of Erlangen, indicated the qualities of Calvin as a commentator. "Conscientiousness is the essential characteristic of Calvin's writings. Calvin said, 'We need conscience more than knowledge.' He has left commentaries on all the books of Scripture, except on the Apocalypse. Why this omission? He was afraid of obscuring the sense of the book by too imperfect a work."

Dr. BUNGENER, of Geneva, went rapidly over the works of Calvin. In the first period he placed the institutes which have given t'

Reformation the consciousness of its legitimacy. "The second period embraces his popular satirical works, in which the French Reformer's style resembles somewhat that of Luther; but, in spite of this witty vein, Calvin only excels in serious works. The third period is that of the commentaries on the New Testament. They mark a revolution in the study of the Bible; it is good sense dethroning scholastic erudition, the intellect seeking truth by the shortest road; Christian experience questioning itself, that it may gather up only what is useful and edifying. Lastly, in the fourth period, are the commentaries on the Old Testament. There, also, we find simplicity, practical good sense, truth not everywhere found, but everywhere looked for. Take, for example, the commentary on the Psalms. From them we may gather two lessons. First, if we wish to be powerful in the world, let us, like Calvin, avoid everything that is of a sterile nature, let us study our own hearts well, and let there always be between us and our hearers a profound unison. Second, let the thoughts of God's presence always accompany the work we have to do, and let us count upon help from on high."

Pastor PUAUX, of Mulhausen, concluded by a word of exhortation to union.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

ADDRESSES ON SABBATH SCHOOLS.

The place of meeting was again at St. Peter's Cathedral; the Chairman, Pastor VALETTE, of the Lutheran Church of Paris. Pastor P. COOK, of Calais, read a report on "Sabbath-schools." "Some people trace the origin of Sabbath-schools from Charles Borromeo, who died in 1554. Those which he founded still exist at Milan, but they are a sort of catechising. Laymen have no share in them. Towards the middle of the seventeenth century several schools were established by Christians. From 1780 to 1790 Sabbath-schools were established at Copenhagen, and the royal family were in the habit of frequenting them." M. Cook then spoke of the efforts of Raikes in England, and of the work in Scotland, in the United States, and in France. In the last-named country there are 544 schools, 400 of which belong to the Reformed Church. The speaker then glanced at the work of Sabbath-school instruction in other countries—Germany, Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland.

Pastor NAGEL, of Neufchâtel, insisted on the dangers that the modern mode of education involves to the happiness of the child, and stigmatised the vanity which parents encourage in them in regard to dress.

Pastor MONTANDON, of Paris, President of the Paris Sabbath-schools, spoke on the necessity of labouring for the conversion of the children, and the advantages arising from the cultivation of sacred singing.

Mr. W. H. WATSON, Secretary of the London Sunday-school Union, spoke—1, on the maintenance of the sanctity of the Lord's day; 2, of the importance of gathering into the school all children and young people; 3, of rendering the Sunday-school a more exclusively religious institution.

Pastor LECOUTRE, of Geneva, spoke on the necessity of forming the conscience of the child, so as to bring him to Christ. We must begin by putting the child under the law; yet without leaving the essential parts of the Gospel in the background.

Pastor C. DE FAYE, of Lyons, spoke on the aim of Sabbath-schools. Scripture teaches us that the thing to be aimed at can only be the conversion of the child. Having quoted Calvin and Viret, he pointed out the means to be taken to arrive at this end. Among the qualifications of teachers were urged the love of the children, simplicity in the exposition of truth, conscientious preparation, and prayer.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.

MORNING MEETING.

DR. DE PRESSENSE ON RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

The Conference met at the Cathedral: Pastor DU PASQUIER, of Neufchâtel, presided.

After devotional exercises, a paper was read by Dr. EDMOND DE PRESSENSE,* of Paris, on "Religious Liberty Considered as the Condition of the Peace and Security of States." "A few years ago this subject would not have found place in an assembly such as this, where everything calculated to divide is carefully excluded. If we look back but a short distance into the past, we shall find that the words 'religious liberty' were a bone of contention even among the children of the Reformation. It is not so now, and this fact shows with what rapidity the light has broken in upon us. Let us be calm. Nothing will be spared to secure the success of this great cause, so closely allied to that of Christianity itself. You have seen Europe shaken—a fearful agitation spread from country to country, as with the force of a tempest. Well! all this is nothing compared to what you will see in the future, for the accomplishment of this glorious design. Our duty is to take part in this movement. We are writing the second chapter of the 'History of the Reformation.' We are taking up the work of our fathers, to correct and develop it. We are bringing out the true mind of Jesus Christ upon an essential point, and we are clearing this Divine religion from an opprobrium which has too long been attached to it; for, let us never forget that liberty is the honour of the truth, while despotism—I mean the despotism it claims and makes use of, not that to which it submits—is its shame and disgrace! I must not forget that my task is to demonstrate that the interest of the State counsels it not to grant (that is an original right, and does not depend on its good pleasure), but to recognise religious liberty. Am I therefore condemned to bring this great question down to the proportions of a vulgar utilitarianism? No; for this subject is of an order so elevated, that it becomes indistinguishable from justice itself. It is a duty to respect the powers that be, but we must honour them without servility! We must, first of all, explain clearly what we understand by religious liberty. There are two serious mistakes, the first fallen into by religious men, the second by statesmen. From the incontestable principle of the sovereignty of the truth, the conclusion is drawn that error has no right in the world, and must, therefore, be proscribed. This is a miserable sophism. We quite agree that truth is sovereign, but we must know if it is a material or a moral power. Unless we confound the body with the soul we must recognise the radical impotence of religious oppression. Christianity is a religion of love; a love which is not the freewill offering of one heart to another, is a mockery and a sham. Therefore the religion of love is above all the religion of liberty 'Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life,' could never have founded a religion which would do violence to the will. The second misunderstanding consists in identifying religious liberty with liberty of conscience, without recognising that the collective profession and the free propagation of one's religious belief, whatever it may be, are the first consequences of the rights of conscience. I do not thank the State for granting me liberty of belief; I might as well, as has been said, be grateful to a school of medicine if they were to decree the circulation of the blood! A great favour indeed to grant what cannot be denied! Let us, then, proclaim aloud, that what we claim under the name of religious liberty is not only liberty of conscience, as regards the inner man, but the right to tell, to proclaim, to publish, our faith by all the means in our power, to make an active, energetic propaganda, whether it be agreeable or otherwise, to a greater or less number of our fellow-citizens. This seems the abomination of desolation to the wise and prudent, who have been trained to moderation, in the administrative working of our centralised States, and are imbued with all the greatness and generosity of the bureaucratic genius. It will surely be granted that nothing is so troublesome as undertaking what one is not called to do, and going out of one's natural vocation. Such is the position of a State which, instead of simply admitting the rights of conscience, and giving religious liberty up to its own resources, pretends to rule and control the use of it. To do so it must become a theologian, discuss and appreciate doctrines, examine and weigh their value, and compare the diverse religious tendencies which knock at its door for authorisation. The State is everybody, the whole of the citizens represented by the Government; consequently, the modern State is a chaos of contemporary thought. Where has such a general, such a prefect, or such a minister, gone through his theological studies? Taken altogether, do they know any better? Remember that the Theological State par excellence is called the Lower Empire (le Bas Empire). The modern State is not the ancient State, nor the State of the middle ages. Christianity and the Reformation have given it a basis entirely different from that on which it rested, before the new and Divine principle (revived by the great movement of the sixteenth century), yet implanted in the world, had saturated and penetrated with its influence the very air we breathe. The total subordination of the individual to the social power is no longer possible, since Christianity has awakened the conscience. It follows that every State which refuses to grant full religious liberty puts itself in opposition to the aspirations of modern society. Those who claim unrestricted religious liberty often hear public morals invoked against them. Touching solicitude! An impure fiction may have its editions multiplied, a theatrical piece may corrupt an immense audience every evening; public morals have nothing to do with that! But a loving man gathers a few of his fellow-citizens to hear the Gospel, and immediately down all the administrative line of a great country there rises to heaven a cry of indignation: 'Public morals! public morals!' But the refusal of religious liberty is also a principle of social disorganization. The State is a providential, Divine institution; it is therefore important that its legislation should not contain any flagrant contradiction of the law of God. Lastly, the blessing of God cannot rest upon States which refuse to acknowledge the first rights, not so much of man, as of God." Dr. de Pressensé concluded by an eloquent appeal to his hearers to assist in propagating these principles: "Let not the moral evidence of the rights of conscience delude us. We are still far from the time when they shall be universally recognised. In Roman Catholic Europe religious despotism is everywhere losing ground. Austria will soon have torn to pieces the Concordat which answered all the wishes of Rome. Italy will perhaps outstrip us all, if she follow the impulse given her by the great Minister she has lost. But, on the other hand, we have Spain, which is dishonouring herself by a real persecution; at this moment several of our brethren are waiting an infamous condemnation—infamous I mean for those who will pronounce it, and for the country that will suffer it. In France we have the finest definitions of legal rights, written on paper; they are inscribed at the head of the constitution—the Senate is appointed to protect them. Unfortunately, we have also a certain circular which withdraws in fact what is conceded in law. We have the subaltern administration, which gives the practical commentary upon the principles of which we are so proud. In Prussia an immense stride has been made, but neither Hanover nor Mecklenburg has abandoned the exclusive system, which it becomes a State religion to practice. We are on the threshold of a new era. What a spectacle do we see in the dying throes of the oldest and most consummate of religious despotisms: in this convulsion too, more remarkable as regards consciences than with regard to facts (for the great events are those going on within, not those without). We hear the representatives of the Romish hierarchy uttering cries of terror. The world is saying, 'The corner-stone of that religion is nothing else than material power,' and thus scepticism increases, and comes sneering to pick up dead beliefs on the battle-field of religious strife. For the glory of Christ a protest must be uttered, and it must be heard! I end with an historical trait. One day, at Rome, an old man leaning on a crutch stopped at the foot of the staircase leading to the palace of the Popes. Suddenly he threw away his crutch, and walked up the stairs with a firm, vigorous step. It was Sixtus V., the indomitable Pope. Christianity has too long been the old man of whom I speak. Let it throw far away the crutch—be it oppression or the sceptre—then it will walk upright, and the old man will appear young, with the youth of liberty and of eternity!"

THE IMPRISONED PROTESTANTS IN SPAIN.

Dr. MERLE D'AUBIGNE called attention to the fact that some thirty or forty persons in Spain had been arrested and imprisoned in Barcelona, Granada, and other cities, for simply reading their Bibles in common. The Procureur-General had demanded the punishment of four or five years' imprisonment against these men, against whom no accusation could be brought as to their having done anything contrary to the civil or political authority, or against the Church as recognised by the State. It was only proper that an assembly of Christians of all countries, who had met at Geneva, where religious liberty was fully known and appreciated, should express sentiments of profound affection and fraternal love to their suffering brethren in Spain, and should offer prayer to God for their consolation and support. It was proposed that an address should be sent by the Alliance to the Congress of Deputies in Spain, respectfully requesting them to recommend to the Queen to set these men at liberty, and to pass a law establishing freedom of religious worship. Information, he added, had been received from Spain that such an address, if well prepared, would produce a powerful impression in that country, where there was a party in existence strongly in favour of religious liberty. To show that this kind of intercession with the supreme authority of the State, on behalf of persecuted Christians, was not without success, Dr. Merle d'Aubigné referred to the case of M. Chapiot, who had that morning opened the sitting with prayer. This gentleman was imprisoned for four months, for having simply preached the Word of God with three others in a way not authorised by the French Protestant Church, and he would have remained a much longer period in prison but for the intervention of two persons, one of whom had an audience with the Emperor of the French.

M. ADRIEN NAVILLE then submitted a resolution expressing the lively sympathy of the Conference with the Christians imprisoned in Spain, and protesting, before Christian Europe, against their seizure, "so contrary to the spirit of the age and of the Gospel." The resolution went on to recommend the assembly to pray for their Spanish brethren, and to suggest that active demands should be made for their restoration to liberty.

The resolution was then put, when the entire meeting rose from their seats, and elevating their right hands in affirmation, passed it unanimously.

Prayer was then offered up for the Spanish brethren by Dr. CESAR MALAN, and the Conference proceeded to the DISCUSSION ON RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Pastor VIGUET, of Geneva, refuted the two objections—1. We plead a cause which is already gained. 2. We put the question on the ground of material interests. Vinet says, "Supreme utility is being just, and what is just ends by being of the greatest social utility."

State-Councillor GROEN VAN PRINSTERER, from the Hague: "As a friend and defender of religious liberty under all its forms, I accept that liberty when the Gospel gives it me, but I suspect it when the revolution promises it me. The revolution starts from the independence of man to reach the idolatry of man collectively. Ought the Christian Church, on account of the passing tolerance granted by the revolution, to contribute by her silence to favour social disorder? Let us distinguish the spirit of revolution from that of liberty. Let us unite liberty with faith; they ought to be inseparable. The inscription round the Dutch florin sums up my idea: 'Leaning on the Bible, we defend liberty.'"

M. HENRY SERMENT, advocate, of Geneva, showed that despotism is the parent of infidelity, and insisted on the duties imposed on us by our liberty.

At the close of the sitting a collection was made at the doors in behalf of the inhabitants of Glaris, many thousands of whom have been rendered houseless and destitute by an extensive conflagration, which has almost destroyed the entire town.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Conference met at the Oratoire, Professor GUYOT (Neuchâtelais), of Princeton, U.S., presiding. A report was read by the Rev. Dr. BAIRD, of New York; subject: "The Influence of Civil and Religious Liberty on Catholicism in the United States." After some historical details, the Doctor proceeded to show that Roman Catholicism gradually lost its influence on its adherents on their arrival in America, where religious liberty is universally recognised, and that but for the continual tide of emigration from Catholic countries it would be entirely extinguished.

Dr. MILES G. SQUIRE was introduced as having been sent from Geneva, in the State of New York, and a letter of salutation from his Church to the brethren in "Geneva of the Old World" was read. Dr. Squire confined his paper to a consideration of the present aspect of political affairs in America, which he attributed to the institution of slavery. He said: "The South has separated from us, and the world must know that slavery is at the base of this commotion. It must also know that while Italy is freeing herself, and the Czar is liberating his serfs, an effort is also being made in free America to break the chains of the unhappy negro race. Slavery is no more necessary to labour in the South than it is anywhere else. Liberty is essential to humanity. The opposite principle is false; it is too late in the day to constitute a Government on the principle of the perpetuity of slavery. The stars in their courses would fight against it."

Dr. URWICK, of Dublin, expressed his satisfaction with the decided tone of the speaker on the question of slavery, and proposed a resolution that the paper should be printed forthwith and "circulated throughout the world."

Some discussion ensued as to the inconvenience which would arise in taking a step of this kind, without consultation with the General Committee of the Alliance, whose exclusive province it is to decide upon the publication of the papers laid before the Conference, and at the suggestion of M. NAVILLE, the resolution was withdrawn, and the subject referred to the General Committee.

The Rev. Dr. KERR, of Illinois, read a paper strongly condemnatory of slavery.

Sir CULLING EARDLEY said he had experienced great relief from hearing the American Church thus declare itself. } suggested that a meeting of English and Americans should be held to consult upon the form of a resolution to be submitted to the consideration of the General Committee, embodying the feelings of sympathy of the Alliance towards America in the present crisis of her history. This suggestion was acceded to. A report of the meeting in question will be found in a subsequent page.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 8.

UNITED COMMUNION.

At two o'clock, P.M., the distribution of the Lord's Supper took place in the Salle de la Rive Droite, in which a great number of the members of the Alliance participated. After prayer by Dr. MERLE D'AUBIGNE, Pastor BARDE, of Geneva, who presided, read Matt. xxvi., and spoke upon the Alliance as exhibiting faith in love.

Drs. BAIRD and HEZOG then addressed the assembly in English and in German.

Pastor DESCOMBES, of Lyons, read the words of institution, after which the elements were blessed, and prayer was offered by Pastors Grandpierre, Kramer, Carr Glyn, and Meille, in French, German, English, and Italian. The communion was then dispensed with great order and in profound silence, only interrupted now and then by the reading of a few appropriate verses. The bread and wine were first partaken of by the ministers on the platform. They were then handed to twelve brethren belonging to different denominations, who distributed them from bench to bench among the congregation generally.

The whole was terminated by singing, and a prayer by Professor PILET.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 9.

MORNING MEETING.

ANGLO-SAXON COLONISATION AND THE DIFFUSION OF CHRISTIANITY.

The Conference assembled at St. Pierre, Lord RODEN in the chair. After devotional exercises,

The Rev. Mr. LOCOCKE, missionary from the Cape of Good Hope, read a congratulatory letter from the Churches of the Cape, and gave a brief and interesting account of the revival in that colony.

The Rev. MRS. THOMAS, of London, then read a paper, "On the Future of the Anglo-Saxon Colonies, in View of the Dissemination of Evangelical Christianity throughout the World." He remarked upon the colossal extent of the colonial possessions of Britain, and pointed out that they had been placed in our hands by Providence for a special purpose, adding that they constituted a museum containing specimens of almost every race and tongue. Colonisation was ordained of God at the first in the command, "Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it." Mr. Thomas proceeded to treat his subject under three heads: First, the growth of our colonial empire; secondly, the actual condition of its inhabitants with reference to the Gospel; and thirdly, the future assigned to it in connexion with the dissemination of Evangelical Christianity. In reference to the first point, he reminded his hearers that, on the ascension of James I. to the throne, England had no foreign possessions, and that, while Portugal, Spain, and France had successively lost their colonies, those of England had been constantly increasing, until they now embraced one-sixth of the inhabitants of the entire globe. Under the second head he stated that Britain rules over more Mohammedans than the Sultan of Turkey, more heathens than there were in Africa, and more Roman Catholics than the Pope could lay claim to. What an awful responsibility was this! He then drew a graphic picture of the deplorable insufficiency of our present means to meet this widespread spiritual destitution; and he urged upon the Christian public of Britain the duty of redoubling their efforts in the sending out of sound and faithful missionaries. The consideration of the third point, the future of our colonies, he confessed to be beset with difficulty. With the politician of the present day, the question was how best to qualify the colonies for present self-government and for future independence. But to the Christian, this was not the primary purpose for which God has given us these possessions. There was a higher aim than that of teaching men the moral duty of their social station—the preparation for a destiny beyond the grave was the end for which these myriads of human souls had been entrusted to our sway. He felt at a loss as to the most efficient means to accomplish this great object; but he would suggest as the first step towards the attainment of the final result, the evangelization of our own fellow-countrymen settled in the colonies, that they might serve as practical and living exemplars to the heathen around them of the beauty and holiness of the Christian life.

The Rev. Professor GIBSON, of Belfast, referred to the origin and early history of the Anglo-Saxon race, called as it had been by the Great Ruler of nations to occupy a conspicuous place in connexion with the civilisation and Christianisation of the world. Spain and Portugal had anticipated England by a whole century in the work of colonisation, nor was Virginia planted till 1607, a hundred and six years after Sebastian Cabot had proclaimed the existence of the New World. America was planted largely by a race of Protestant men, whose whole activity owned Evangelical religion in its grandest animating principle. Spain had possession of Mexico and of Peru a century before, but the moral forces were wanting which alone could render her colonisation a blessing to the nation. The two nations descended of the Anglo-Saxon race now shared between them almost the whole of the continents and islands of the New World. The gold discoveries, also, which had given such a mighty impetus to colonial enterprise, had been reserved to the present powerful epoch, and had the balance of power been doubtful, this alone would have turned it in favour of those nations as the masters of the world. Though far away from Europe, America occupied a most commanding position on the globe, being placed between the two barbarous and idolatrous continents—Africa and Asia. Radii drawn from its eastern, western, and southern shores reached almost all Pagan, Mohammedan, and Papal lands; while those brought up in these climatic extremes were fitted to go forth into regions of like temperature, to carry thither and teach the principles of learning, liberty, and religion. For the present, alas! America was arrested in its onward movement, and a disastrous eclipse had darkened all the western sky; but were the thunder-cloud of war dissolved, there were grounds to augur for that great community a futurity of influence and usefulness such as perhaps no nation had ever equalled. To it, as well as to ourselves, belonged the heritage of all that was most precious in the memory of our sages, and saints, and martyrs. It was impossible not to have strong faith in the recuperative powers of such a people, or to believe that at such a crisis it would be consigned to permanent retrogression and decay. With reference to the means by which evangelization in our colonial possessions and elsewhere might be best accomplished, it might be observed in general that the work of missions would, perhaps, be best accomplished by the zeal and energy of the several churches, each acting according to its own particular constitution, while at the same time each cultivated friendly relations with the rest, merging denominational aggrandisement in a desire to promote the glory of their common Lord. It was too manifest, however, that they were not sufficiently alive to their responsibility in this matter, and that the most hopeful aspects of the times—the re-opening of Japan to the intercourse of Christian nations, the signs of religious inquiry among the Mohammedan population of Turkey, the exploration of Africa from every side, the increased security and facility of Christian labour in India—all this, which one would imagine would have fired the Churches, like the opening of the last seal of prophecy, hardly kindled throughout the Christian host any perceptible enthusiasm, so immeasurably was the providential enlargement of the field of operation in advance of the agencies and resources available for its occupation. Might not the inquiry, therefore, be raised, whether there was not too much of a reliance upon established forms and usages of missionary agency, as if to keep the machinery in fair working order were equivalent to the evangelization of the world? Some such conviction seemed to have occupied the mind of the late Dr. James Alexander, of New York, when in one of his familiar letters he inquired, among other things, whether the world's conversion would not result, under God, from an action more universal, more cheap, and more flowing from great affections in every church and every member of it? And the late Dr. Addison Alexander, in his commentary upon Acts viii. 4, had remarked it was most natural to understand the verse as referring, not to preaching, in the technical or formal sense, but to that joyful and spontaneous diffusion of the truth which was permitted and required of all believers, whether lay or clerical, ordained or unordained. And did not the records of the young ages of the faith accord with this representation? The first disciples, by virtue of their discipleship, carried with them, into every region where they were scattered, the light of the glorious Gospel, and wherever they went proclaimed Christ crucified as their Lord and King. No doubt the Church, as an organization, had its special work to do in the diffusion of the truth, and it was especially devolved on her, and her distinctive function, to evangelise the nations; and doubtless there were peculiar facilities in the early times, in consequence of the unity of the Roman empire, and for other reasons, for spreading abroad the truth and publishing salvation; but the grand secret of the matter was that every one who professed the name of Jesus felt constrained to make Him known to every creature within the range of his influence. Here lay the strength of the new religion—plain, simple-hearted men, feeling in their inmost soul the power of a new life, infused that life into the very heart of society. And was there not a lesson here for the present times? While the most comprehensive plans and the most efficient organization were necessary, and while the highest order of minds, subjected to the highest preparatory training, were demanded for the work, yet what a mighty impetus would be given were there brought into the field the agency of Christian colonists going forth to plant themselves as living representatives of Christianity in Pagan lands? Here were a nobler mission for the Anglo-Saxon race than any which it ever dreamed of; and if in laying out his plans for life, every private Christian should ask himself, "Where can I do the most in my lifetime for the cause of Christ and the salvation of men," and if the answer to that question should lead him, in the light of Divine Providence, to some dark region of the earth, what an amount of consecrated zeal would thus be laid upon the altar of God, and what an augmentation of the triumphs of the cross might not be witnessed in the earth! While the time and talents of the missionaries proper should be concentrated upon the spiritual wants in the field, that moral influence which proceeded from a practical Christian civilisation would thus be superadded to their distinctive labours. Would not a wisely-conducted school of agriculture in Palestine do much for its enlightenment as to the scope and benefit in the civilising influences of Christianity? And was not Livingstone calling loudly for Christian mechanics, farmers, merchants, and manufacturers, to second his labours in Southern Africa? The genius, enterprise, science, and capital of the Anglo-Saxon race were in demand all over the world, and why should not Christian wisdom and love take advantage of all this, and use it, not for lucre, but for the benefit of mankind? When Christian responsibility in this matter should be felt, as it was in the beginning, we should witness a moral crusade before which the powers of darkness would be astonished and confounded.

The Hon. A. KINNAIRD, M.P., said he considered it his duty to bear public testimony to the missionary spirit of Germany, which had provided the most distinguished and zealous missionaries employed by the English societies for more than a quarter of a century. Nobody, speaking on missions, would forget men like Schwartz, Ziegenbalg, Weitbrecht, Leutpold, La Croix, and he wished to rectify the omission which, no doubt, had unintentionally been made by the previous speaker. He then alluded to the great nursery of missionaries at Basle and in Wurtemberg, and observed that most of the translations of the Bible in the various dialects of Asia and Africa had been made by German missionaries. The honourable gentleman also spoke on the importance of Government throwing no obstacles in the way of missionary efforts, while he maintained that Government must not itself turn missionary.

The Rev. T. R. BIRKS, of Kelshall, directed the attention of the assembly to that essential characteristic of the Christian, Humility. He suggested two motives for humiliation. 1. "For the last three hundred years God has been raising eminent men in the Church. What has been the conduct of Protestantism under their guidance? The robe of Christ has been rent in pieces, and our cry ought to be, 'Enter not into judgment with thy servants.' 2. A special call has been addressed to the Anglo-Saxon race to evangelise the world. What have we done for our colonies? On God's side there have been wonders of mercy; on man's side wonders of iniquity."

The meeting terminated by a few words from the Rev. D. WILSON, Islington, stimulating to renewed efforts.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

The afternoon meeting took place at the Oratoire. State-Councillor GROEN VAN PRINSTERER, of Holland, presided. After prayer and reading the Scriptures, a report was read by Professor FREDERIC DE ROUGEMONT, of Neufchâtel. Subject: "The Religious Condition of the Peoples of Eastern Europe and of Western Asia." No extract could give the slightest idea of the richness of this report.

Pastor MONSELL, of Neufchâtel, read a report upon the religious state of Greece, Turkey in Europe, and Western Asia. We can only repeat what we have already said of Professor de Rougemont's report.

Captain VAN DE VELDE (Holland) spoke on the necessity of Protestant asylums in Palestine, for the widows and orphans of the unhappy victims of the late massacre.

Pastor JABLONOWSKI (Russia) terminated the meeting by prayer.

SPECIAL ANGLO-AMERICAN MEETING.

While the Conference was in session, during Monday afternoon, as already reported, there was being held in the Salle de la Rive Droite a kind of international conference between the Americans and English, relative to the present condition of affairs in the States. Sir COLLING EARDLEY occupied the chair.

Dr. BAIRD, of New York, gave a brief sketch of the history of the Union, commencing with the planting of the first settlements in Virginia and Massachusetts by Cavaliers and Puritans respectively, and tracing the growth of the colonies down to the period of the War of Independence, at which time slavery existed in the whole of the thirteen States. He next remarked upon the abandonment of slavery by Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and the New England States, and then described the struggle which ensued between the North and South for the possession of the new States that were afterwards added to the Union, and which ended, as is well known, in the Missouri Compromise. To the abrogation of that compromise by Mr. Douglas he attributed all the mischief that is now afflicting the country. The question of slavery, he added, was at the bottom of the present struggle. The North sought to prevent the extension of slavery into new territories, and they made it one of the chief planks of their platform at the last presidential election. They did not seek to interfere with slavery in the States where it at present existed, because in those States it was guaranteed by the Constitution, and was therefore inviolate. The election of Mr. Lincoln gave the South a pretext to carry out what they had long contemplated, the overthrow of the Constitution and the formation of a Southern Confederacy. The argument of the Southern was that they had as much right to throw off their allegiance to the Union as the old thirteen States had to throw off allegiance to the mother country. The North, on the contrary, maintained that they had no such right; that it was a union, not a confederation of States; and that, consequently, no State was capable of independent action except in matters of internal administration. Dr. Baird eulogised the past forbearance and present activity of the Washington Cabinet, and in vindication of its policy, in not declaring against slavery, said that, in addition to its being contrary to the Constitution, such a step would cut off all hope of regaining the eleven Southern States that had seceded; would risk the loss of the four frontier States, whose influence on the South might be brought to bear hereafter; and would, moreover, lead to the danger of a servile war on the part of the slaves. It was for these reasons that the Government refrained from declaring the abolition of slavery. They did, however, take one step in that direction, by receiving fugitive slaves within the lines of the United States army, and emancipating those belonging to disloyal citizens. It would be hard war, and if they could not regain the Southern States they must make peace and do the best they could with them. But they wanted English sympathy and English prayers, and to be left free from interference by European Governments. In concluding Dr. Baird complained that the articles in the Times had done infinite mischief in America, and he also complained of observations made at the Cheever meeting in London, from which it would be inferred that the North was not sincere in its hostility to slavery.

The Rev. J. A. PRIEST, of New Jersey, after complaining of the coldness manifested by the mother country towards her daughter at the hour of trouble, proceeded to argue that the question of slavery was at the root of the American war. The Federal Government, however, had no political right to declare the entire abolition of slavery in the different States, which were to a great extent independent of each other; and if it was contended that it ought to fall back upon the moral right, the argument would apply to England as much as to the American Government itself, and Great Britain would be bound by force of arms to suppress slavery in the Southern States. He desired no sympathy from Great Britain in regard to the political aspect of the question, but he confidently asked for her sympathy and her prayers in respect to its moral aspect, as involving the great question of human freedom, Sir COLLING EARDLEY said that if any act could be done by the Northern Government to commit it against slavery, as far as it could constitutionally go, it would greatly strengthen the hands of their friends in England. He should be glad to hear that every slave coming within the boundaries of the Northern States was declared ipso facto a free man.

Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Carr Glyn, Dr. Fisch, the Hon. Arthur Kinnaid, Dr. Squires, the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, Rev. W. Arthur, R. A. Macfie, Esq., Dr. Cairns, and the Rev. Morton Brown; the general sentiment of the speakers being the

so far as the question of slavery was concerned, the sympathies of the Alliance would be entirely with the North, but that the members should express no opinion on the political bearings of the struggle. Dr. Brown added that Englishmen were apt to regard their brethren in the North as a little lax in reference to slavery; and would be more sympathising with them if they did not so persistently fall back upon the Constitution, but would show themselves prepared at the right time to reconsider any portion of it which was in opposition to the law of God.

Dr. SAWTELL, of America, delivered a short but effective speech: "Give us your earnest prayers; learn to grow your own cotton; and there will soon be an end to the question of slavery."

The resolution adopted by the Conference, as the result of this meeting, will be found at the close of our report.

MORNING MEETING.

PASTOR BAUTY ON DOCTRINE AND LIFE.

St. Peter's Cathedral was this morning the place of meeting. The Chairman was Pastor GUILLAUME MONOD, of Paris. After singing and prayer, Pastor BAUTY, of the Canton de Vaud, read a paper on the "Importance of the Unity of Doctrine and Life to the Prosperity of the Church." The reverend gentleman spoke as follows: Doctrine manifested by the life, and life springing from doctrine, such are the two sides of my subject. I. Doctrine is the whole of the teachings of God, revealed in Scripture. Life is the effect of this doctrine on the mind and heart. It is rather to be felt than defined. Within, it is love to God and our neighbour, along with hatred to evil; without, it is the manifestation of the power of Christ, compelling the sinner to cry, "What shall we do?" But can doctrine be separated from life? Alas! it may be transformed into a cold orthodoxy, and that happens, first, by an exaggerated reaction against error. When the Gospel is preached for the first time it is opposed by unbelief and self-righteousness, which both affirm the natural strength of man for good. If the evangelist always confronted these errors as the Gospel does, doctrine would never be separated from life. But the Gospel is preached in a fragmentary, and consequently imperfect manner. The better to convince men of sin, the preacher makes no account of what sin has left to him—I mean, the innate idea of God and the conscience. But in passing over these two truths, he is putting himself in opposition to Paul, who did not accuse the Athenians of Atheism, but of being too superstitious. (Rom. ii. 14, 15.) Paul appeals to the judgment of the Corinthians: "I speak as unto wise men," and the Book of Acts praises the Bereans for searching the Scriptures to see if what Paul said was true. We do not speak to men about mankind as the Bible does. Are we showing them their incapacity for good? We make an abstraction of the numerous appeals addressed to them in Scripture, and of declarations, like the following, of St. Paul: "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway." Wishing to be more Evangelical than the Gospel, we prepare a reaction in favour of infidelity and Pelagianism. 2. Doctrine may be separated from life by vain refinements, and subtle distinctions made for the purpose of guarding the truth. This kind of orthodoxy prescribes the very words we must use. All is regulated for us, even to the very physiognomy and the monotonous tones of a lifeless faith. Hence arises a reaction against doctrine—people's minds pass to a vague and almost imperceptible system of dogmatics. This is how we return to dead morality, to sermons upon conversation, on temper, to "the gentleman in black, who says very proper things," as Le Maistre phrases it. From one refinement to another, we come to fear certain lessons taught in the Bible, of which we dread the exaggeration. Strange short-sightedness! Will people not see in the Bible what we are hiding from them? Explain, do not suppress; do not be afraid of the promise, "Whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, he shall not lose his reward;" nor of Paul's declaration to the Corinthians, "He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly;" nor of that other, "He hath dispersed abroad, he hath given to the poor, his righteousness remaineth for ever." One of the most excellent liturgies in the burial service suppresses the latter part of Rev. xiv. 13—"Their works do follow them." Our works follow us, but do not precede us. It is the grace of God which He crowns in us. To be complete is the true way of combating error. "I have heard say," writes Vinot, "that at the period when certain doctrines have fallen into disuse, it is upon them that we must insist." Such is not my opinion. I think we ought to show all, and to show all at once. Truth is truth only when it is complete. 3. Doctrine is separated from life by a mode of preaching different from that of Jesus Christ and His apostles. The Bible insists on the moral consequences of faith, and we are apt to suppress them. It speaks of love to God, and we leave that love to the mystic. Sometimes the Bible supposes faith. "Who shall abide in thy tabernacle? . . . He that walketh uprightly." Or in these words of Jesus, "They that have done good shall come forth unto the resurrection of life." The Bible goes the length of telling us, "Be ye not drunken with wine." But we do not like following it on this road. It threatens with death those who walk after the flesh, and we do not threaten. We only wish to convert, and not to guide. And again, as regards conversion, we have our methods. One is on the look-out for the timid-minded only; another sees only brands to be plucked from the burning. Terrible method! I knew a man to whom the assurance of salvation had become a snare, and who was more afraid of losing his assurance than of sinning. But, at length, his eyes were opened, and then he was satisfied with what he received from grace day by day. An orator said, "He who wants more than the charter, less than the charter, anything else than the charter, is a traitor to his country." So say we. He who wants more than the Bible, less than the Bible, anything else than the Bible, runs the risk of going astray himself, and of leading others astray. Doctrine is separated from life by—4. Theological temerity. Uzzah was struck dead by the Lord for his boldness. How many Uzzahs are there not in theology? But we must explain ourselves. We are not of those who believe that there can be no good theology, and who, to prove it, make a great deal of bad. All honour to our ancient symbols! But what we fear is, the definitions and the decisions of the time when life was ebbing away, and by which men tried to go beyond the symbols. Who can tell the evil that the period of lifeless orthodoxy in Germany, and the disputes upon "sufficient grace" in France, did to souls? The reaction provoked by Spener, by taking a direction opposed to that which that pious man expected, led to Rationalism. The revival in French Switzerland found doctrine forgotten. II. There is no life without doctrine. But this is denied by some. Hence I have to deal with Anti-Docritinalism. In past ages, when language had nothing of our mysticism, people said Christian ethics stand on their own basis. At present anti-doctrinalism borrows from the Bible the words, life, regeneration. As for doctrine, it is designated by terms which mean narrow-mindedness. In the last century every attack upon doctrine went by the name of philosophy, now it goes by that of science. Let us explain the term life. For the anti-doctrinalists it is synonymous with morality; but there is a religious morality of which the gens d'armes and the code serve as guarantee; and a philosophic morality, which is either epicurean or stoic, according to its instincts. We only speak of that life which has its source in Jesus Christ; and we affirm that that life is inseparable from doctrine. There are different classes of anti-doctrinalists: 1, the sceptics—the declared enemies of doctrine—whose morality does not rise above the observance of the civil laws; 2, those who see that morality ought to be connected with a religious faith, but who are little concerned whether this faith be Buddhist, Jewish, or any other; 3, those who retain something of faith in Jesus Christ, but whose belief can be reckoned by degrees, up from that of the Vicaire Savoyard to faith in miracles; 4, the mystics, who admit the doctrines of the Bible, but who, from fear of man, do not present it directly, but substitute for it mere speculations. [The speaker then confined his remarks to the two classes last-mentioned, and spoke of Christ as the only source of life, and of the Word and ordinances as the only means of grace and of individual regeneration.]

Dr. GRANDPIERRE, of Paris, spoke of the practical manner in which the question had been solved by the first revival, and of the attacks of which the revival has been the object. "We have been preaching doctrine too much, and works not enough, we are told. But is this censure well-founded? Let us not forget that the law can never create good works. Two facts (the Incarnation and Redemption) and two doctrines (salvation by grace and justification by faith) must be clearly taught. 'There are no almosts in the mind of God,' says Vinet. Neither are there any in His manifestation. Let us not blunt the sword. Why, then, this separation of faith and works? Who is the guilty party? The hearers, perhaps, more than the ministers. We are undergoing the influence of a speculative scepticism, which would analyse everything; and of a materialism which seeks to have its own ease in religion."

Professor LA HARPE, of Geneva, and Pastor ROGNON, of Paris, concluded with a few words, as the hour was advanced.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

The proceedings this afternoon took place in the Oratoire, Professor HERZOG, of Erlangen, presiding. They were conducted in German. After praise and prayer had been offered, and a Psalm had been read, Director TEUTSCH, of Transylvania, addressed the meeting, and the topic of the sitting was then opened by Professor DORNER: "Individualism: its Rights and Limits in Evangelical Theology, with its History in the Principal Protestant Countries." We shall not here attempt any abridgment of this profound dissertation. Dr. KRUMMACHER followed upon the same subject. Among the other speakers at this meeting was a Russian gentleman, M. VON SCHWEBS, Vice-President of the Court of Appeal, who begged that the help of God might be implored for his native land in the commotion now taking place there.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 11.

MORNING MEETING.

PRACTICAL RESOLUTIONS.

The Conference met at St. Pierre, Archdeacon BAGGESEN, of Berne, in the chair. After singing, reading, and prayer, Sir CULLING EARDLEY submitted to the Conference a series of resolutions, which had been prepared by a special committee of the Alliance. The first of these had reference to the Mortara case. Sir Culling Eardley stated that it was now a known fact that the child had never been baptized, the servant having herself avowed that she had never performed that ceremony. Cardinal Antonelli was well aware of the circumstance, and the object of the detention of the child was not, as had been maintained, to sustain the discipline of the Church, but to conceal the fact that the Pope had been deceived. The Emperor of the French had recently stated, through his secretary, M. Mocquard, to the President of the Universal Israelitish Alliance at Paris, that he had no objection whatever to the presentation to King Victor Emmanuel of a memorial in favour of the liberation of Mortara. He hoped the Emperor would do nothing to oppose the accomplishment of this object, but would adhere to the course he pursued when, as President of the Republic, he ordered the liberation of Dr. Achilli. Prayer having been offered up by Pastor MOWON for the child and its parents, the resolution was adopted. (It will be found, with the other practical resolutions, at the close of this report). The next resolution, relating to the week of prayer, was also unanimously adopted.

The third resolution gave rise to some discussion. The result was that the resolution was remitted to the committee for further consideration. We give it elsewhere as finally adopted.

ADDRESSES OF DR. BAIRD AND MR. LATROBE.

Dr. BAIRD, of New York, expressed the desire of the American Churches that their German brethren in Europe would send out missionaries to labour among the German population of the States, and also plant German colonies in various countries in South America.

The Rev. P. LATROBE addressed the meeting in German, in which language the whole of the subsequent proceedings of the sitting were conducted, expressing his thanks for the support which had been extended by Christian brethren of various countries, and especially by the inhabitants of Geneva, to the missionary efforts of the Moravians.

PROFESSOR RIGGENBACH ON GERMAN RATIONALISM.

Professor RIGGENBACH, of Basle, read a paper on the following subject: "What are the Principal Points in which the Rationalism of the Present Day, especially that of German Switzerland, is Opposed to Evangelical Christianity?" The Professor said: "It is a difficult task which has been given to me, especially as I have many friends among the representatives of this tendency which I am about to combat. It is difficult to speak the truth equally with justice and charity. I will examine the Rationalism of German Switzerland, and only here and there refer to other countries. I will not enter into an examination of elaborate scientific works, nor into the vagaries of the daily press, but stop at several publications, through which the Rationalistic theology penetrates into public life. These are 'The Church of the Present' (Kirche der Gegenwart), and since 1859, 'The Voices of the Time' (Zeitstimmen). The centre of this movement is especially at Zurich, less at Berne, and still less at Basle, where, nevertheless, the attack has been the most fierce. However, the attacks of Mr. Rumpf have condemned themselves by their own grossness. Mr. Hoerler has attacked positive Christianity by applying to it the aqua fortis of Hegelian dialectics. The Zeitstimmen represents various different tendencies. There are among the writers free and noble souls, full of courage and penetration; often, however, not free from frivolity, and more anxious to discover the inconsistencies of their adversary than to avoid them themselves. What is Rationalism? Is it the use of reason, which is so entirely indispensable, when questions are concerned which touch the human mind? No, we acknowledge the necessity of it, while we also acknowledge that our science is imperfect, and disturbed by human passion. No, the abuse of reason constitutes Rationalism, which pretends to be the source and possessor of all truth; which declares that the mind knows itself to be alone real and divine; which demands that man shall not be regarded accountable for his thoughts; which only recognises the Bible in so far as it justifies itself in the eye of reason. This is the theory which pretends that the mind by itself is fully able to measure everything which is spiritual. The spiritual father of this Rationalism is Hegel, and it is involved in his Pantheistic system. The Rationalism of our age admits that the Bible is full of ideas of the most beneficent character; but it permits itself unmeasured license in its interpretation. It finds in the Bible dogmatical forms and aspects of thought which have disturbed the principle of religion. We oppose to them especially the testimony of Jesus Christ, who even in His death and passion derived strength from Holy Scripture. We do not share the opinion of those who regard the Apostles as the mere pens of the Holy Spirit; we do not believe that even a doubtful mind can be converted by arguing for plenary inspiration; but we demand that the foundation of the Bible should be in harmony with the conscience; this substance, this foundation of the Bible, is Jesus Christ. What does Rationalism think of Him? Strauss lays down, as the key to every Christology, that the subject of all the predicates attributed to Christ is an idea, and not an individual; this is the fundamental notion of the Zeitstimmen. The principle of Christianity is, according to that periodical, the oneness of the infinite and of the finite Spirit; the eternal incarnation of Christ. Christians are the plural number of Christ. However the Zeitstimmen differs from Strauss, it does not share his absolute denial of a historical Christ. It maintains His existence; it declares that the reconciliation of God with man is accomplished in his conscience; it speaks with warmth of His love to sinners. Does it thus believe in Jesus as proclaimed by the Prophets? No, it rejects the miracles; it denies the bodily resurrection of Christ as of small importance; it contradicts the striking testimony of the Apostles. It rejects even the sinlessness of Jesus Christ; it makes to itself a Jesus after its own fashion; it is not Him whom the Apostles preached. It accepts the miracles as parables of poetical truth; it owns that Christianity offers something new, but what is new is measured by it after the thoughts of our old and corrupt nature. The results exist for them before investigation; the highest form of existence, according to their view, is human. They accept the liberty of man and deny the efficacy of prayer; they do not believe in the work of redemption; some of them deny immortality—their eternal life ceases with the last breath on earth. With regard to sin, there are some among their number who give a fascinating expression to the conviction of sin. Man, they acknowledge, is by nature sensual and without love to God; but this is not, in their opinion, a punishment from God; it is a necessary grade of human development. The doctrine of grace is, according to them, the selfishness of a man who wishes to gather where he has not sown. Redemption is no condition of salvation; it was required neither by the publican nor the sinner. But has not Christ spoken of His blood shed for the remission of sins? Can such passages be torn out of their close relation to the whole Bible? Faith with them is no internal belief, but solely an internal relation to God. But their rejection of doctrine becomes in itself a doctrine. Faith is confidence. In whom—upon whom do they rest? The pardon of God is to them nothing but an empty notion; prayer becomes impossible; it is nothing but a process of thought. In order to pray one must get out of oneself, and throw oneself into the arms of God, who sees and pardons us in reality. They pretend that the root of all intolerance is to be found in the belief in a particular and infallible revelation; but this root is not in the truth; it is in the depraved nature of man: it is not human language which produces conviction of sin; it is the influence of the Holy Spirit. These men have much zeal in preaching and love for pastoral work. Their ideal is a popular Church, a democratic constitution, which authorises every tendency. They open their doors very widely, they demand a popular synod of the people, where everybody may vote and take part in electing to office in the Church. We expect from them nothing short of an official declaration that infidelity has the same rights as vital piety. This Rationalism is powerful, not because it is profound, but because its principles are clothed in a literary form. We are asked, How can you remain in communion with them? But dare we arbitrarily and hastily exclude them and break our communion? Discipline may be exercised, not by means of ecclesiastical censures, but by solemn protests against what is false, and by bearing testimony to, and asserting what is true. Must we separate from each other? Not before it has been officially declared that the negation of truth is entitled to the same rights as its adoption. Jesus did not go out of the synagogue; He foretold His disciples that they should be driven out of them, and yet they continued to frequent the Temple. No human measures can prevent the Church from falling sick; to find health and rest, she requires the true Physician. It is not a question of preserving the old doctrines, which must be renewed and refreshed from Holy Scripture; we require to be vigilant, to have free and sincere discussion, and above all, a good periodical, which shall enlighten daily life in a Christian spirit. The Zeitschriften must remind us of the voice of eternity. We must become free from everybody, free from ourselves, but not free from the grace of God."

Pastor STRICKER, of Thurgovie: We must confess it with deep grief, the authors and the partisans of Zeitschriften are against the Lord. This doctrine spreads a miasma, which may exert a paralysing and deadening influence also upon our hearts. One defends oneself against it, but nevertheless suffers from it, if we do not let the truths act upon the heart as a power from on high, which we must appropriate to ourselves as a grace. Pantheism has a certain attraction for the imagination; one fears God's holiness and immediate presence. The doctrine of regeneration must, above all, be clear to us; we must combat and struggle against error with a regenerated heart.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

COUNT DE GASPARIN ON CONTROVERSY AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Pastor DUBY, of Geneva, presided at this meeting, which was held in the Cathedral. After devotional exercises, a report was read by Pastor F. COULIN, of Geneva, in the absence of COUNT DE GASPARIN. Subject: "Christian Brotherhood, and What should be the Character of Polemical Discussions among Christians?" Count de Gasparin's paper began by establishing, in his usual lucid and energetic style, the claims of the truth. "We are told that there is not absolute truth, that we may have opinions, not convictions. Fatal doctrine! Truth is a thing essential in itself. There are certainly great truths and little truths, but woe be to us if we disdain any truth, however small, that God has deemed worthy of revealing to us in His Word! The theory of indifferent things compromised the Reformation of the sixteenth century. It may compromise what we would venture to call the Reformation of the nineteenth. Why need we try to hide it from ourselves? There is a tendency drawing us towards peace without truth, and we are ready to content ourselves with this union at little cost. Let us seek union only in absolute obedience. Let us bow before the standard of the Scriptures, and we shall reach unity without the sacrifice of a single truth. We say that we are rising above the level of debate. I say we are sinking into the quagmires of quietism. There are Christians who do not wish to know anything of debated questions. But God requires of us that we should hold captive no truth 'in unrighteousness.' Whoever has passed in review the consequences of the errors of an Augustin, a Luther, a Calvin, a Pascal, will not doubt the necessity of our submitting ourselves to the authority of the Word of God. Doubtless our generation, weary of controversies and of empty talk, runs the risk of forgetting the dignity of discussion. But remember, Christianity is the only religion which has raised questions for discussion. Before the Gospel appeared, a death-like silence, a grave-like peace, reigned; but as soon as the Word is preached, behold souls are awakened, people begin to think and to discuss. 'These men do exceedingly trouble our city!' Paganism is done for. Along with individual faith, discussion appears. Great areas will always be marked by controversies. Let us hold fast our privilege. Christianity is not a reign of terror. It does not call us to dread ideas and debates. The peace of Christianity ought to be our delight, but that peace is purchased at the cost of war. It cannot be otherwise, so long as the prince of this world reigns. Is the peace of indifference or ignorance what we are to seek? When we have given up the authority of the Bible, shall we have peace? The truth of God ought to influence us. We must next insist upon the progress to be obtained, in order that discussions among Christians may truly become Christian discussions. 1. We must learn to doubt. Now we know only in part, and that is specially true of the things that come under discussion. Scepticism murmuring, 'There is nothing true,' is one thing; the feeling of the want of digging deep is another. What a difference would there be, if, instead of affirming, we were to doubt, so long as questions are being studied. But when we present our conclusions, as already formed, we take the air of pedagogues, of doctors. Let us remember two things. 1. That we too have passed through a state of rebellion and ignorance. 2. That there remains much for us to learn and to unlearn, and that the tone which becomes us is that of sympathy. Let us respect minds which are on the way. Despots by nature, it would seem as if we wished to cut out a uniform, and make all Christians wear it. Is that respecting the weak? Is that taking into account diversity of opinions? I have spoken of the weak—weak in regard to knowledge. Does it therefore follow that we, who deem ourselves stronger, and who have had more opportunity of studying questions, are to glory over them? No. But still Scripture declares that the weak are wrong on such and such questions. We must, therefore, not refuse them the superior knowledge we possess. But we must enlighten them before bringing them to our views, and not do violence to their consciences. We oftentimes wish to make people follow us when they are not convinced. The missionary who would overthrow an idol before overthrowing idolatry, would do more harm than good. We ought to follow the method of gradual teaching, and avoid tyranny in discussion. External unity has its value, and we ought to pursue it. But there is one thing we ought never to pursue, and that is uniformity. We want much more unity and much less uniformity. Uniformity allows us to dispense with personal faith, and we like to lengthen this, to cut that off; and yet God has not created two minds which do not differ in something, and this diversity is a pledge of progress. Imagine a Church completely uniform, and you have a gross materialism. We all know to what the attempt led. There never was entire success; but let the trial prove a warning to us. The Bible leaves a vast field open for diversity. Why should every one be obliged to adopt our language? There is a way of saying the truth without hurting any one. If we are faithful to the truth, we shall never be more faithful than the Apostle. Do we know, like him, how to make ourselves all things to all men? We do not mean to say that we ought to sacrifice what is our conception of the truth. But there is a way of doing as Paul did without that. Paul began from the Old Testament with the Jews, from the conscience with the Gentiles, always following the truth without any accommodation. Charity, that is the thing we want. To love those who contradict us, to put the most charitable interpretation on their words, to try to explain them in the least offensive sense, not to take advantage of their hasty expressions, nor exaggerate and caricature their opinions; if we were to do all this, discussion would speedily assume a different aspect. If we were to remember that we have human hearts before us, we should try to avoid wounding them. Theological hatred is celebrated among the most celebrated. It is impossible to conceive anything more detestable than the manner in which certain controversies have been pursued. In the name of God, His children have hated and torn each other to pieces. It does so much good to ourselves to believe that there is good in those whom we are combating. Again, I ask, what right have we to confound things with persons? We must say the truth to things, however hard it may be; to persons we must be courteous. Why should we not believe in straightforwardness among Christians? The Gospel teaches to see in every man a sinner like ourselves. As to the affectation of complimentary forms, I abhor it. A honeyed tone would make me regret the loss of the harsh tone; but do not on that account think that politeness is not a duty. I repeat, however, what is often wanting is perfect uprightness. What appears obscure to us we declare dazzling with light. When we are merely catching a glance of things, we say that we understand them. From that there arises an offhand way of presenting our arguments. But we deceive no one, and our assurance only brings the truth into discredit. As for our conscience, it can only lose its rectitude in these theological tournaments, and it is all the more shaken the more boldly we affirm. An adversary who does not take advantage of our ignorance or of our imprudence will appear to us a man really seeking the truth. What impression will he not make on us! What becomes of faith without good faith?" The Count then went on to point out communion with Jesus as the best remedy for evil controversy. "Were we stronger we should be milder. Were we more convinced, we should be more tractable. It is easier to discuss great than small questions. Let us hasten."

return to principles. Principles will serve in elevating us. Remember what Paul says about 'profane and vain babblings.' Whoever is not sure about his own ideas, cannot be clear about those of others, and ideas become brutal for want of being solid. The strong man likes liberty for others; the light does not hurt him. Look at those Christians whose faith is firm, how calm they are; the fever has fallen, and little passions have given place to the great passion for the truth. They can say, 'I know in whom I have believed.' They fight as peaceful men. Let us remember these things, for we have still much to discuss, and we must have holy discussions."

Pastor Tournier, of Geneva, Pastor Germond, of Vaud, Dr. Fisch, of Paris, and Archdeacon Baggesen, of Berne, took up several other points of the same subject.

Professor ERNEST NAVILLE, of Geneva, examined the reasons of our disagreement, indicating as such—1. Secondary things in faith, to which we attach too much importance, and here we meet with the sacred souvenirs of the family and the country. The world is full of men who call themselves Catholics, because they are born Frenchmen, or Protestants, because they are born Englishmen. 2. Social and political pre-occupations. 3. Doctrinal and ecclesiastical influence. "But Calvin and Luther are not Jesus Christ; and whatever may be the greatness of these heroes, their greatness consists in their having bowed their heads before Jesus Christ! Sacrifice, then, to Jesus Christ these traditions of the school or of the Church. What will bring us into agreement is Jesus Christ. But, believe me, it is not an easy thing to distinguish between what is Jesus Christ in our thoughts and what belongs to ourselves."

The meeting was then closed with prayer.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 12.

MORNING MEETING.

DRS. BONNET AND THOLUCK ON RELIGION IN GERMANY.

The meeting was held at the Cathedral of St. Pierre; Dr. KRUMMACHER presided. After singing and reading a portion of Scripture, Pastor DESCOMBES (Lyons) offered up prayer.

Pastor BONNET, D.D., of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, then read a paper on "The Religious Movement in Germany since the Berlin Conference." Germany represents as many different religious contrasts and aspects, as it has different kingdoms and duchies. Some startle the mind by their boldness; others gladden the heart by their profound piety. To speak of Germany before this assembly, where some brethren have strong foregone conclusions, while others enthusiastically hail all the scientific labours of our twenty-five universities, aggravates my responsibility not a little. Why, notwithstanding the return of theology to the faith, is there so little spiritual life in our congregations? This is a subject which was ably treated at the Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in Berlin. It was stated that the return of theology to faith had been complete, but that there was little spiritual life to be found in our congregations. This last point will be the subject of my address. The Christian life—the gift of heaven to earth, the work of God, the work of the Saviour who has bought us: the Christian life, and, to say all in one word, Christ in us—is not this the only all-important question for us, my brethren? I will limit my address to two points:

1. I will state what appears to me to be an obstacle to spiritual life in the present state of things.
2. I will indicate some encouraging manifestations of that life.

I cannot help finding a first great obstacle to Christian life in the subjection of the Church to the State; I shall not touch this question, which is excluded from discussion by the rules of our Conference. I will only say that I earnestly hope that this subjection of the Church may speedily be turned into independence. Among the obstacles we find, in the foremost place, an old adversary—Rationalism. We have no longer to do with the Rationalism of the last century, which considered every means as good by which every special interposition by God could be removed from Christianity; nor have we any longer to do with that cold doctrine of a colourless Deism—that kind of theology has been entirely overthrown. But the principle from which it arose, exists still; it only has changed its form. The idea of a God "whose life is in His works," has, under the form of Pantheism, brought about a revival of Rationalism. It confounds Revelation with the natural development of the mind. It denies the eternal pre-existence of Jesus Christ, as well as His incarnation, in order to make of Him an ideal man. God, they say, was in Christ, in the same manner as He is in every one of us. These ideas are circulated as a new theology; they are so like each other at Strasburg as at Oxford, that you might say one set was a photograph of the other. But it is the life of the people rather than the theology with which we have to deal. Well.

we find in the midst of it the various forms of Rationalism and all its consequences. This Rationalism is totally unlike the naïve ignorance of the people of the South. It is fatal to Christian life—it kills the Churches. Germany, alas! is too sad a proof of it. During the last few years there has been in some schools of theology a sort of reaction from the Rationalistic spirit; the principal cause of it is a system diametrically opposite, which is designated by a new word, "Confessionalism." "The human mind resembles a drunken peasant, who, while walking on, tumbles first to the right side, then to the left," said Luther. Nothing is more true; the mind very often oscillates between two extreme and opposite ideas. If I consider my confession [articles of faith] as the adequate expression of the truth, of the Revelation of God, and if I repudiate all those who do not admit my confession, what do I? I substitute my authority for that of the Gospel; I arrest every step of scientific progress. I do not speak against the ecclesiastical confessions, let it be understood, but against the abuse of the symbols. Thus religious liberty, and, as a consequence, all spiritual life, is annihilated. This is the position which the Lutheran Church occupies: she proceeds from the principle, that she alone is in possession of absolute truth, and repels those who will not accept her symbols. The Lutherans are, in general, nearer to Rome than to Geneva. These principles obtain more and more with a great number of clergy of the North and of Central Germany, and they are vigorously carried out. They endeavour to subvert the union of United Reformed and the moderate Lutherans; they refuse them admittance to the Lord's Supper; they almost excommunicate them. This party treats our Evangelical Alliance with thorough contempt; and Evangelical Societies, especially those of Germany, do not fare better at their hands. This party endeavours to impede even the work of Missionary Societies. The union which existed on this ground has been destroyed. It is sinful, according to their views, to send contributions to the Missionary Societies of Basle and of Paris. I do not bring forward any accusations—it is the grief and sorrow of a wounded heart that speaks to you. And yet, I say it advisedly, there are eminent Christians in this party; and if they were here I would say to them: You exclude us, you excommunicate us—we receive you, we admit you, and we appeal to the Church of heaven, which will unite us for ever. What can be the influence of such a system upon the religious life? It is disastrous; it engenders an opposition to the Gospel, and to the German Protestant Church. What can be done to remedy this evil? We ought to meet those men, but, alas! they no longer understand what we say. A gulf separates us. Another reason renders this opposition still more vehement. The religious people of this party recognise nothing except authority; they are afraid of liberty—they confound it with revolution. After this principle they judge everything. The liberation of Italy inspires the organs of this party with anathemas; the evangelization of that country excites their suspicion and distrust. These disciples of Luther (!) deplore the fall of the Pope, and some even contribute to Peter's Pence. Strange aberration! This pernicious spirit has kept a whole generation away from the Gospel; it has made many believe that Christianity and despotism are synonymous, and they see in every orthodox pastor an agent of the higher police authorities. "England," says M. de Tocqueville, "has shown me a perfect harmony between the political and religious world—between Christianity and Liberty. I never had under my eyes there that moral monstrosity, religious people extolling Despotism." God grant that in Germany the day may soon arrive when all enlightened men will raise their voice against this evil! I now come to the more pleasant part of my task. I will notice some of the most evident manifestations of Christian life in Germany. Between the negations which subvert the Gospel and the affirmations which darken it, the task of theology was by no means an easy one. However, theology, the new spirit of which may be traced back to Schleiermacher, has done a great work in endeavouring to unite and reconcile Christian faith and science. The disciples of men like Neander, Tholuck, Ullmann, Nitsch, &c., when they enter into practical pastoral work, very soon abandon their incomplete theories and all human systems, in order to lay hold of the Gospel and of the great facts which it proclaims for the salvation of the world. Yes, they abandon their systems and preach the Gospel, which alone satisfies the wants of men's souls and consciences. In practical life we see the power of the Gospel neutralising the influence of those errors which I have indicated as impediments to Christian life. Rationalism is not understood by the masses, who do not see anything in it but dry abstract theories. Confessionalism is good enough in books, but at the sickbed Christ must be preached and Him crucified. With the renewal of theology a certain religious revival among the masses has kept pace; but there is nothing striking, nothing startling in it. It is a deep, hidden, slow movement, which does not burst forth unexpectedly and suddenly; but just for this reason, the slow and sure development is, perhaps, more real and perfect. In all this I do not judge—I merely give facts. Whoever follows the religious movement of Germany, will recognise it by sure, unmistakeable signs and evidences. The Word re-appears with its treasures of wisdom; from the pulpits Christ crucified is preached; the churches are filled with serious hearers, who rally round the faithful preachers. Everywhere, almost, the most Evangelical pastors are preferred. Religious literature, suited to all classes of society, is enriched daily by new productions; and yet the demand for it is so great, that the booksellers cannot respond to the wants of serious readers. As an instance, I would mention that the large volume of Ludwig Hoffacker's popular sermons has just reached the twenty-fifth edition. This incessant working of the religious press, and the increased demand for religious books, leads us to conclude that there is still in the midst of our populations a religious people, who love the Gospel. Notice, also, that love of the people for spiritual songs and hymns; a singing Church is a living Church. The Bible, the book of life, has its place at every hearth; the members of the Bible Societies prove it. Do not believe those who tell you that Germany has thrown aside the Bible. There is no want of life in Germany. The Young Men's Christian Association has, in the south of Germany alone, ninety societies, all in brotherly communion with each other. The Protestant Church of Germany has also at last remembered those dispersed Protestants in Roman Catholic countries—the remains of so many cruel persecutions. The great Gustavus-Adolphus Society, whose object it is to assist these poor Protestants in their religious wants, to send them the means of maintaining pastors and schoolmasters, and for building churches and schools, has wonderfully progressed, notwithstanding the violent opposition of a cold, narrow orthodoxy. During the last year it has devoted above half-a-million to this work, in which our British brethren have for the first time taken some active part. Germany is actively engaged in missions to the heathen. The various societies prosper, and this work is for the German people an eminently religious work, and an occasion for religious festivals. I must close. If in this imperfect statement, the second part seems to contradict the first, it is not my fault. There are in every nation two people—one opposed to the other. Happy, if there is a religious people! This people exists in Germany; I had it at heart to show this to you. Let us offer fervent prayer in behalf of these brethren, and in face of the two great adversaries, Rationalism and Materialism, we would point out to them: 1. Union. Let us be united in Christ. What unites us is greater than what divides; in heaven what unites us will be all—what divides us nothing. 2. The means employed by the Apostles. What is borrowed from the middle ages is powerless; we must have what will regenerate. Let us return to the Gospel, which alone regenerates individuals, nations, and Churches, and we shall know and find what is the power of God. 3. A new outpouring of the Holy Ghost upon our people and the pastors of our Churches, without which we shall have neither liberty, nor Christian life, nor anything. O, Holy Spirit, come from the four winds and breathe upon us! Amen.

Dr. THOLUCK, of Halle, threw a glance over the past and on the future. "An arid dogmatism succeeded the Reformation, but we would not pass an absolute condemnation on this period. In history a period of preservation, designed to put aside heterogeneous elements, and to establish boundaries, succeeds a period of creation. But why should we draw up a formula of the simple doctrine of the Gospel? This systematisation seemed necessary in presence of the enemies of the faith. This was not the mistake; but we know that the heart of the Christian possesses a logic different from that of the theologian. After the Thirty Years' War the Church entered on a new phase of toleration. Liberty was claimed in presence of the exactions of the law and the decree of theologians. But as is always the case, men went beyond the limits, and did not recognise the authority of the Word of God. Articles were rejected, not so much from bad faith, as from want of penetration to seize the bond between the central dogma and the secondary doctrines." The Doctor here entered into some interesting details concerning Musæus, Spener, Thomasius, &c., and continued: "We observe the same tendencies in our own day. Here there is a flock which would be glad to see the union of all the churches; then those who reject all union for fear of seeing the barriers of their Church fall; again, those who wish for union without leaving their Church. It is to this third party that I belong. It is true that I was converted to the faith when there was neither question of faith nor of Church—Roman Catholics, Reformed Church, Moravian brethren, we met together at Berlin to save the faith. But we had soon to take up the development of our Church." In speaking of the future of the Church, the speaker declared that the greater part of the clergy were returning to living faith, and that the rising generation in the universities were animated by the same spirit; but that religion was disappearing from the masses "Can we hope that as Rationalism descended from the higher to the lower classes, we shall one day see the Gospel follow the same road? I had, for a moment, hoped it would. But we see a new Rationalism arising in England, in France, in German Switzerland, and in Holland, which is nought but the echo of a system past in Germany, which does not count a single representative of any renown. As for Germany, if a new Rationalism should spring up, we shall immediately see the Confessionalists rally around Christians of foreign churches to defend the common faith together."

Dr. Kalkar's (Copenhagen) report on Denmark was then read by Pastor Valette (Paris). The subject does not admit of curtailment.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

The sitting was held at St. Pierre, Pastor PANCHARD, of Brussels, in the chair.

Pastor ANET, of Brussels, spoke on the best means of promoting a revival throughout the Church, and in an earnest appeal insisted at length on the necessity of Christian parents devoting their children to the work of the ministry.—Pastor G. MÖNOD spoke of the revival in Paris, and was succeeded by Dr. Urwick, Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, Pastors Bertholet (Geneva), and Pradez (Liege).

FAREWELL MEETING.

At six o'clock, in the Salle de la Rive Droite, the brethren met to take leave of each other with prayer and thanksgiving. The house was so crowded that a second meeting was at once convened at the Oratoire, which was also well-filled.

The total number of members of the Conference was 1,887. The Genevese numbered 647; the foreign members, 1,240.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONFERENCE.

EXTENSION OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The Conference of the Evangelical Alliance assembled at Geneva, desirous to promote the principles of Christian union, invites the ministers of every country, and of all denominations, to preach as soon as possible, after their return, a sermon, explanatory of the principles of the Alliance and the objects at which it aims. Such ministers are also requested to originate meetings composed of ministers and Christians of different churches, for the purpose of developing and strengthening among themselves, and in their congregations, the sentiment of brotherly love. The Conference requests the various branches of the Evangelical Alliance to use the most appropriate means of making this association more generally known throughout the Church. The Conference would, to this end, point out to them the desirableness of employing ministers and men well qualified, and known for their devotedness to the work of the Alliance—who, by their visits to the churches, and by every other means, will propagate its principles, both far and near. In conclusion, the Conference recommends especially the publication of articles in journals and reviews, and also of pamphlets in different languages, for the purpose of making the Evangelical Alliance known, answering objections with which it meets, and urging upon the friends of Christian Union to join it and take part in its proceedings.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

The Committees of the Evangelical Alliance—established in different parts of the world—are requested to watch over the interests of religious liberty, carefully to notice every case in which it may be violated, and to take into serious consideration all communications which may be made to them with regard to it; also to enter, without delay, into correspondence with the other Committees of the Alliance, in order to confer with them as to the most appropriate means for maintaining or for re-establishing this inestimable liberty.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN GERMANY.

The Conference, taking into consideration that in some countries where Protestantism predominates restrictions upon religious liberty are still maintained, expresses its desire that, alike for the honour and the advantage of the Gospel, and for the interests of the Churches of the Reformation, those restrictions may be abolished. The Conference, desirous of remaining faithful as well to established authorities, as to the cause of this inestimable liberty, authorises the different Committees of the Alliance to confer with each other, in order that measures may be taken to secure that end; while it would recommend to all justice, charity, and the regard due to every Evangelical Church. The Conference feels itself equally urged to express a desire that the members of the different Protestant clerical bodies may especially take part in these efforts.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN SWEDEN.

The Conference expresses its gratitude to God, and its great satisfaction at the measures which have been taken by the Government of Sweden in favour of religious liberty, and expresses the hope that such liberty will continue to progress in that country.

THE IMPRISONED PROTESTANTS IN SPAIN.

The Conference has heard, with the deepest sympathy, of the movements in favour of those Spanish Christians who are suffering imprisonment for their testimony for Christ. It embraces this opportunity to protest before Christian Europe against these persecutions, which are as contrary to the spirit of the age as they are to the spirit of the Gospel. Christians of every country are invited to pray without ceasing for their Spanish brethren; but, at the same time, the Conference rejoices to learn that active measures will be taken to obtain the liberty of these persecuted brethren. The various Committees of the Evangelical Alliance will come to an understanding as to what measures should be adopted. The Conference commits to them full powers for this purpose.

THE MORTARA CASE.

The Conference of Evangelical Christians of all countries, assembled at Geneva during September, 1861, having received a communication respecting young Mortara, declares, that, after the most direct steps having been taken without any success by influential individuals and public bodies, it would be presumptuous to suppose that its interference would have a more successful result. The Conference, however, remembering Him who directs the hearts of the mighty of the earth as the rivers of water, would carry before the throne of God its supplications in behalf of religious liberty in general, and for the child Mortara in particular, beseeching the Lord to restore this child to his family, so that paternal rights, as recognised in the Gospel, may be re-established.

ITALY.

The Conference has heard with profound interest the statements of their beloved brethren from Italy. It desires to express its gratitude to God for the liberty with which the Gospel is propagated and the Holy Scriptures are distributed in that country. It intreats of the Lord to continue and to increase these facilities, and to grant that His servants, labouring in brotherly harmony, may receive a double portion of His Spirit, so that His Word may have free course and be glorified.

SYRIA.

The Christians of various countries and Churches, assembled in Conference at Geneva, desire to express their profound sympathy with the populations of Syria, so painfully tried by the massacre, with which they were last year visited. They rejoice at the plan proposed by British Christians to make the London Syrian Committee a Central Committee; and they express the wish that the Committees, which in Syria and the Holy Land have undertaken special efforts, may place themselves in connexion with the Central Committee of London, either directly or through the medium of the different branches of the Evangelical Alliance, for the purpose of concentrating their efforts, so that the beneficial influence of Evangelical Christianity and the true progress of civilisation may be more widely and more securely extended in those countries.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

The Fourth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, assembled at Geneva, having received the appeal for a week of prayer, from Sunday, Jan. 5, to Sunday, Jan. 12, 1862, begs earnestly to recommend the proposal to Evangelical Christians of every tongue and every land. It believes that these concerts for prayer are one of the most remarkable signs of our time. We are arrived at a blessed period, when the Universal Church appears more and more in her power and beauty; the concerts for prayer are the breath and outbursts of adoration, which, from all points of the earth, rise to heaven. Nothing glorifies our Lord more; nothing inspires the Church more with the sentiment of her unity. These concerts for prayer have been coincident with those abundant outpourings of the Spirit, which have marked these last years, and we do not doubt but that still more abundant blessings will be the result of them. If all Evangelical Christendom will but meet in prayer, in a spirit of humility and faith, there is nothing which she may not be able to obtain.

THE WAR IN AMERICA.

The Conference of Evangelical Christians, assembled at Geneva from various countries, desires hereby to convey to their brethren of the United States of America an expression of deep sympathy under the sad and terrible crisis in which they now are placed; they would unite in earnest and persevering prayer that this calamity may be overruled by God to the furtherance of the interests of humanity, of the cause of freedom, and of our common Christianity. Impressed with the conviction that the origin of this war is to be traced to slavery, the Conference would intreat Almighty God to dispose the hearts of His own people in America to use the means dictated by wisdom and Christian principle for the speedy and complete suppression of a system alike opposed to the spirit of the Gospel, and to the peace, prosperity, and progress of that great people. And whereas our brethren of the United States have appointed Thursday, the 26th inst., as a day of special humiliation and prayer, this Conference earnestly invites their fellow-Christians of various countries to unite with the brethren there before the throne of grace in humiliation and prayer, remembering the words of Scripture, "If one member suffer, all the members suffer with it."

GERMANY.

THE LATE MISS HONORIA HAVELOCK.

(From a Correspondent at Bonn.)

The death of this excellent young disciple of the Lord Jesus has made a deep impression on all that knew the Havelock family, but nowhere, beyond their own family circle, could it make a deeper one than among us in Bonn. For many years she went in and out among us, when a very little girl. In the family circle, or in the social parties of the place, or in our evening rambles in the woods or the gardens, little Nora was ever one of the welcomest. I have seen and watched the progress of her mind from infancy up to womanhood, as under the most prudent of mothers her moral, intellectual, and religious character became more and more developed. I believe the family was nearly seven years in this place, and during that time Miss Havelock and her sister were members of my communicants' class; and I can truly say that, save from illness or absence from home, their place was never empty. We met as we still meet, weekly, and every one brings a written exercise on the subject, given the week before. Into these proofs, and doctrines, and duties, the two Havelock girls entered with all their hearts, and they soon took their place at the head of the class. She is gone, that tenderly-loved one, in the bloom of youth, radiant with all earthly hopes and joys, to the land where sin and death can divide no more. It required no great accomplishments in the king of terrors to lay his victim low. The flower was so young, and gentle, and tender, that the cold winds soon withered it away. In eight short days the whole was over, and another member added to the multitudes who are awaiting the morning of the resurrection. She wished to live, if it had been the will of God; but she was prepared to die. She knew and loved the Saviour, and was persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor power, could ever separate her from His love. Not her own righteousness, but Christ's; not innocence, but pardon; not a blameless, moral, lovely character, but the life and death, the doing and the dying of the Divine Redeemer, was her plea before the face of the holy, heart-searching God. She said, shortly before her death, that she had long felt that her sins were washed away in the blood of Christ. Though young, she was an active Christian, and rendered to her Saviour the fresh blossoms of her life. She taught in the Sunday-school, she visited the poor, and wherever an opportunity offered, she eagerly entered upon the service of the Lord. Her services are no more needed here, and she has begun the ministry of the sanctuary above; nor should the warmest affection seek to draw her from her heavenly rest. The gentle daughter and the heroic father have perhaps met in the many-mansioned house, where all varieties of form and disposition, sanctified and sublimated by the power of God, find their appropriate place and occupation.

EFFORTS FOR THE SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL IN NAPLES AND THE PROVINCES—LABOURS OF SIGNORS CRESI AND GAVAZZI—ROMISH PRIESTS DESIROUS OF QUITTING THE CHURCH OF ROME—PROTESTANT TRACTS IN THE ITALIAN LANGUAGE—SIGNOR ALBERELLA'S DISCOURSES IN NAPLES.

Capri, Aug. 9, 1861.

My dear —,—You asked me for some information about the efforts which are being made in Naples and the provinces to give religious instruction to the people by means of the circulation of the Bible and the establishing of schools. Here is the sum of what I have to give you. After the fall of the infamous Bourbon tyranny, when freedom of thought and speech became impossible, Signor Cresi (who had been working at Bologna with the understanding that, if an opportunity offered of carrying on the work in Naples, his native country, he should at once avail himself of it) came to Naples, to circulate the Bible, by means of agents and colporteurs, throughout the kingdom. Signor Cresi is a Neapolitan refugee, of noble family (he is the Marchese Cresi, though he often drops his title), and a cousin of the Marchese Dragonetti, so well-known in connexion with Baron Poirio. He is a regularly-ordained minister, having studied theology at Geneva and Edinburgh, and has got many agents employed in selling Bibles and tracts throughout the provinces, as well as in the capital. He preaches to a small congregation in his own room every Sunday evening, and holds other meetings during the week. He has also opened a day-school, for young children, called the Asilo Garibaldi, which is mainly supported by the Countess Steinbock, a German Protestant, well-known in Naples, and for which he collects subscriptions from other well-wishers. His school was opened in spite of the violent and persistent opposition of the Romish priests, who went round to the parents and used every persuasion and threat to prevent their sending their children to it, but in vain; for there are between thirty and forty children in regular attendance, and many of the parents have come to the school and asked permission to be present whilst Cresi was addressing the children.

The two preachers referred to in our programme are Cresi and Gavazzi. For the latter we paid the rent and lighting of a large room for his congregation during the winter, and furnished it with chairs; and we also insisted on Gavazzi's accepting a certain sum for his labours, though, at first, he most positively refused to receive anything, and at this time it was well known to us that he had not the common necessaries of life. He at last consented to receive what we offered, saying that it would serve to pay the expenses of his journey to England. He went to England to organise his future plans and to collect funds, and we expect to see him back here in the autumn. To Cresi no pecuniary support was necessary (as this had already been secured from another quarter), and we only transferred to him—on his taking an unfurnished apartment—the chairs which had served Gavazzi's congregation.

There are several Romish priests who are only waiting an opportunity to preach the Gospel, and who would leave Rome at once, if they had the means of living. These are most difficult cases to meet; but we think that there may be, hereafter, a field of action open in the provinces for some of them. In the meanwhile, we most carefully abstain from holding out any temporal inducement to them to leave the Romish Church. One only has been employed in translating some French tracts into Italian, being paid at the trade-price for his work.

We give Cresi fifteen ducats (about 2*l.* 10*s.*) a-month towards the support of the Asilo

Garibaldi. As yet there have been no means of opening a boarding-school, though we should be most anxious to do so if it become possible.

Four tracts in Italian have been printed and put into circulation, "L'Infallibilit ," "Che Cosa   la Messa," "Il Culto di Santi," and another, whose title I forget; and in course of preparation is a tract showing the doctrine and moral teaching of the Jesuits, by quotations exclusively from their own writers.

For some time past we have been very desirous of giving an opportunity for religious teaching to a very able and eloquent man, by name Alberella. He is a Neapolitan lawyer, who fled his country for his liberal tendencies, is married, and his wife a Protestant. His father, also a Neapolitan, was President of the "Soci t  Evangelique Italienne" at Turin about six years ago. Alberella has already held public services at Geneva and Turin, and is a man well known and highly spoken of. Since his return to Naples he has edited a religious journal called La Luce Evangelica, which you may perhaps have seen. He is the Vice-President of the Working Men's Association in Naples, of which Garibaldi is President. We have hired a room in the Conservatorio of Music, and he preaches there every Sunday evening, and holds every Thursday a conversational meeting, at which every one is at liberty to ask any questions or suggest any difficulties he may encounter. His congregation has not been less than fifty, and often considerably more, and is composed of priests, men of the liberal party, and workmen. M. Roller has attended his meetings, and has the highest opinion of his eloquence and powers of usefulness. When the object of the meetings was known, the pupils of the Conservatorio kept up during the whole service a tattoo of drums and blowing of bassoons and trumpets. Alberella complained to the Director, who promised that it should not occur again, but it was repeated as before; whereupon Alberella waited upon the Director, and informed him that if it took place again he would bring an action against him. This has produced the desired effect, and the services now go on in quiet.

Besides these public efforts to spread truth, there are individuals who are not inactive in private. I know of a medical man who has a meeting in his own house for the reading of the Bible, and prayer, at which ten of his friends attend. Both he and his friends are Italians, and I believe all Neapolitans.

ITALIAN TESTIMONY TO THE EDUCATIONAL EFFORTS OF AN ENGLISH GENTLEMAN IN THE ISLAND OF CAPRI—DIFFICULTIES IN THE PROMOTION OF EDUCATION AMONG THE ITALIANS.

(From the Official Journal of Naples, July 31, 1861.)

In the Island of Capri, as in almost all the communes of these Neapolitan provinces, elementary instruction may be said to be entirely wanting, there being but four schools altogether, two for boys and two for girls, but unfurnished with all things which would make them deserve the name of schools. Mr. Henry Wreford, an Englishman who often stays in this beautiful neighbourhood, and who is not only greatly attached to Italy, but also a man of no ordinary culture, possessing extensive and practical acquaintance with public instruction, repeatedly declared that these advantages would not be refused by the people, if only they had the proper legal powers conferred on them. And when he was in part appointed Honorary Inspector of Public Instruction, he lost no time in observing minutely the actual state of education in this island in relation to the needs of a people, who, having sprung into liberty after the profound oppression of centuries, needs to understand their rights in order to defend and sustain them. He visited the two schools of Capri, and the two others of Anacapri; and quickly seeing how they could be made effective, he used all his energies in stimulating the citizens and municipalities to supply the funds, whilst Government furnished the necessary books. He observed that one of the great obstacles to the good working of the schools lay in the number of very young children, about a third of those suitable for admission being but three or four years old, who could neither derive any advantage themselves from the instruction given to children from eleven to thirteen, but were also a great interruption both to masters and scholars. Accordingly, seeing the need of an infant school, he determined to start one at his own expense, accepting, however, any contributions from his fellow-citizens, and especially requesting the inhabitants of the island to give each, according to his means, some trifles towards the generous work, and this, not so much on account of the difficulty of supplying the needful funds, but still more that these good citizens might learn that, with regard to the public good, it is the duty of each man to lend a hand, that he may have a right to share in the common benefit. The infant school is already open, and receives a good many children; and we feel sure that, supported by the charity of our citizens, and by the care of the excellent foreigner who has founded it, it must grow and prosper from day to day. This noble example of love to the weal of Italy given us by a foreigner, will, we trust, not only be imitated, but surpassed, by the Italians of these provinces. We desire that many should convince themselves that good institutions must be the support of our liberty; and although Government is ever ready to spur them on and second them, yet it needs the loyal and spontaneous concurrence of our generous citizens.

Mr. Wreford writes to his sister in England in July: "I am made Inspector of Schools in the Capri district, and have, perhaps, 500 or 600 children, half savages, under my care. They occupy much of my attention, for I don't do things by halves. I have established two infant schools also, on my own responsibility, and trusting to my own resources—throwing myself on the public for assistance. Some here have assisted me, but I want more funds for a special purpose, and if you can get any to help me I shall be obliged to you. The object is this, to get a mistress from the Normal School, just now established, as an instructress of the mistresses in my district. Could you believe it, that in a population of from 4,000 to 5,000 souls, there is not a woman who can read well or write a letter? The gross ignorance is something astonishing, and it is with instruments such as these I have to work. I don't despair, and I feel I can do something. The Minister, who is very friendly, promises me a good instructress in three months, and it is to defray the expenses of this and books and benches, &c., &c., which I have taken on myself, that I ask for assistance. I speak now of the infant schools, as to the others, I come on the communes for them."

He writes again August 18: "I have established three infant schools, and am about to establish an evening school. Ignorance is the root of the suffering of the Italians, and I am going at that tooth and nail. I find people well disposed. They say, 'We are savages, Sir,' and I cannot tell you how many rewards I am promised in Paradise. I don't attempt to evangelise; my great object is to make people think, and all will come after."

NORWAY.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE SCANDINAVIAN CHURCHES.

The third biennial assembly of the Scandinavian Churches was held at Christiania, from the 29th to the 31st July. It commenced with Divine service in the Church of our Saviour, where a sermon was preached by Bishop Arup, of Oslo—the subsequent meetings being held within the University. Pastor Wexels, after having welcomed the members in the name of Jesus Christ, gave a sketch of the general condition of the Norwegian Church, in which, he said, after a long period of apathy, new life had arisen, through the means of a sermon on "Repentance," by Hans Nielsen Hauges. After testifying to the labours of Grundtvig, Hersleb, Stenersen, and their disciples, M. Wexels affirmed that Christianity had asserted its power, both in private and in public life. The revival was spreading all over the country. Grundtvig's views had met with great opposition from the most prominent theologians; nevertheless he had, amongst the Lutherans of Norway, a number of sincere friends; and many, who could not join him, were constrained to acknowledge his services in combating the onesided views of the Spiritualists. A powerful movement was pervading the Church: a large number of Bibles and religious books were in circulation—spiritual advice was often privately sought; whilst meetings for church, missionary, and school purposes, were numerous. The hymns of Kingo and Guldberg were still in use, but the publication of two new hymnbooks was anticipated. The Society for Promoting Popular Education included 4,000 members; the Norwegian Missionary Society numbered 400 branches (one, since 1843, on the Zulu Islands). In the State Church, a more liberal spirit had been manifested. The Mormon question had not yet been settled—the Mormons were looked upon as no Christians, and could not contract legal marriages. The Roman Catholics had built a church in Christiania, but could only reckon 100 members, most of whom were foreigners.

At the second day's meeting, Pastor Welder, of Stangby Scania (Sweden), after referring to the statements made at previous assemblies, said he should confine himself to the events of the last two years. To judge of the depth or reality of spiritual life, two tests must be applied—first, was the Word of God sought for? next, was morality increasing? Judged by these tests, spiritual life was increasing in Sweden. Bibles were sold in large numbers; the Evangelical Patriotic Society had published 56,000 copies of Luther's Sermons, of which 36,000 were subscribed for. Morality, too, was on the increase. Great interest, moreover, was felt on behalf of missions to the heathen, whilst the home mission also had progressed. The Mormons were without vitality; Roman Catholicism met with no sympathy in Sweden. Money had been collected for the Swedes in North America, for the Syrian Christians, and for others. Several important ecclesiastical laws had been enacted. For divorce there were so many facilities, that a desire existed for placing more obstacles in the way of its attainment. In favour of civil marriage there was only a minority.

Professor Hammerich, from Denmark, stated that the parties in that country were still the same. There were the Conservatives (Mynster, Martinsen, and Rudelbach) and Grundtvig's adherents. The movement which derived its name from the late Svien Kirkegaard was dying away. There was evidently a desire to absorb everything that was Christian into the State Church—hence great latitude was allowed within it, without going to extremes. The vital religion manifested amongst candidates and students of divinity afforded good ground for encouragement. A Church, to be what it ought, must (said the speaker) be a national one. The same difference which, in the ancient churches, existed between the Greek (speculative) and the Roman (practical) has, in our days, again shown itself in the difference between German and English church life. The Scandinavian Church forms a link between the two. The spirit of the Scandinavian people is opposed to persecution, is against any pomp or display in religion, has a liking for privacy, and is not doctrinal. The Scandinavian Church, although a unity, consists, nevertheless, of three branches. In the character of the Swedish people, there is a chivalrous tendency, a conservative feeling, and a certain mystic fervour. In the Norwegian character we find strong clear sense, a feeling of independence, and great stress laid upon ethics; whilst the leading features of the Danish mind are shown in a great fear of all extremes, ardent love of liberty, and a devotion that is quiet and unobtrusive.

At the meeting on the third day, the Rev. H. Schmettau, from London, expressed, in the name of the British and Continental Syrian Asylums Committee, thanks to the Scandinavian people for their large donations towards the relief of the Christians in Syria. For the first time, the Christians of Scandinavia and of Great Britain had worked, hand in hand, for one great object. They ought (he said) to set aside all differences, and to offer each other, at all times, the hand of brotherhood. The Christians of the North, having relieved the temporal wants of the Christians in Syria, should now be likewise mindful of their spiritual wants. The rev. gentleman read two letters—one from the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, containing an invitation to the meeting in that city; and another from the Evangelical Alliance in London, urging the Christians of the North to join with them in promoting the objects of the Alliance.—The chairman expressed the thanks of the meeting to the Evangelical Alliance; he hoped the union thus desired would be effected, and soon bear fruit. Several speakers followed, the subject under discussion being Grundtvig's views with reference to the three articles of faith, and the covenant of baptism.

On the fourth day, Dr. Kalkar expressed his opinion that Grundtvig had done much to promote religious liberty, making it clear that there was a difference between the kingdom of God, and that of the world; and that men might be alike good members of society, although of different views on certain points of the Christian religion.

Pastor S. Bring said: M. Welinder has only shown us the sunny side of religious life in Sweden. We must, however, look also on the dark side, when we shall find cause to humble ourselves before the Almighty. A spurious philosophy, in open opposition to Christianity, has made its appearance in our universities, and Schleiermacher's views, after having been refuted in Germany, are now received in Sweden. The speaker then proposed that united prayer for the Church of the North should be offered up on the 31st October, in all the Scandinavian Churches.

Pastor Bergmann said he would rather discuss practical than theoretical questions; and proposed that a prize be offered for the best treatise on the separation of the Church from the State. This, however, was declared to be beyond the competence of the meeting.

Professor Lumsden, from Aberdeen, was happy to have an opportunity of addressing the assembly. He did not appear before them as the representative of the Free Church of Scotland, which sent to deputy, simply because it was thought that such a step might be regarded as intrusive. He urged the Churches to send a delegate to the General Assembly of the Free Kirk next May. The Free Church had felt much gratified at the sympathy evinced in the North on behalf of the Syrian Christians. The Scandinavian Church ought to join the Kirk in the mission to Syria. He would not trespass on the time of the meeting by dissenting on the state of the Kirk. "We belong (concluded the speaker) to different denominations, known by distinctive opinions on questions of importance, which we legitimately desire to retain, but we are all united by the common tie of Christian love."—The chairman, on behalf of the meeting, expressed his thanks to Professor Lumsden.

At the fifth meeting, Dr. Kalkar observed that there were three epochs in the history of Christian Missions: 1st, the Soterologic, in which the great aim was the preaching of the Gospel of our Saviour, in its personal bearings. The apostolic mission did not expect to convert whole races, but only individuals from amongst them. St. Paul knew that it was not his mission to convert the masses, but to gather together out of them a number of persons longing for salvation. When the Gospel had become generally diffused, then came the Antropologic epoch, when the question was no longer the conversion of individuals, but of masses. It was then considered desirable that civilisation and art should be regarded as part and parcel of Christianity. Not till the end of the last century did the missionary question come into prominence—then came the third, or Eekatologic epoch. All Christians now believed that another epoch was coming, and that the time was at hand. In nearly every country there appeared a desire to separate the Church from the State. . . . Missions did not originate with man, but with God—hence it was the duty of all to aid the missionary work. He was fully convinced that the present was a missionary time, and that all Christians, putting aside their differences, should walk hand in hand.

Pastor Birkedal, of Byslinge, was of opinion that missions took two directions—either that of frigid Orthodoxy, or that of Pietism. He described the particularities of each, and advised his brethren to walk in the old tried paths of the Church. "We," said the speaker, "are the children of God, whenever we, from our hearts, repeat the covenant of baptism."

Pastor Rothe, of Copenhagen, wished to state that the influence of Grundtvig was not so all-pervading as in other countries was sometimes thought. There was a strong conservative tendency existing, which, however, was not unfriendly to all progress or reform; but the principle of the irresponsibility of ministers, allowing them to interpret Scripture as they individually understand it, had, by the Conservatives, very justly been considered suicidal, for in such case, Papists, Mormons, and others, could not be refused admission to holy orders.

Pastor Hammar said he understood that many members had taken objection to what Pastor Birkedal had said, but he thought it his duty to observe that the remarks of that brother were not aimed at real piety. He only meant that going to extremes in either direction had worked much mischief in Christian countries, and might do the same in the missionary field.

Several speakers followed, and the proceedings were concluded by reading a letter from the Colonial Church and School Society to the Rev. H. Schmettau, stating that ministers were greatly wanted for the Norwegians resident in Canada.

The next biennial meeting of the Churches will be held at Copenhagen in 1863.

Each session was commenced and concluded with prayer, and the whole was closed by Divine service in Trinity Church, Pastor Blaaedel preaching the sermon. The members numbered 150 Danes—ministers and laymen from all parts of the country, except Schleswig—about 50 Swedes, and 250 Norwegians. Everything that affection and hospitality could do for the visitors was done; and by many of them this gathering will be included amongst their dearest recollections.

DENMARK.

THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN QUESTION.*

I could only expect that my communication, respecting the ecclesiastical position of Germans in the unsettled districts of Schleswig, should elicit a denial, and it affords me great satisfaction that, through the attack made upon the facts I set forth, I am enabled to claim the right of again drawing the attention of your readers towards that unhappy country, though it may be of no avail to explain away, by inferences ever so artificial, the heavy oppression of which an active people so bitterly complains, and by which it is so irritated. The importance of the matter is such, that it deserves to be placed anew in the strongest light; and the very name of the country particularly concerned (Anglia), is a guarantee to the Englishman that the injured German in Schleswig will not give up his share in the holiest of rights. It is the same race, and imbued with the same spirit of freedom, which is settled here, and whose forefathers, in ancient times, gave England her name.

Your Danish correspondent takes upon himself to deny that either I or any German is competent to give a judgment in this matter, which he calls a Danish Question, at least, until we have studied Danish literature, which is intimately connected with this question. This is indeed a simple means of getting rid of unpleasant objections, to curtly tell an opponent, "You have no right to meddle in this matter; you do not understand it." But, nevertheless, I cannot but sincerely regret that your correspondent should have allowed himself to be carried away in his polemics to this not very worthy argument. But it is indeed difficult to select in discussions of this nature other than expressions of bitter scorn.

The Germans have been heavily oppressed by the Danes. During the last ten years a cry of lamentation has been heard from Schleswig. Hundreds of Schleswigers, driven from their native land, are scattered throughout Germany, and the Germans, who daily groan under the burden of Danish fanaticism, will be told, so soon as they complain, "It is a Danish question; you have no right to complain of suffering until you have read the literature of us, your oppressors." With like justice might the Italians be denied the competency of complaining of oppression in Venetia until they had studied the decrees of the Austrian Government.† But since your correspondent has required the testimony of men who are intimately acquainted with the affairs of Denmark, I will at once bring forward the testimony of a man who, it will be allowed, possessed such knowledge; who, after bearing this testimony, was not only the Danish Minister of Holstein, but also Minister for Foreign Affairs in Denmark—I mean the well-known privy councillor, von Scheel. That he was not imbued with any partiality toward Schleswig, may be seen in the fact that his dismissal in the year 1848 was one of the most express demands of the Schleswig-Holsteiners. This man was formerly Amtmann, and held the jurisdiction of Hütten and Gottorf; he had also a part of Anglia under his charge; and is, therefore, in every respect, a qualified witness. In one of the letters published in 1861 in reference to the Danish régime in Schleswig, he says, amongst other things: "Expressions were often dropped by men of high standing even in Copenhagen, which betrayed a doubt concerning this Danish-nationality deception. But expressions of this kind were not allowed to gain publicity and value, and they were seldom loud, as they might bring a denunciation, and the person might be subject to the grossest abuse, if not looked upon as an open enemy. A perfect terrorism arose, which continues to this hour, and notat et designat ad eadem every political adversary. No station, sex, moral character, qualification, or relation of any kind, is a safeguard against it. Upon the bare suspicion of being an enemy to his country, a man is liable to be treated in the roughest manner. Even historians were carried away by the ruling passion." I earnestly beg the English reader, when perusing notices of the affairs of Schleswig by Danish writers, to bear in mind this picture of Danish fanaticism and terrorism by a man who, after this characteristic description, became Danish Minister. Herr von Scheel further expresses his disapprobation of the wholesale dismissal of the Schleswig employés. Still more forcible is his complaint about the appointment of the new officers. Such things took place "that," as he himself expresses, "must wound the feelings of the people in the highest degree." Can a more severe judgment be passed upon the Danish rule, or upon the conduct of the Danes? Upon Herr von Scheel disapproving that for the newly-appointed criminal and police commission Danish jurists were chosen, to whom the Schleswig laws were unknown, he received this pointed answer: "So much the better, if they do not understand the Schleswig laws, for the Schleswig laws are of no use;" an answer the presumption of which was surpassed by that of Herr Regench (who was superintendent of the Schleswig churches, which he ruled in the most arbitrary manner) to a member of the Church in Anglia, who complained, that through the compulsory use of the Danish language, souls were in danger of being hurt. He replied, as the present pastor of St. Thomas's Church, in Leipzig, records in his work upon the government of the Church by Denmark—"What does that matter? the present generation is good for nothing; the next will be Danes, and therefore more fortunate." Such, then, were the prospects of the prohibited districts; the salvation of the souls of a whole generation was to be imperilled, in order that a political end might be attained! I will only add two more expressions of Herr von Scheel. First, he says that "even in districts where the language of the people was entirely and exclusively German, the Government Commissioner ordered the introduction of the Danish language in the churches and schools;" and he further informs us, that "men, who from their position as citizens were universally respected, even beyond the boundaries of their districts—men who kept themselves free from all tumults—who could vie with the best in the country for loyalty," had come to him with the question, whether there was any good, in addressing the King, to complain of the forcible obtrusion of a language totally strange to them, and to present a dutiful prayer for protection and redress; and if such an address should be sent to the King at Copenhagen, by a deputation." Herr von Scheel advised the Government to permit its presentation, but the Government forbade it, and Herr von Scheel was called upon to account for his advice. Is it possible to give a stronger instance of what the Danes understand by freedom of thought? Since then proof has been adduced that Danish proceedings in Schleswig are condemned by men who occupy high positions in Denmark itself, as well as by Germans who "have not studied Danish literature." I now turn to those points on which your correspondent would refute my statements. I will, for that purpose, make use of the same number to which he has referred.

I remark, moreover, that in reference to present instruction, upon the proof of which I cannot of course give an opinion, I withhold my judgment, until I shall have received an answer from my informant at Schleswig. Until then, the two assertions must stand in opposition, and I beg the English reader to reserve his judgment upon the subjects in dispute.

But these orders I consider as comparatively subordinate matters, and which do not in any way interfere with the main point of the question. There is, properly, only one point under No. 1—namely, whether a clergyman in Schleswig is obliged to be furnished with a special passport. Then, in respect to No. 3, it is to be remarked that my informant did not mean to say there was any legal prohibition for Schleswig candidates to attend the University of Kiel, but that they dare not; which appears to me to mean that they are unwilling entirely to abandon their prospect of an appointment. Still less is the assertion under No. 4 refuted, that the Government requires a guarantee from the candidates who enter, that they will assist in suppressing the German element; for what your correspondent says that the Government has no intention to suppress the German language in South Schleswig, is precisely the point in dispute. There are not a few who imagine that it is the intention of Government gradually to promote the Danicizing (to coin a word) of the country as far as the Eider; and even if this has not yet been carried out to such an extent, it is sufficiently evident that it is now of the greatest consequence to the Government to restrain the people of the mixed districts* from going back, by the appointment of pastors with Danish sympathies in South Schleswig.

Your correspondent himself allows, indirectly, what he has directly disputed—namely, when he admits that no pastor would be appointed who meddles with politics. This is just the reason that the country is in such a disturbed state—that people are so blinded as to make a question of language a question of politics, and that every one who does not coincide with them, when their countrymen are forced to call upon God in a language they hate, becomes, so far at least, an object of suspicion, as though he would make Schleswig a Prussian province. Under No. 2 your correspondent allows that the usual Church unions were forbidden, because the Schleswigers rebelled in 1848. This is a specially Danish view of the case. Others see, in the pretended rebels, "heroic defenders of ancient rights." At any rate, it is a sorry sign for a Government, when it has carried things so far, that it must scent out, amongst a loyal and generous race, politics and rebellion, even in religious societies. The contradiction under No. 5 is somewhat unusual. I wrote that Danish officials and clergymen have been sent in numbers into the country. This assertion is pronounced "not" at all correct; because, amongst the pastors appointed in Schleswig, since 1850, not a few natives are to be found. This would apply if I had stated that exclusively, or almost exclusively, Danish clergymen had been appointed in Schleswig. Since this is not the case, as far as I am concerned, I cannot understand why your correspondent should imagine he has corrected me, inasmuch as he brings forward something which I in nowise disputed. As regards No. 6, my statement, that the people of Schleswig were formerly notable for their religious behaviour, is contradicted by the unfavourable sentence of two clergymen. To this I can oppose the judgment of a man who formerly was looked upon as an authority, at least by the Danes—Dr. Jensen (one of the most learned men at Schleswig in the customs of the country and people), who writes—in his "Statistics of the Church in the Duchy of Schleswig," published at Flensburg, in 1840-41—as follows: "During the last two centuries, the influence of the Church has attained a great increase of power, where it had formerly declined; and in many parishes, that irreligious period passed tranquilly away. The people remained unaffected by the spirit of unbelief, and continue so to this day. There are very many parishes in which not a single member absents himself from the Church communion—where no one, or scarcely one, is found who does not partake of the Holy Sacrament, and where family devotion and the fear of God prevail. There are parishes in which no crime has been heard of for years—where, for years, no illegitimate child has been born," &c. This description, by that trustworthy statist, presents, truly, a very different picture from that of the two clergymen of unknown fame, one of whom appears to regard matters from a decidedly Danish point of view.

The argument under No. 7 is similar to that under No. 5: I said that "often" there were no persons at the service. The writer brings forward four parishes in which he found full churches. I cannot perceive how my assertion can in anywise be combated thereby; besides, it appears that in three of the instances brought forward, the Danish services are disproportionately worse attended than the German; this is, therefore, only a new evidence that the German decidedly prevails in those neighbourhoods where it has been banished from the schools. But by the conclusion (No. 7) to which your correspondent assents—that very many prefer politics to religion, and do not attend church, intending thereby "to discountenance the suppression of revolt, and the defence which the Danish language now enjoys after centuries of suppression," agrees precisely, again, with the essence of what I am about to bring forward—namely, 1st, that the worship of God and religion have not been introduced into the political struggle; and, 2ndly, that the Danish language, inasmuch as it was spoken there centuries ago, may claim the right to be at the present time re-introduced by force. This being the substance of the whole question, I must enter upon it more closely. In order that the question may be confined to its own province, I will merely notice that your correspondent also here briefly again designates that "revolt," which many public lawyers and political authorities call "a manly defence of their hereditary rights against a malicious infringement of them." I will endeavour to occupy a Danish point of view, and really assume that the brave Schleswigers, who have bled and suffered for their ancient rights, were rebels. From this point of view, it will be at least clearly found, if the Danish Government—I do not notice the solemn assurance which it gave, in reference to Schleswig, to Austria and Prussia—had availed itself of every political and civil measure, in order to guard against further rebellion, in reference to which any amount of oppression and tyranny might have been used, and herein it has in nowise failed. It might not have been a very wise proceeding—still it would only have been what, in similar cases, takes place in tyrannical governments.

But the Danish Government has not contented itself with political measures, but has adopted a proceeding, for which history furnishes no precedent. It has suddenly decreed that the boundary between the Danish and German languages should be removed further south than formerly; that the Danish should be introduced or forced into schools, in which, as your correspondent himself says, the German language has been taught since the year 1670—fully 190 years; that the pulpits of the German clergy, in which the German had been preached during a period of 190 years, should be occupied by Danish preachers; that German discourses should be delivered only once a fortnight; that confirmation services should also be conducted in the Danish language, &c., &c. One asks with astonishment what can be the cause of measures which must naturally excite the deepest and most sacred feelings of the people?—mere fairness towards the Danes, who, it is undeniable, are in a very small minority? Impossible! for then there would be no necessity to add that other prohibition, whereby wealthy German parents were forbidden to keep private teachers for their children—a measure for which your correspondent can find no parallel in countries where the greatest darkness reigns, as Spain and Brazil. Then they would not dare to put aside the demand of the Assembly of the States, that in each district the majority should decide whether to have the German or the Danish language. But one can conceive no other ground for such a proceeding, except that which the correspondent also points out—viz., that they wished to re-introduce the Danish language by force into places where it had not been spoken for centuries. It is but natural that the German language—a language spoken by forty millions of people—which belongs to the first class of civilised languages—should gradually supersede a language spoken by little more than a million. Every one who bestows a thought upon the subject will readily perceive that the Danes have borrowed the greater part of their intellectual culture, especially as regards religion, from Germany, inasmuch as their numbers are too small, in spite of their intellectual activity, which I particularly acknowledge to originate an independent development of mental culture. It may be that attempts were formerly made by individual Germans, and if they had proceeded from the people themselves, the Government might easily have given them permanence. But had this development been ever so powerful, still it is a fact that at present the great majority of the inhabitants of those districts regard the German language with pleasure. Who will doubt that the Danish is held in very low estimation? I can bring forward on this point the most positive and impartial authority conceivable—namely, that of your respected correspondent himself, who admits (page 440) that “the population of the mixed districts feel ashamed of being Danes; they conceal that they understand and speak Danish. . . . Danish is despised by many; the richer peasants despise the Danish, and the people feel ashamed to speak Danish.” I thank the correspondent, that he has placed the state of affairs beyond all doubt. Now I ask the English reader: Has any Government the right to impose upon any people, however much they may have revolted, a language which they utterly hate, and to force it upon them in their religious worship? Has it ever been heard of elsewhere, that a language should be regarded as a political individual, and introduced again by force, into places where it had formerly been spoken, against the will of the present race?

According to the same logic, the North Americans should be as much compelled to speak the languages which, not so very long ago, prevailed on the banks of the Mississippi, as that Danish should be taught and preached in the schools and churches here. This idea your correspondent hopes to propagate among the English, who have powerfully and emphatically recognised the right of every people to dispose of themselves as they please! But does he hope that any one in the present day will receive now the sentiment of nationality more extensively than ever before, and when other nations are struggling for political rights, even though they did not hitherto? And shall there be taken away from the German Schleswigers the right which they till now possessed—the most inviolable of national rights—the right of worshipping God in the language in which their mothers taught them their first prayer? The consequences of this conduct are apparent. The rancorous feelings against the Danes, who do not conceal their determination to introduce measures of political oppression into the sacred precincts of God's House, becomes yearly more and more intense in the hearts of these lovers of freedom. It has reached the very opposite extreme to that which the shortsighted Danish Government wished—the gulf between their Danish and German subjects has been only widened. The facts which your correspondent has brought forward are my best argument.

But I tarry too long upon this head. I must, however, at least cursorily, touch upon the main point in the following portion of the correspondence: No. 8 is partly disposed of in what I have already advanced. If your correspondent had stated the case to be in all the schools of the district, as in the three he has brought forward—that the children, notwithstanding the Danish language, learn a great deal—still that would not, as he appears to argue, soften in the least the revolting nature of the new measure, that German parents should be forbidden to engage private teachers at their own expense. He cleverly avoids my assertion that even the withdrawal of that barbarous decree has, in fact, made no alteration, since only a comparatively small number of parents are able to employ private teachers. As little upon the other point—that it is at least an exceedingly wrong measure that children, who are allowed to take part in the German Confirmation, as lately happened, are previously compelled to attend the instructions in Danish. There is now published a list of those who have been confirmed last Easter. Since your correspondent places so great stress upon numbers, I will produce them, because they especially afford conclusive evidence. After labouring ten years amongst the unprotected people, with every means which Danish fanaticism and terror could furnish, this is the result in Anglia: As soon as the candidates for confirmation were first allowed to choose their language, in twenty ecclesiastical districts, concerning which information now lies before me, of 448 children who were confirmed at Easter, 396 were Germans and 49 Danes. In the single district of Steinberg, the Danes were in the majority; on the contrary, in nine other districts, by the desire of the parents, the German confirmation service was used by 127 children. In the remaining districts, the number of German candidates was by far the greater; for example—Gelting, 51 Germans, and 8 Danes; Husbye, 24 Germans, and 1 Dane; Munkbrarup, 27 Germans, and 4 Danes; Sörup, 30 Germans, and 1 Dane; Esgrus, 42 Germans, and 1 Dane; &c., &c. The result in the districts of Adelbye and Glucksburg is not yet known. It is also to be noticed that amongst the Danish candidates for confirmation are, first, all the children of Danish officials; second, all those who, on account of their wishing to go to sea, or to enter upon study, were confirmed previously, as in Steinberg; third, all those who, from loss of their parents, were obliged to obtain express permission; and fourth, the day-scholars of Danish teachers. If we deduct these from the forty-nine Danish candidates, a great number cannot remain over.

It is unnecessary to add any remark; these numbers speak more loudly than arguments, since they are the immediate expression of a people subjected to oppression by a foreign nation, but still maintaining a courageous independence of spirit.

No. 9 concerns an argument which has no bearing upon the subject, and contains a statement which, perhaps, might have had some weight in 1801, but for the year 1861 proves absolutely nothing. In respect of No. 10, I am happy to say that I am able to appreciate sound objections. It is, indeed, a mistake to call Provost Olzen a Dane by descent. I should have said, a Dane in sentiment, and this, I believe, his entrance into the Assembly of the States sufficiently proves. If his Danish feelings are unaltered, still the value of his testimony will not be changed, whether he is descended from German or Danish progenitors; and since his name has been again brought forward, I will at once adduce his own words: "In the ecclesiastical district under my care," said he in the Assembly, "be nine parishes (Kirchspiele) in which the rescript relating to language has been felt very severely. I have heard the bitterest complaints about this state of affairs. I have witnessed hot tears shed over their pitiable condition. I have seen thousands of petitions, and from these thousands of petitions I have heard thousands of voices and prayers, which implore an alteration of the language in the schools and churches. Is there no redress for these complaints, tears, and petitions? Who that loves the Word of God ought not to complain when he sees that in many parishes of our Duchy, the Word of God is proclaimed in a tongue which the children do not understand, and that on that account, on half the Sundays and holidays, the churches are as good as closed? The language rescript has so far served to make the schism between the peoples wider, and to fill them with hatred and aversion, instead of love, towards the Danish language." I challenge your correspondent to weaken the importance of this testimony.

Under No. 11 he promises to give the testimony of the Danish Pastor Grundtvig. I beg of him to append to this what the Danish Pastor Helweg has openly declared.

Under No. 12 he requires a proof of the view Bishop Martensen takes of the illegality of the doings in Schleswig. He will find it in Valentiner's work (page 26), where a conversation of Bishop Martensen's with a candidate is printed, in which he has expressed the views mentioned by me. It is also added that, as the candidate painted the affairs in Schleswig in all their misery, Martensen replied that he would take a journey to his old home in Schleswig, in order to judge of them personally. On his return he said to the same candidate, "You have not said enough by a great deal!" If it is true that the same Martensen, since he ascended the bishop's throne of Leeland, through the influence of the Danish Court, has expressed himself in a totally different manner, that does not redound to his honour; but still the value of his former verdict is not in any way diminished.

I have thus followed your correspondent step by step in his professed refutation, and I leave it with confidence to the verdict of the English reader, to decide whether he has any reason to assume the mild, explicit, and confident tone with which he closes his correspondence? I regret that he has given his polemics so personal a direction, and that he has considered it proper to declare particularly his belief that I give full credence to what I have advanced. I will not answer him in the same tone. I conclude with the following, which is fully vouched for, and which happened lately, inasmuch as it throws a bright light upon the manner in which Schleswig is at present governed. Asmus Bruhn, a resident at Mohrkirchenholz, has lately published, under his own name, in the Itzehoer News, the following: "On the introduction of the Danish language into the schools, the commune was presented with a mass of schoolbooks as presents. My son also received one of these books. As I am not accustomed to allow my children to receive schoolbooks as presents, I returned the book to the schoolmaster, with the remark that when such books were required, I would procure them at my own expense. There was no particular notice taken of it at the time. A few days after, however, I was arrested by three gendarmes, and carried across from Boel in a cart, like a vagrant vagabond, to Schleswig, where I was taken before the Hargesvagt. By him I was sentenced to ten days' imprisonment on bread and water, and I had to suffer, in all, fifteen days in prison. After my release, I received an order to procure, at my own expense, such a book, which from the outset I had not refused to do." Facta loquuntur!

CHINA.

MISSION WORK AT TIEN-TSIN—BAPTISM OF THE FIRST NATIVE CONVERT IN THAT CITY—PEKIN CLOSED TO MISSIONARIES.

Tien-tsin, China, June 24, 1861.

I know that you are interested in the spread of the Gospel, and will rejoice to learn that in this remote part of China the Word of God is taking effect. At present there are three English and one French Protestant missionaries in Tien-tsin. One of these brethren has been here since last September, and the others have only recently joined him. There are now two places constantly opened for the preaching of the Word of God, and we visit different parts of the city and neighbourhood for the purpose of circulating the Scriptures, and speaking to the people about their eternal interests. In every part we meet with the greatest respect and attention from the natives. They manifest no prejudice whatever against foreigners. Our books they receive with eagerness, and marks of polite gratitude. I have, along with another missionary, been in the country for more than thirty miles from Tien-tsin, and in every town we visited, we were followed by large crowds of people, who listened attentively to the message of salvation, and received most gladly the tracts and copies of the sacred Scriptures. In no case did we meet with the slightest opposition, interference, or ill-conduct, but the contrary. This shows that the people are quite disposed to treat foreigners with due respect when their rulers open their country to them. A wide door of usefulness is now opened. This city itself contains half-a-million of souls, all lying in darkness and the shadow of death. There is a great need for more labourers here, as in other parts of this great empire. May the right men, and the means for sending them, soon be provided!

It has pleased the Lord to give us some encouragement in this place already. The Divine Spirit is at work in the hearts of several who have been regularly attending the ministry of the Word. They give evidence of a growth in scriptural knowledge, and a change of heart and life. But for the present, no native Church has been regularly formed. Last Sabbath-day the first Christian convert in Tien-tsin was baptized by Mr. Blodget, who was the first missionary to settle in this place. The subject is a poor blind man, who has been for some time in the hospital opened by the officers of the British expeditionary forces, for the afflicted Chinese. Before going to the hospital, he heard Mr. Blodget preach several times, and showed great readiness at answering questions. In visiting the hospital, Mr. Blodget always found Chang-li (which is the man's name) eager and attentive in listening, and ready and correct in replying, to questions proposed. The first time he seemed affected was on hearing that beautiful hymn beginning :—

Alas ! and did my Saviour bleed,
And did my Sovereign die ?

So great was his emotion at the time, that his whole frame was convulsed, and he sunk upon the ground. It was manifestly the truth which moved his heart. He committed this hymn to memory, and used often to repeat it in the hospital to the other patients. He said he never liked to repeat one particular verse before other persons, as it always affected him so much, and was the first that moved him so deeply. The verse runs :—

Well might the Sun in darkness hide,
And shut his glories in.
When God, the mighty Maker, died
For man, the creature's sin.

Mr. Blodget became satisfied that the poor man was the subject of a real change of heart, and with due solemnity, in the presence of other missionaries and a Chinese congregation, administered the initiatory rite of baptism. It was a deeply-interesting, impressive, and suggestive service. We thank God for one snatched as a brand from the burning. It may appear singular that the first to receive spiritual sight in Tien-tsin should be a blind man. His worst blindness is cured, and believing in the Son of God, he can go and ask others, "Will ye also be His disciples?" Who will not pray with us that this may be but the earnest of a large harvest of souls for Christ in this newly-opened field? We thank God for this, and take courage.

I am sorry not to be able to report favourably of Pekin. Though it is open to merchants and missionaries according to treaty, neither class is allowed to go there at present by the English and French authorities, with the exception of Roman Catholic missionaries! Two of our brethren went about three weeks ago, and were ordered to leave Pekin. This is very unsatisfactory, and will, I fear, have an unfavourable influence on the minds of the Chinese, as it will strengthen them in their old prejudices, and foster their spirit of exclusiveness. I hope this mistaken policy will soon be abandoned, and that the Protestant as well as the Roman Catholic missionary will be allowed free access to the northern capital of China. One of our brethren, the representative of an English society, but a native of Holland, is trying to establish himself in Pekin, as neither the French nor English ministers have authority over him. It is not unlikely he may be sent away by the Chinese officials, who trouble him very much. He says, that the Romish clergy have taken up all the books that he had distributed. This shows that they are active in trying to keep away the teachers of a pure Gospel, but their plans shall be frustrated.

POLYNESIA.

MURDER OF THE REV. G. AND MRS. GORDON AT ERROMANGA—PARTICULARS OF THE MARTYRDOM—HEATHEN SUPERSTITION AND IGNORANCE—CALL FOR OTHERS TO TAKE HIS PLACE.

We deeply lament to record the death of the Rev. George and Mrs. Gordon, of the Nova Scotian Mission to Erromanga, who have fallen victims to the hatred to the Gospel of the native idolaters, and to their superstitious fears. To the readers of this journal, the announcement will have more than ordinary interest, as our last number (for September) contained a communication from him under the head of Polynesia, in which he laments the continued opposition of the native mind to the Gospel, and mentions the existence of those passions to which, within one month afterwards, he fell a victim; while at the same time he expresses the peace and confidence he felt in staying himself on the Lord his God.

It seems that Erromanga, in common with the neighbouring islands, has been suffering for some time past under the scourge of measles, which has carried off several thousands of the population. The natives were not content with attributing the introduction of this disease to the Europeans, which is true; but they charged it directly on the missionary, as bringing down this vengeance from heaven on them, because they would not give up idolatry. This superstitious notion was strengthened by the fact that a short time before the introduction of the disease, and while it was raging on the other islands, Mr. Gordon sharply rebuked the people for their continued adhesion to idolatry, and warned them of the wrath to come. Within one week after, the measles broke out; and the chiefs, remembering the address, believed that he had brought the disease as a punishment for their refusal to listen to his words. From that hour his death was determined on. For the details we refer to the following interesting letter, written by an English gentleman on the island, who assisted in burying the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Gordon, and who bears high testimony to the zeal, fidelity, and devotion of these martyred missionaries. The news was transmitted to this country by the Rev. Wm. Guthbertson, of Sydney.

Thus the island of Erromanga, which was the scene of the murder of Williams and Harris, has bestowed the martyr's crown on Mr. and Mrs. Gordon. The natives have, for the present, secured their object: they have driven the Gospel and its teachers far from them. Are they to be left in that state? Forbid it, every noble principle in the Church of Christ! The ages of martyrdom, we see, are not passed away: we cannot doubt that men will be found worthy of the age—men who are ready to take their lives in their hands, and lead the forlorn hope in this island, "where Satan's seat is." Erromanga has, in a remarkable manner, concentrated upon herself the sympathies of the Church; the missionary who takes the martyr's place may go forth strong in the faith that the prayers and aspirations of all Christendom will attend him. We are sure that the energy, enterprise, and courage of the Church will not suffer this, the most deeply-interesting mission-field of modern times, long to remain empty:—

TO THE REV. WILLIAM GUTHBERTSON.

Erromanga, June 7, 1861.

Rev. Sir,—It is with feelings of deep melancholy that I now have to communicate to you the distressing intelligence of the massacre by the natives here of our worthy missionary and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon.

This mournful event took place on the 20th ult., about one o'clock in the afternoon, and I proceed to detail to you the circumstances connected with it.

On the afternoon of the 20th I was in the act of writing a note to Mr. Gordon, when I was startled by a native (David-uti), followed by others of the mission boys, rushing across the river and shouting that the Bunkhill natives had killed the "Missi." I immediately armed myself, and the few foreign natives which I have, and started in pursuit of the murderers, but unsuccessfully. I found the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Gordon lying on the ground horribly mangled, and I saw at a glance that anything in the shape of surgical assistance was out of the question, as, from the nature of the wounds, death must have been instantaneous. I went and locked up the Mission-house, and set a guard of ten natives, well armed, to defend the property. I then went and selected a spot for the grave. It is situated on the right bank of the river, near the spot where Williams was killed, and overshadowed by cocoanut and banana trees. In the morning I made two coffins, in which the bodies were placed, and at two o'clock we carried them to the burying-place. There, at my request, a native named "Mana," who had been for some time at the Samoan Institution, and who acted as a teacher under Mr. Gordon, conducted the services. A hymn having been sung, he gave an address, which, to judge from the effects visibly produced, must have been deeply felt; and a prayer having been offered up to Almighty God, the bodies were consigned to the earth. It was deeply interesting for me to witness the emotion exhibited by a native standing next to me, who seemed to be utterly overcome by grief; yet this very man, in 1839, murdered another of God's labourers, John Williams. The tears and lamentations of all present at the interment it was painful to witness.

From the accounts which I have gathered from the natives, you may rely on the correctness of the following description of the murderous attack:—

About noon of the 20th, a party of nine Bunkhill natives, of whom the chief Lova was the leader, called at the Mission-house, and inquired for Mr. Gordon. They were informed that he was working a little further down the hill, at a house which he was building as a winter residence. They went towards the place, but in passing through a grove near the house, eight of the men concealed themselves, while the ninth, named Naru-bu-leet, went further down to inveigle Mr. Gordon into the trap thus laid for his destruction. Mr. Gordon had, unfortunately, sent all his boys away to gather grass for the roof of the new house, and was unattended, when Naru-bu-leet walked up to him, and asked for some calico for himself and the others of the party, who, he said, were waiting at the Mission-house. Mr. Gordon took up a piece of board, and wrote on it with a piece of charcoal, "Give these men a yard of cotton each." This he gave to the savage, and told him to take it to Mrs. Gordon, who would give him what he wanted. This, however, would not have suited the intentions of Naru-bu-leet. He told the missionary that Lova wished particularly to see him, and to get some medicine for a sick man, and that he had, therefore, better go up to his own house. Mr. Gordon, pointing to a plate containing some food which Mrs. Gordon had sent him, said, "I have not yet eaten, but never mind! I can do as well at the house." And wrapping up the plate in his handkerchief, he started up the hill, followed by the native. On arriving at the ambush Naru-bu-leet buried his tomahawk in Mr. Gordon's spine. He immediately fell, uttering a loud cry. Naru-bu-leet gave him another stroke on the right side of the neck, which almost severed the head from the body; and the others, rushing from their concealment, quickly cut their poor victim to pieces. While this tragedy was being enacted, another native, whose name was "Ouben," ran towards the Mission-house, and Mrs. Gordon, who had been alarmed by the fiendish yells and laughter of the savages, had run out, and was standing near an outhouse. She asked Ouben what all that noise was about? He laughed and said, "Nothing: it is only the boys amusing themselves." She said, "Where are the boys?" and turned round. Ouben then, with the tomahawk, which he carried concealed behind his back, struck her a blow below the shoulder-blade; and, on her falling on a heap of grass, he nearly cut her head off, and otherwise mutilated her in various parts of the body. Such was the fate of two of God's most zealous servants. It is now four years since Mr. Gordon and his wife arrived here—viz., since June 14, 1857, and during this time they have laboured hard among the rude and ferocious Erromangans with little apparent success. Privations of the most distressing kind have been cheerfully and uncomplainingly borne, and the many attempts made against their lives, although hitherto unsuccessful, have rendered their residence here continually full of anxiety and alarm.

The cause of the murder, I am informed, and from my own experience I am certain to be the case, is as follows: Several months ago the measles, which had previously raged in Sydney, made its appearance in New Caledonia, and there, notwithstanding the exertions of the Governor and the other officials, it rapidly made progress, and a serious mortality was the result. The infection was thence carried by the various trading vessels calling there to all the surrounding islands, and fearful were the ravages of the distemper amongst the natives. At Lafou, Mare, Aniteum, Tana, Sandwich, Espirito Santo, and Erromango, thousands and thousands died—in fact, some of these places have been nearly depopulated. Strange to say, a similar disease has never before made its appearance among the natives, and they at once attributed it to their connexion with the white men, and called it "the white man's curse." The consequence of this idea, especially among the more savage tribes, was naturally a bitter hostility against foreigners, and, singularly enough, against the only class who had had nothing to do with the introduction of the disease, but, on the contrary, who had tried all means in their power to avert the calamity—I mean the missionaries. At Aniteum, where the mortality was dreadful, the natives repeatedly threatened to take the life of Mr. and Mrs. Geddie, and they burnt down the two handsome churches there. At Tana matters were equally bad; repeated attacks were made on Mr. Paton and his property; and I myself, on one occasion, heard Miaki, the chief at Port Resolution, threaten to take his life if he would not go away in the vessel which brought me there. He refused to go, and hitherto his life has been spared, but I much fear that unless he has left before the tidings of the Erromangan massacre reaches Tana, he will also fall a victim. Here, however, the malady being so virulent as to threaten the extermination of the natives, and their characters being so savagely ferocious, the greatest animosity existed towards the whites; and, notwithstanding that Mr. Gordon went daily from morning to night amongst the people, administering medicine, and endeavouring to alleviate as far as lay in his power their misery, he became the object of their extreme hatred. Nuivan, a chief, having been prostrated by the disease, when almost dying, sent for Mr. Gordon, who gave him some medicine. Nuivan died next day; the tribe said that the missionary had poisoned him, and it was resolved to kill all the whites. A plan was laid, and so ingeniously artful was the scheme, that had it not been divulged by a friendly native, about ten minutes before the time appointed for its execution, we would almost certainly have all perished. Of course when the party came to carry their intentions into effect we were prepared, and they went off disappointed. To add to their feelings of enmity towards Mr. Gordon, there was yet another reason, and to illustrate this I copy the following entry in his diary. Speaking of this singular disease, which is strange and alarming to all, he writes: "It was preceded by nearly an universal opposition to the Gospel, and much murder and idolatry. I felt sure that God would visit them in judgment, and warned them most solemnly but a few days before they were attacked. The chiefs, who maintain that, to give up their idols is the cessation of their rule, can hardly now persuade their people that this is not the finger of Jehovah. I warned them to flee from the wrath to come, but they took no warning till too late." From the disease following close on these warnings, the natives believed that the missionary had prayed to God to send it on them; and this belief readily accorded with the fixed ideas of witchcraft which obtain universally in this island. About two months ago he writes: "It seems that I was nearly shot two Sabbaths ago, near Bunk-hill, as I was getting on my horse. Some circumstance prevented—perhaps the torrents of rain which fell, while I was engaged as Paul and Silas by the Macedonian river side. It is almost impossible for a missionary to fall into greater perils among such a people, for their belief in witchcraft is universal, and they seem to look upon me as their destroyer." About a fortnight before his death he preached at Bunk-hill, rebuking his hearers sharply for their idolatry and wickedness. This offended the tribe; they resolved on his murder; and how well they succeeded in their devilish designs the event has shown.

Amidst the gloom and grief which the tidings of this dreadful event will occasion to the relatives and friends of these martyrs, and indeed to all Christians who are interested in the cause of missions, it must be cheering to know that in all their troubles and anxieties Mr. Gordon and his wife steadfastly rested their trust on the Rock of Ages, and at all times they submissively bent to His will. The last words in Mr. Gordon's diary are: "Thanks be to God for the measure of faith granted to us in these troublesome and perilous times. Bless the Lord, oh my soul! who redeemeth thy life from destruction." Unwearingly they laboured in the cause of Christ, and now they have been called upon to receive the crown of martyrdom, and to enjoy in His presence the fullness of reward.

We were highly delighted yesterday by a visit from Bishop Patterson, of New Zealand. All the Mission boys wept at the sight of him, as they recalled his last visit here to their remembrance. We crossed over to the grave which has been enclosed by a fence by the boys. The Bishop read with much fervour and feeling the beautiful service of the English Church over the tomb, and immediately afterwards proceeded on his voyage to the northern islands.

He informed me that the John Williams might be expected here daily, and I shall put Mr. Gordon's property on board of her. With sentiments of the deepest respect,

I remain, Rev. Sir, your very obedient servant.

"THE BIBLE FOR THE PANDITS."

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

LETTER III.

Gentlemen,—Continuing my corrections of certain misconceptions in regard to "The Bible for the Pandits," and to missionary efforts in India generally, I proceed to another passage in the Calcutta Review (of Sept., 1860). There are many points on which I am anxious to set my friendly reviewer right; but two of these will, perhaps, require for their treatment as much space as you can afford for the present letter.

At p. 38 the reviewer says:—

We would now gladly close these remarks. But we must not forget—Amicus Plato, magis amica veritas. Duty compels us to use our censorial authority on some passages of the introduction, which seem to us more or less objectionable.

He then selects four passages for censure, and commences upon the first of them (which he misunderstands) as follows:—

1. Dr. B. has expended a large amount of his ingenuity on the inquiry, Can the word Nirguna be properly applied, as it is by the Vedantin, to Almighty God? It strikes us that the controversy might be easily cut short, if the following preliminary question were first settled. Supposing that guna refers only to the qualities of material things; has the Sanskrit, we ask, any term that could be used of spiritual qualities or attributes? If it have, let the word be produced; we shall know what use to make of it. If it have not, where can be the use of employing so inadequate an instrument of thought—one that can only adapt itself to the two antipodal errors of Idealism and Materialism—in the discussion of theological topics? The sooner such a language modestly retires into the domain of the past the better.

Here I interrupt my transcription in order to settle the "preliminary question"—a question akin to that famous one, "Have you left off beating your wife?" Those who are so unhappy as not to have read Whately, may require to be informed, that if you answer "Yes," then you are held to have acknowledged that you were formerly in the habit of beating her; whereas, if you answer "No," you avow that the habit is one which you have not yet given up. When a sophist (or an Old Bailey practitioner) attempts to pass off so stale a trick upon you, you naturally turn contemptuously away, with the intimation that you are too old a bird to be chaffed with the Fallacia plurium Interrogationum. But the case is different when an honest man has slid unconsciously into an employment of the fallacy in question. Him—if (on the ground of his intelligence) you think him worth setting right—you are bound in conscience to try and set right. Now none but a man of great acuteness, with an unsuspected blunder in his premises, could have produced such an ingeniously-tangled skein of confusion as the foregoing extract presents; and, as the confusion is that of a wise and earnest man, not that of a blockhead or a caviller, it is worth disentangling. It is due to the Calcutta Reviewer that he should not be left to enjoy the delusion which, under cover of his authority, would be but too readily welcomed by very inferior men.

The Plures Interrogationes are contained in the seemingly simple query, "Supposing that guna refers only to the qualities of material things; has the Sanskrit, we ask, any term that could be used of spiritual qualities or attributes?" I must not answer "No," because that would be false; and, on the other hand, if I answer "Yes," then, if this debate were oral (which, Heaven be thanked, it is not), I should shudder when called upon to produce the word—well knowing what a burst of "inextinguishable laughter" I should have (sick at heart) to submit to, before being allowed even an impatient hearing of my demonstration—that there was no ground for laughter at all.

Since, seated at my own desk, I can arrange my exposition according to my own will and pleasure, I am enabled to avoid being peremptorily forced upon the alternative horn of the false dilemma. It is in my power to expose its falsity, and thus to preclude the groundless cachinnation, which, in the case of a reader instead of a hearer, would take the shape of a contemptuous flinging away of my letter with the sequel unread.

The falsity of the imagined dilemma, then, resides in the ambiguity of the clause, "Supposing that guna refers only to the qualities of material things." And here I cannot refrain from giving utterance to my mortification and disappointment, at having to heave the Sisyphean stone yet once again uphill, for the sake of one so usually clear-headed as the Calcutta reviewer. Is it not hard, gentlemen, and disheartening, that after I had printed an address, tendered to me by the head Pandits of Benares, declaring their full acceptance of my representation of their view of Brahm as nirguna, and after I had further taken the pains, in order to facilitate the comprehension of the point by Europeans, to throw the thing into an elaborate (and in some sense exhaustive) dialogue (English and Sanskrit), the Calcutta reviewer should (in his own mind, and in the minds of the numbers who, not unnaturally, pin their faith upon his dicta) have confused (and positively muddled) the whole matter again, by ignoring the distinction which I had laboured so assiduously (and, according to the verdict of the Benares Pandits, with such entire success) to elucidate and illustrate, which exists between the application of the term guna in the Nyāya, or exoteric, system, and its application in the Vedānta, or esoteric, system? At the end of the dialogue (at p. 63) I declared as follows:—

I have thus shown, with the entire concurrence and approval of the Pandits of Benares, that God (Brahm) is "without the qualities" (guna), amongst which qualities "the Existent" (sat)—viz., the existent "Thought" (chit), this Thought existing as a "Joy" (ananda), is not reckoned by the Vedantins.

I added — but I did not anticipate that the remark would prove applicable, alas! to the Calcutta reviewer:—

I shall not be surprised if no missionary in India for the next fifty years shall consent to understand this—unless, perhaps, he be a German. Of course, I shall be just as little surprised if, for the next fifty years, the "zeal not according to knowledge" of the missionaries shall prove, as hitherto, a failure.

The attentive reader will now be in a position to judge how dangerous it would have been for me to answer in the affirmative simply the reviewer's intentionally most sincere, but practically most insidious, "preliminary question," "Supposing that guna refers only to the qualities of material things; has the Sanskrit, we ask, any term that could be used of spiritual qualities or attributes?"

In accordance with Whately's indication, that in such a case "the refutation is, of course, to reply separately to each question—i.e., to detect the ambiguity"—I have exposed the ambiguity—viz., the lumping together of the exoteric and the esoteric applications of the term guna, and thus there emerge the reviewer's two questions (introducing themselves in his own pages as "Two single gentlemen rolled into one"), viz.:—

I. "Does guna refer only to the qualities of material things?"

And II. "Has the Sanskrit any term that could be used of spiritual qualities or attributes?"

Answering the second question first (for the wording of the first question opens to my sad eye "even in the lowest depths a lower still" of misunderstanding of what I flattered myself I had made so clear, so that I find I have not left myself time to dissect it this month) I reply, that assuredly the Sanskrit language has a "term that could be used of spiritual qualities or attributes." It is simply the term guna, which, in the exoteric system of the Nyāya, corresponds exactly to our term quality—as may be seen at page 49 of the introduction, where the follower of the Nyāya enumerates knowledge, pleasure, pain, desire, &c., as qualities of the soul, while he enumerates colour, &c., as qualities of what is not soul. The astounding blunder of the acute Calcutta reviewer, in imagining that the Sanskrit language must be an "inadequate instrument of thought," and one which ought as soon as possible to "retire modestly into the regions of the past," on the ground that the Vedantin regards knowledge and joy not as qualities of something else, but as the one solitary reality, would only be paralleled in its stupendousness by the supposition that the English language was an inadequate instrument of thought, and one that had better modestly betake itself to oblivion as soon as possible—on the ground that David Hume, with those (if any) who on this point concur with him, regard ideas and impressions not as residing in a spiritual substratum, but as constituting all that really is.

I have not left myself time for more at present.

Faithfully yours,

Brief Literary Notices.

The Unsearchable Riches of Christ. Illustrated by appropriate Texts and Hymns. With a Preface by the Rev. J. STEVENSON, D.D. London: Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.

A VERY small book, of which the title is a sufficient description, inasmuch as it consists of a selection of texts and hymns, with a preface. The compiler has chosen many of the most beautiful passages of Scripture, arranged them under separate heads, and added a hymn to each head in such a way that we have, at each opening, texts on one page and a hymn on the other. The arrangement proceeds in this way: "Attributes, properties," etc.—"Aspects, operations," etc.—"In Him are treasured up," etc.—"He bestoweth"—"This Salvation is," etc. It is apparent that the work makes no pretences to any character but that of usefulness. Had it been otherwise, we should have suggested a slight modification of some of the headings, and a somewhat different position for some of the texts. In the meantime, we have much pleasure in calling attention to it, as calculated to comfort, encourage, and confirm in the faith, as suitable for spare moments, and as an appropriate little present. We would also recommend the preface, which breathes a spirit of ardent piety and love to Christ.

The Development of the Wealth of India. Reprinted from Macmillan's Magazine: with Notes on the Different Administrative and Judicial Systems Required for the Asiatic Races, and the British Inhabitants. By THOMAS HARE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Macmillan and Co.

This pamphlet contains many statements of much importance, and although its aim is civil, and not religious, it deserves the careful attention of all who take an interest in India. It is impossible for missions to be intelligently conducted if their directors have no knowledge of the state of Indian society, the character of the people, and the working of their institutions. Missionaries, of course, make it a duty to attend to these things. There are some things in these pages which have a general interest, and which throw light upon the moral and religious principles of the Hindoos. It is apparent that a vast work has to be done in that country, before it will be delivered from the accumulated evils which oppress it, and before the Gospel of Christ makes any very general impression upon its benighted inhabitants.

Seven Speakers, but One Voice; or, Notices of all the "Essays and Reviews." By the Rev. C. HERBERT. London: Nisbet and Co. 1861.

THIS pamphlet forms part of an addition made by Mr. Herbert to the second edition of his "Neology not True, and Truth not New." It is intended for distribution, and to supply information as to the character and contents of the now famous "Essays and Reviews." We have been interested in it, and regard it as well adapted for the purpose which called it into existence. Mr. Herbert is a resolute and earnest advocate and defender of that good old divinity which is borrowed from the Bible.

The Tabernacle of Testimony in the Wilderness: Evangelically Explained, and Practically Improved. By the Rev. W. MURPHY. 3rd Edition. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

THIS is undoubtedly an interesting work, and one upon the preparation of which the author has bestowed no inconsiderable labour. It is written in an intelligible style, and in a devout and earnest spirit, and it reveals a large acquaintance with the Word of God. The author treats of the Tabernacle, its furniture, and its services, and endeavours to develop their typical allusions to better things to come. With not a few of his conclusions we quite agree, and we admire the general accuracy of his statements. But our main difficulty lies with the views he has adopted in regard to much that is yet future. We are not, in this respect, disciples of the same school; for we believe that most of the modern Millenarians are building on an imaginary basis, and that so far as they look for a person reign they are mistaken. In a second advent we do believe; but not such a second advent as our friends look for, nor an advent for such purposes. In a Millennium we also believe; but not such a Millennium as they expect. However plausible, attractive, and popular the opposite opinions may appear to be, we cannot receive them as legitimate conclusions from the Holy Scriptures. With this exception, we have much pleasure in recommending Mr. Mudge's excellent and instructive book.

Words from the Workshop. Edited by NEWMAN HALL, LL.B. London: Nisbet.

MR. HALL says: "The following testimonies of working men were delivered in the presence of the editor, principally at meetings over which he presided as chairman. They are reported in a condensed form, but as nearly as possible in the words of the speakers." The testimonies are in favour of temperance, and will be found very appropriate reading for those who groan under the sin and curse of intemperance. Some of the cases are very striking; all are in earnest words, and have every appearance of recording personal convictions and actual experience.

Italian Navvies on the West Swiss Railway. London: Wertheim, Mackintosh, and Hunt.

THE leading facts contained in this narrative appeared at the commencement of the present year in Evangelical Christendom. The work accomplished closely resembles that of which Miss Marsh was the honoured instrument among the navvies at the building of the Crystal Palace; but it has its own remarkable and distinctive features. Our readers will be glad to learn that it is still progressing, and that, in order to impart to it a permanent character, the erection of a place of worship at Maggiore, near Lake Como, for the use of the Italian navvies, is contemplated. The lady with whom the movement originated receives the warm thanks of Dr. Merle d'Aubigné in an interesting preface which he contributes to her little book.

The Old Theology the True Theology; or, the Justification and the Sanctification of the Holy Scriptures, the Early Fathers, &c., &c. By the Rev. WILLIAM ELLIOTT, Epsom. London: Nisbet.

THIS neat and compact volume consists of three lectures on Sanctification and Justification, delivered before the members of the Christian Union Institute, and published at their request. This institute, on the principles of the Evangelical Alliance, meets regularly in Trafalgar-place, Charing-cross, for prayer and religious conference on current theological topics.

The subjects of the lectures are of the highest importance, and are arranged with dialectic skill. The form of the lectures was determined, we presume, by the exigencies of the occasion; they are neither discourses nor essays, dissertations nor sermons, but jottings of topics for discussion, with a considerable array of proof passages from the Scriptures, the Fathers, the Creeds, and the Confessions of Protestant Churches. There are also a few flying shots at Papistical and Neological theologians. Hence, the volume is rather for reference than continuous reading, and will be useful to persons unable to pursue a lengthened examination of the doctrines in question.

The chief merit of the work is its unflinching advocacy of "Justification by Faith" and Sanctification by the Holy Spirit. Many of the quotations from ancient authors are exceedingly interesting, as well as confirmatory of the truths advanced in the text.

We are not prepared to endorse every statement contained in the volume, and most certainly not that in the preface, which represents the holy and loving Redeemer thanking the Father in Matt. xi. 25, 26, on account of the "fatal blindness and well-merited destruction" of the "wise and prudent" Pharisees. His thanks were given on account of the fact, that though the proud Pharisee would not submit to the truth, "the babes" had received this message and become obedient to His will.

The following extract on Faith will illustrate the spirit and style of this useful little volume:—

"Many indeed are the exploits which faith performs; it 'removes mountains,' it 'overcomes the world,' it 'tramples down the devil;' but whatsoever it does, it accomplishes it, not by its own native powers or virtues, but by the power of Christ; who, whenever called upon by faith, 'rides upon the heavens' to the assistance of the saints. To Christ, not to faith, be all the glory! At His feet let all faith's crowns be cast! Faith conquers only by renouncing self, and by calling in the sword and arm of another; so faith justifies, not by becoming herself righteousness for us, but by leading us to take shelter in the righteousness of Christ. And, after all, faith saves only as it is an instrument; and, as an instrument, it is at the best imperfect. It is, in relation to the exploits which it performs, and to the justification which it secures, what the hand of Moses was in relation to the wonderful works which he was employed to execute, and to the liberty which he secured to Israel—an instrument merely, and one far from perfect. Already that hand had wrought two great miracles, and it is appointed to perform many more. Human frailty, even in the meekest of men, was in danger of being 'lifted up by the abundance of the' Divine manifestations. God will, therefore, at the commencement, and when the first honours have been put upon that hand, show unto it that it is polluted, and that it is also powerless. 'Put now thine hand into thy bosom' (Exodus iv. 6); 'out of the heart' all evils proceed, and that hand comes forth 'leprous as snow.' Yet God does not reject it. He uses that which is sinful and powerless to be an instrument of His glory—and so it is of faith. 'That no flesh may glory in His presence;' 'that he that glorieth may glory only in the Lord.'"

We trust, when a second edition is required, that the publisher will abolish the italics with which the pages are now crowded and disfigured. They are too numerous to be emphatic, and are repeatedly given where no emphasis is required.

SLAVERY, AND THE SOUTHERN STATES OF AMERICA.*

THE other day we read in a letter from Virginia: "The South possess nearly four millions of slaves, worth on an average say 150*l.* each." That is to say, there are nearly four millions of the inhabitants of the South who are destitute, by the circumstances of their birth, of every personal, social, and civil right. These four millions of human beings have their value in the market precisely like oxen, sheep, or swine; they are therefore defined as "property," worth in the gross some six hundred millions of pounds sterling. We, on this side of the Atlantic, are accustomed to wonder at the infatuation of our forefathers, who thought and reasoned much as men do now-a-days down South. But we see a considerable difference in the two cases. Our fathers lived before the subject had been thoroughly canvassed; and they never made England a mart for slaves, and the home of slaves. Step by step they recognised the enormity of the evil wherever it existed, and at length cast it away for ever. Not so the Southern States of America. They may have renounced the open and avowed practice of manstealing, and cease to send out publicly those horrid floating dungeons which were glutted with victims on the shores of Africa; but they still perpetuate slavery, and go on from year to year adding to the numbers of their slaves. In 1790 there were, we believe, only six Southern States—Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, North and South Carolina, and Georgia. As far as we can gather, the number of slaves in these States at that time was 645,022. Then the idea of emancipation was by no means a stranger, and measures were taken, not only for ameliorating the condition of the slaves, but for diminishing the extent of slavery, and eventually abolishing it. Now, however, the perpetuity of slavery is looked upon as indispensable to the welfare, if not to the existence, of society in those districts. Countless acres of waste land have been brought under cultivation during the last seventy years, and the growth of cotton has been extended to such a degree as to be of vast importance to the whole world. For the cultivation of land and the production of cotton, slaves were found to be the cheapest and most fitting agents. By their employment wealth has been accumulated to an otherwise impossible extent. Selfishness has, therefore, prevailed over every other consideration, and the rights of humanity have been trampled under foot.

The North had no such powerful motives for perpetuating slavery—the voice of justice was listened to, emancipation was effected, and all that was done was done by free men. Between the two great divisions of the country a hostile feeling sprang up, in part owing to this difference, and the mournful results are seen in the present fatal war. The complications of the case have been very much increased by the Constitution of the United States. Two points may be mentioned. How far did the several States abandon their independence when they gave in their adhesion to the Union? The Constitution does contemplate and provide for the creation of new States, but it does not say anything of a right of secession. To us it appears that the entire structure of the Government forbids the idea, and requires all the States to form one nationality, under one central and general governing power. The Union was a federation and amalgamation of several States into one organic whole, to be under the control of the central, ruling, and representative body, with the President at the head. This President was to be the President of all the States, and, therefore, of each, and hence optional secession was impossible. Treason was declared to include the arming of State against State. We do not see, then, how the compact could be dissolved, except by common consent. No State could enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; it could coin no money, impose no taxes, keep no troops, engage in no war, nor even collect taxes. So much for the first point. As to the second, the Constitution clearly commits the whole of the States to the toleration of slavery, so long as it remains unabolished by the supreme Legislative Government. The second section of the fourth article provides, that "No person held to service or labour in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labour, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labour may be due." Here, then, lies the difficulty: so long as the North recognises the Constitution, it is bound to restore runaway slaves to their masters, and such has been the practice. How is this question to be solved? A peaceable solution is no longer possible, and even a constitutional mode of solution is rendered impracticable, because the parties to the agreement are divided and cannot meet. Possibly the States which still recognise the legitimate President and Government, viewing the seceders as traitors, might first pass an act depriving them of their constitutional rights, and then another emancipating all the slaves in the territory ruled by the central Government. And yet, perhaps, if the first law could not be resisted, the second could not be enforced. In that case, until the reduction of the South by the North, all that could be done would be to guarantee the freedom of slaves escaping. This would involve a twofold and a terrible evil. The North would be overwhelmed with miserable fugitives whom it would be ill prepared to provide for. The South would see many of its four millions of slaves rising in rebellion, and a servile war would supervene upon the civil war. The consequences of a servile war are too fearful to contemplate. No mercy would be shown, and whole hecatombs of unhappy men, women, and children, would be slaughtered. It could not be otherwise. Goaded to desperation by their circumstances, the Southerners would rather slay than surrender their slaves. Maddened with the idea of liberty and the prospect of revenge, the half savage African race would plunge into the worst excesses. Every way, then, wherever we look, we see but little expectation of an amicable adjustment of this difficulty. If the Southern States prevail, slavery will continue, and the nation will be divided. If the Northern States prevail, it is only by the compulsion of law over those whom they have subdued that slavery can be abolished. The crisis, however, is come, and it becomes us calmly and manfully to look it in the face. The catastrophe is imminent, and we cannot unmoved ask whether it shall rivet the manacles of the poor slave more firmly than ever, or whether it shall set him free. It is no time for half-hearted, selfish speculation, inasmuch as this is no mere matter of pounds, shillings and pence. We must look at it as men, and as Christians, and try to cast aside our ideas of "King Cotton," and the potent dollar. If slavery is an unholy thing, if slaves are men, and not brutes, emancipation ought to be striven for with all the energy of our souls, and at any cost.

We are often told that the slaves are happy, that they have many privileges, and that they conduce much to the wealth and independence of the South. We are told that slaves are a degraded race, incapable of improvement, and unfit for the rights and liberties of freemen. We are told that emancipation would desolate the country, diminish its resources, and be in every way a universal calamity. Above all, as Englishmen, we are told that slavery is essential to us, because we cannot do without slave-grown cotton, the withdrawal of which would stop our mills, plunge myriads into poverty and want, and be the ruin of Manchester and Liverpool. Some of these things may be true, and no doubt disastrous effects would immediately follow emancipation; but after all, in a question of such tremendous magnitude as a question of principle, many will be found to say, "Fiat justitia, ruat cælum"—let justice be done, whatever befall.

Looking at the state of Southern Society and of the South by the light of Mr. Olmsted's book, we find our sense of the evils of slavery by no means diminished. The author of these volumes is strong in his Northern sympathies, and his views may not be quite impartial. But it is very apparent that what he says is substantially accurate, and we thoroughly concur in many of the conclusions which he draws from undeniable facts. He has travelled extensively, and indeed has visited all the important cotton districts of the South. From Washington to Alabama, from Alabama to Texas, from Texas to Kentucky, and back again to Washington, is a tour which leaves little unseen. The man who has made such a journey with his eyes open, must have seen every phase of slave life and labour, as well as every phase of the Southern character, and must be tolerably familiar with the resources and productions of the country. Mr. Olmsted has journeyed with his ears and eyes open, and with his note-book in his hand; and he has recorded on the spot what he has seen and heard. We regret that we cannot reproduce here some of the graphic scenes which he has depicted, and some of his minute descriptions of men, manners, and the country. It is only with his general impressions and conclusions that we can deal, and indeed only with a few of these. The book itself will show that the South is not upon the whole remarkable for Arcadian simplicity and innocence, nor for apostolic piety. Above all, it will show that the system which dooms the slave to ignorance, degradation, and drudgery, tells very powerfully by its retroactive influence upon very many of the free white population. The very personal characteristics which are created by the effort to carry out the slave system are a punishment, a reproach, and a curse to the tyrant as well as his victims.

It has always been so, and must continue to be so. It is the penalty which the slaveowner and slavedriver must pay; a homage to moral law which they must render. Seventy years since, Mr. Winterbotham, in his "History of America," said: "A considerable proportion of the people are much addicted to gaming, drinking, swearing, horse-racing, cock-fighting, and most kinds of dissipation." This was said of Virginia, the colony which was founded by members of the Church of England, and which prides itself on its gentlemanly descent. To such an extent was this beast of blood carried, that before the Revolution it was "considered beneath a gentleman to attend to mercantile concerns." Hence there has always been a greater disparity between the rich and poor in Virginia than in the North. The writer just quoted remarks that "there must doubtless be an unhappy influence on the manners of the people, produced by the existence of slavery among them. The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions, the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other. The children see this, and learn to imitate it, for man is an imitative animal." He goes on to describe the way in which this miserable state of things exemplifies itself, and adds: "With the morals of the people their industry also is destroyed; for in a warm climate no man will labour for himself who can make another labour for him. This is so true, that of the proprietors of slaves a very small proportion indeed are ever seen to labour." This is extensively applicable to the Slave States now, and the narratives of Mr. Olmsted abundantly show that the influence of slavery contaminates and demoralises the free population, and, above all, those who own and oversee the slaves. Now, as of old, "the pride which grows on slavery, and is habitual to those who from their infancy are taught to believe and feel their superiority, is a visible characteristic of the inhabitants." Slavery naturally perpetuates the existence of large estates, and the centralisation of wealth in a comparatively small number, who grow very rich and powerful. It really retards the development of the general resources c the country, because the rule is, that the whites will work no more than they are compelled, and in this resemble the-slaves. There are, no doubt, many whom the mere love of gain makes active and enterprising; but even the love of money is not sufficient to render those industrious who can get wealth by the forced labour of their slaves. In the remote districts there may be much of a certain simplicity; but it is often associated with a brutal coarseness and vulgarity which is most repulsive. Cases are to be met with in which masters are naturally kind, and who are religious in their habits, and correct in their morals. Then the lot of a slave is tolerable, and he may forget his misery amid the comforts he enjoys, and the kindnesses he receives. But it is truly shocking to regard some of the pictures which are drawn in Mr. Olmsted's pages, and impossible to deny what we have already asserted as to the fearful immorality of every possible kind which slavery fosters. It is assuredly true that "the institution of African slavery is a means more effective than any other yet devised for relieving a large body of men from the necessity of labour." But who will believe that any population which can afford to live in idleness will be morally, intellectually, or religiously great? Now, as ever, "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." In the minds of such men, "labour is associated with servility, weakness, cowardice;" but there has been generated a spirit of bravado, and overbearing, and haughtiness, which is by no means an ornament or a blessing. After all, however, Mr. Olmsted declares that there is a vast amount of meanness among the free whites, that there is a large population, little better than paupers, and that even cotton-growing by slave-hands is not always the way to wealth.

In the matter of religion and education, slavery is an unmitigated curse. The children of the wealthy often reside with their parents, several miles from their nearest wealthy neighbours, and the consequence is that they grow up ignorant and ungodly. Churches and schools in such localities are few and far between. What the rich do not provide for themselves they will not provide for the poor, whether free or slave. Nay, the poor and the slave may not wish to have what their betters can do without. Books are scarce and but little sought for. Newspapers are, for the most part, wretched productions, very much taken up with commercial and trading matters, commonly adorned with advertisements of runaway negroes, or of the sale of slaves. Yet these newspapers are the only literature which thousands ever see. Amusements there are, but they are not of the most elevating and humanising description. The weekly holiday is often, indeed, a time when all restraint upon their passions is abandoned by the slaves, and they give way to all kinds of excesses and vices. The slave system keeps the poor whites poorer, for the rich will always prefer the slave, over whom they have absolute and perpetual control, by once paying for him, to the free man, who can change his master if he will, who can exact a reasonable price for his labour, and who must periodically receive wages. For food and raiment the slave costs little, and for wages nothing. If he is a child, he is reared somehow, in hope of a future reward; if he is sick he is attended to sometimes, because his death would be a loss greater than that of a horse; if he is old, he is permitted to live and do what he can till he drops in the dust. There are places in which religious privileges are enjoyed, but they are usually managed so as not to interfere with the slave's work, so as not to develop much his intellectual powers, and so as to impress him more deeply with the sense of his duty to serve and obey his master.

We cannot go into the commercial question, and ask where the money is spent which the slaves earn. Mr. Olmsted says, not in houses, libraries, churches, school-houses, mills, railroads, or anything of the kind. It is not expended upon public works, or works of benevolence, nor is it laid out in foreign importations, because next to nothing is imported. It is absorbed somehow, and chiefly it is represented by the greater value of the land and of the slave.

Apart, then, from any quarrel between the North and the South, here is a great field for Christian philanthropy. Here is an immense population of slaves and free-men, who are, morally and religiously, as well as intellectually and socially, in a deplorable condition. Good men there are among them, but they are like Lot in Sodom. Goodness itself is dwarfed and blighted; religious men, ministers of the Gospel, Churchmen, Baptists, Methodists, &c., are tainted with the national disease. There is Bishop Polk, for example, holding 400 slaves, and now carrying a musket in the battle-field. There are many Christian professors who uphold slavery as a divine institution, and who deny that slaves are really men at all. Hence they view them as only in a modified degree morally and religiously responsible. But we pause, expressing the earnest hope and prayer that peace will soon be restored, and that one of its first consequences will be an endeavour to enlighten and to evangelise the black and white populations of the South.

THE CONVICTION AND IMPRISONMENT OF REV. J. LONG.

We cannot allow the criminal prosecution and conviction of the Rev. James Long for libel in Calcutta to be passed over by us in silence. Our readers are probably all aware that Mr. Long has been connected with the Church Missionary Society, as one of its missionaries, for upwards of twenty years. Among the many able missionaries of various denominations who labour in and around Calcutta, he has always been deservedly named among the foremost. His mastery of the native languages, his attempts to raise up a native Christian literature, his acquaintance with the vernacular literature current among the Hindus of Bengal, have ever secured for him affection from many and respect from all. We were greatly struck with an idea, expressed by him some years ago, of a work in which the truths of Holy Scripture were to be explained and illustrated by means of similes and imagery drawn from native Bengali and Sanskrit books. Whether his work on that subject has yet been published we know not, but the idea seems deserving of thought by those who would become all things to all men, if by any means they might gain souls for Christ.

No wonder, therefore, that it caused general surprise to hear that a missionary of such zeal and piety was condemned by the Supreme Court of Calcutta to a month's imprisonment in the common gaol of that city, and to pay a fine of 1,000 rupees. His alleged crime was that he had been guilty of libel in translating and procuring the publication of a native drama entitled the Nil Darpan, or the Mirror of Indigo Planting. This drama was written against the indigo planters of Bengal, and intended, of course, to excite popular feeling against them.

On this account, however, it was the more important that the drama should be divested of its Bengali dress, and set forth in plain English, in order that the native opinion on this point might be more clearly understood. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has expressed his firm conviction that much of the unfavourable condition of the Government in 1857 was owing to the neglect of inquiry into the state of feeling among the Hindus. Officials in India have been too much isolated, and too seldom have been able to understand the spoken languages of the country they governed, through the medium of which alone the true state of native feeling could be known. Of great importance, therefore, it is that the popular songs and dramas of the country should be read by those who have anything to do with the Hindus.

Under a sense of their importance, Mr. Long has been in the habit of sending native books of interest, whether the views set forward in them were correct or not, to those likely to make a proper use of them. Some years ago he procured for the India-house Library, at the instance of the late Court of Directors, copies of all original publications in Bengali. Similarly, Mr. Long has sent to Oxford copies of all Bengal translations of Sanskrit texts, and on the publication of several works in defence of Hinduism, he likewise brought them under the notice of the missionary body.

Writing on this subject, Mr. Long says: "I have never received, nor would I take from Government, or any other party, one cowrie as pay for services in this way—looking on them as part of my work—as a branch of missionary literary work. Government, however, have encouraged me by publishing some of my reports on the native press. In 1855 they published in the 'Selections of the Bengal Government' my 'Returns of Authors and Translators of Vernacular Literature,' &c.; of this 800 copies were printed by the direction of Sir F. Halliday; and of my 'Classified Catalogue of 1,400 Bengali Books and Tracts' (which was also published in 1855) 300 copies were subscribed for by Government, so that the work paid its expenses. Of my 'Returns Relating to the Vernacular Press,' in 1859, Government also published 500 copies. I have reason to know that these have been of use to the friends of missions and of education in India, in England, and even in Germany, and that they have called serious attention to the subject of the native press."

Again: "Well would it have been for India had the mutterings of the native press been earlier attended to before the mutiny! They were neglected, and men slept quietly over the brink of a volcano. Had translations been made from the native press of the Agra Presidency, indicating the state of feeling towards Government a year before the mutiny, and had these been communicated to official and other influential persons, it is possible that Europeans might not have been taken so unawares with all their arsenals in Sepoy hands. I was in the Agra Presidency a few months before the mutiny, and was much struck with the contempt with which influential parties regarded any indications of native opinions, as expressed by the native press. Similarly, in 1853, when exploring the lanes and gullies of Delhi, in search of vernacular books, I was impressed with the prodigious activity of the Moslem mind, and I left Delhi with the intense conviction that the combustible materials were gathering, and only required the match to be applied to them."

Fully convinced of the truth of this opinion, on the publication of the Nil Darpan, Mr. Long brought it under the notice of Mr. Seton-Karr, the Secretary of the Bengal Government. A translation of it was accordingly prepared by a native, under the editorship of Mr. Long. Mr. Seton-Karr gave his full "sanction" to its publication—in fact, he became the real publisher, for the entire number of the copies printed were sent to him, and in general circulated under the Government frank, Mr. Long only supplying a list of some few persons to whom he desired to have it sent. Mr. Seton-Karr was, it appears, under "the impression the translation and printing was to be a Government act, paid for by Government;" whereas the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal seems to have intended that the translation and the printing of a few copies were to be wholly a private affair.

The indigo-planters naturally took umbrage at the Government publication of the drama, and commenced an action for libel against Mr. Long, which has terminated in a verdict of guilty under the old law of libel still in force in India, and in the sentence before mentioned. The law of the case does not seem to be approved of, and the conduct of Sir Mordaunt Wells on the bench has been severely commented upon, his unfair attacks on the native Hindus having called forth an indignant protest on the part of the leading natives of Calcutta.

That Mr. Long has been very hardly and unfairly treated, is the almost universal opinion of all, except those, of course, peculiarly interested in his conviction. Even the Saturday Review has acquitted him of all blame, while it does not see how any notice can with propriety be taken of the Judge's charge by the Government at home. Numbers of sympathisers from all classes, European and native, from those high in authority, have called upon the missionary in his prison. Dr. Duff relates that no sooner had the sentence been pronounced than a native gentleman stepped forward and at once paid the fine, and other native gentlemen were ready to have done the same, even had the fine imposed been five or ten times the amount. The missionaries of the Church Missionary Society in Calcutta have condoled with their afflicted brother; the General Missionary Conference, composed of all denominations, have similarly sent an address of sympathy; and upwards of 3,000 natives have signed an address to the missionary, in which they state that, while "they deeply regret the result of the late trial, they have still satisfaction in thinking that he will have the consolation of having suffered in the cause of justice and humanity, in promoting the vital interests of the poor, the weak, and the suffering of this country."

Most pleasing of all is the intelligence conveyed in the following extract from a letter of Mr. Long, written from his prison: "— called on me lately, and said how much he was struck with the tone of the native newspapers, who were astonished at the fact of a Christian missionary cheerfully going to prison in the cause of the oppressed. The editor of one Bengal paper writes: 'If this be Christianity, then we wish Christianity would spread all over the country.' Who knows but that this imprisonment may have the effect of imprisonment in the days of primitive Christianity."

We most heartily say AMEN. We trust that more of the attention of this country will be given to mitigating the sufferings of the poor and often oppressed ryot, that those hindrances to the spread of the Gospel from the unchristian conduct of so many of our own countrymen may soon cease in India, and that more zealous, more prayerful, more strenuous efforts may be made for the evangelisation of that dark land.

THE DENIAL OF INSPIRATION: WHAT IT MUST LEAD TO.

WHEN a man finds himself in a false position, he has not always the moral courage to abandon it. He more frequently continues in it as long as possible, and sometimes to the end of his life. This is especially the case with those clergymen who have in heart renounced the principles which they have been ordained to uphold and teach. The motives which may detain such men at their post are so many and so subtle, that it is impossible always to fix upon those which really prevail. But whatever the motives are, the decision which common sense invariably arrives at is that these men are inconsistent, and that they ought to renounce a position in which they remain after renouncing the opinions which they professed when they entered it. No doubt it often happens that a clergyman is quite conscious of the change which has come over him, and yet refuses to remove. He tries to persuade himself that his new views are in harmony with the standards of the Church, truly interpreted. He confesses therefore, in effect, that he misunderstood those standards when he solemnly promised to make them his rule of faith and practice; and in effect accuses of like misunderstanding all who retain the opinions which he has given up. Perhaps, instead of this, he tries to persuade himself, that so much liberty is allowed by the Church, that he violates no law, even though he pass from Evangelical views to ultra-Tractarianism, and from that again to the lowest forms of rationalistic neology;—so elastic and supple are the Prayer-book, the Articles, and the Canons, or rather so unmeaning are all the doctrinal creeds and formularies, in his estimation, that a clergyman may believe what he will and not violate them. With others, the case is different, and they remain because they are afraid to take so public a step as the renunciation of their office, and expose themselves to the twofold charge of having taught heresy while in the Church, and of having left it only when popular opinion constrained them. Others again remain because of the loss they must suffer by abandoning a profitable benefice, and because of the uncertainty of the future. It is probable that some remain because they can, and because it would be difficult to remove them, or because they live in hope to see their opinions more generally prevalent. Finally, there may be those who remain, because they do not know what else to do; they could not join the Socinians, or the Roman Catholics, or the orthodox Dissenters, inasmuch as their affinities with any of them are only partial, and in uniting with them they must repudiate what they still hold, or profess what they do not believe. Their case would not be improved therefore by such a step, and they would occupy a position as false as their present one. It is plain, then, that there are practical difficulties in the way of resignation and of secession, and hence it probably is that so many retain their hold upon the Church, although they have rejected some of its leading principles.

After all, however, the retirement of clergymen from the Church of England is no great novelty. We all know that modern dissent was in a manner founded by the seceders of 1662. The Act of Uniformity in the first of Queen Elizabeth did not make Dissenters, but recusants, did not divide Protestants, but separated them from the Papists. Those who refused to comply with its provisions, either buried themselves in secrecy, or withdrew from the country. Far different was the law of 1662, by which the Protestant body was divided, and it is said two thousand clergymen were sent adrift at one fell swoop. Of these, not a few were in heart Independents or Presbyterians, but many more were true Episcopalians—holy and God-fearing men, who suffered for conscience' sake. If they are charged with inconsistency, the charge can be easily met. The Book of Common Prayer, to which they were now required to give assent, was not the one with which they were familiar; and the adherence demanded for the new book was very different from that which was expected for the old one. By the new law, a new subscription was exacted to a new book. Every clergyman, whatever his rank, every schoolmaster, and every public and private tutor, was compelled to declare his unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by "the Book of Common Prayer; and to declare that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatsoever so take arms against the King," etc. The second of these declarations looks like an unnecessary determination to make some, at least, condemn the course they took in the civil wars. Of course it had other reasons. But it was the "unfeigned assent and consent" to the new book, which many could not, as honest men, declare, and they left the Church, its services, and its emoluments, as men who would not tell a lie. Right or wrong, this is what they did. The consequences are visible at this day. Many years later, Whitefield, Wesley, and others, retired from the Church practically, less perhaps because they had conscientious objections to the Prayer-book, than because of the resolve to labour every way, everywhere, and always in their Master's work. Others, like Hervey and Law, Newton, Berridge, and Romaine, were content to comply as far as they could with the restrictions of the Establishment.

While, however, the new life which some had received from above took them out of the regular ranks of the clergy, others were led to resign from opposite motives. The Arian leprosy, which had attacked the Church in common with dissent, brought great gain to the Socinians. Men were found who, like Dr. Disney and Theophilus Lindsey, seceded from the Church of England and officiated among the Unitarians. In later days, from time to time, a few others gave up their position on wholly different grounds. The current which set in towards Rome, a quarter of a century since, has drifted out a much larger number, and they have sought refuge in Popery. Romanism has taken away its hundreds, evangelical principles have removed a few units, but who among the neologians has seceded?

This brings us to the point. Germany has made many converts in the Church, but has induced scarcely one—perhaps only one—to renounce his official position. The movement which originated years ago in favour of Rationalism has been fruitful in results. Clergymen of high name and standing have often uttered sentiments by which High Church, Low Church, and even the Broad Church parties have been shocked and confounded. Isolated publications appeared attacking the recognised principles of orthodoxy, and raised a storm of indignation on all sides. But still the authors of these works remained in their places. Doctrinal questions were associated with the Tractarian discussions, but questions of ritual and ceremony, of sacerdotal dignity and the like, were far more prominent. Not so with Rationalism, or whatever it might be styled. That directed its assaults as much against the Bible as against the Book of Common Prayer, or rather more. The Prayer-book was not repudiated, but explained away, and by being understood in a non-natural sense, it could be retained. Ingenuity the most extraordinary was had recourse to to make it express the new opinions which had been adopted—to make it mean anything, in fact, which the modern school thought proper. What had been tauntingly said of the Bible, that men of all sects found their opinions in it, became equally true of the Prayer-book. As for the Bible, that was subjected to a twofold process. Its proper divine inspiration was challenged and denied. On this subject, the Rev. John Macnaught himself published a work, a few years since, which caused a powerful sensation. The discussion which arose out of that book revealed the fact that, if orthodox belief could not be assailed with impunity, there were many who had deserted it. In due course, the now famous “Essays and Reviews” made their appearance. Here were seven Churchmen at once combined to gather together and present in a single volume the latest results attained by their school. The Church awoke to a sense of the magnitude of the evil, and a storm of indignation immediately broke upon the offenders. Not only was inspiration undermined, prophecy was explained away; miracles, the Biblical history, the atonement, shared the same fate; heresy was favoured, praised, and honoured; and orthodoxy was satirised, and made to look contemptible. How could men holding such opinions remain in the Church? Everybody felt their position to be anomalous—at least, everybody but the party to which they belonged. But they held on their way, and still (except Baden Powell, who is dead) remain where they were, an extraordinary example of inconsistency, and of the flexibility of the human conscience.

Five months ago, the Rev. H. B. Wilson, one of the seven Essayists, was engaged by Mr. Macnaught to preach in his church. It will be remembered how the Bishop of Chester issued a monition forbidding Mr. Wilson to preach. It is not forgotten how that gentleman went, notwithstanding, and his sermons were read by Mr. Macnaught. This tortuous proceeding was not considered honourable to either of the parties. As for the sermons delivered on the occasion, they are probably as far removed from pulpit eloquence as anything which has for a long time emanated from the press; and the preface which accompanies them in their printed form is equally contemptible. By this proceeding Mr. Macnaught identified himself more closely with the Essayists, and did not diminish the difficulties of his position. At length, he issued a circular to the churchwardens and congregation of St. Chrysostom's Church, in Everton, Liverpool. This circular is dated September 30th. Its intention may be gathered from the opening paragraph, which we copy from the Times :—

My dear Friends,—The connexion which has existed between us for some nine years or more comes to an end as I write these lines. At the same time that I deliver this letter to the churchwardens, I shall hand them back the half-year's seat-rents, which were, as usual, paid to me in advance three weeks since. Those pew-rents will, I make no doubt, be returned to the pew-holders. Be that as it may, however, they shall be repaid by me to the wardens, and I shall then send in my resignation to the Bishop of Chester and to the trustees for the patronage of St. Chrysostom's Church.

This act announces his resignation to the people, his resignation to the Bishop, and his resignation to the trustees. It also announces his resignation of the pew-rents for the last six months. The next paragraph intimates that the resolution is sudden, but is the result of many months' deliberation. It is published at once to prevent suspense and excitement among the people, and to prevent the charge of inconsistency. All this is honest and candid. Mr. Macnaught has taken time for consideration, and he had a right to do so. He has returned his last six months' pew-rents, which he was not compelled to do, but which will probably be soon substituted by a testimonial from his admirers. He has come out as soon as he resolved to come, and found he could not stay with a clear conscience; and herein he has acted honourably. We only wonder that he did not attain his conviction earlier, since, by his own confession, he has not now begun to change his doctrinal opinions. So far from this, he says:—

You are aware that my opinions have undergone a great change since I entered on the incumbency, nine years ago, and a still greater change since my coming among you as a newly-ordained curate, in May, 1849.

This change has been gradual, and has, in all its phases, been honestly avowed. As soon as I have been fully persuaded in my own mind that some formerly cherished dogma was erroneous, I have candidly taught you what appeared to me as God's truth. I have concealed nothing which was in my own mind a distinct and recognised conviction.

We gather from this that he has abandoned, one by one, his early opinions—opinions which at his ordination he regarded as in harmony with the principles of the Church whose ministry he entered. He does not say that he thought his new views taught by the doctrinal standards of the Church. Rather, he seems to have had the unpleasant persuasion that they were not. Yet he has made known his changes of sentiment to his people, and their knowledge, and tacit or avowed acquiescence in them, seems to have quieted his conscience, or reconciled him to his position. By his own declaration, therefore, he has not only changed his views, but taught his new opinions to his congregation. This may be regarded in two ways. Either it was very frank and open on his part thus to avow the “phases” of his faith; or it was a humiliating spectacle which he presented; the spectacle of a man who never knew his own mind, who could not be looked to for a certain sound, but who refuted to-day the doctrine he preached yesterday, and who might refute to-morrow the doctrine he preached to-day. “Phases” is an ominous word; it reminds us, not of the steady, constant, and genial light of the sun, but of the ever-changing moon. Yet, alas! we almost tremble to think how many are like Mr. Macnaught, and who do not publish one fixed, settled, and immutable Gospel; but who, unlike him, have either not the courage to do, or the perception to realise their duty.

In his next paragraph, Mr. Macnaught intimates that his previous course has exposed him to opposition, and brought him sympathy. Of late, however, he has had a considerable measure of quiet, and has been able to reflect upon his position. The results of his reflection are before the world, but he also give us some intimations of the thoughts which passed through his mind. We cannot do better than let him speak for himself, and we do this the more willingly, because his thoughts must be to a great extent the thoughts of others; not entirely so, as his conclusion evinces:—

There have been many inducements for me to remain as I was. The social position of a clergyman, the enjoyment of a moderate, but sufficient income from the Church, the wishes of dear friends, the evident opportunities of manifold usefulness, the flattering attention of a large congregation in a full church, the generally improved and improving condition of schools and choir and district, the desire to vindicate freedom of speech and thought for the ministry of England's Church—these have been mighty, though far from being the sole, inducements to remain and minister among you.

In alliance with these motives there has been the dread of changing one's profession, the risk of losing valued friendships, and the fear of doing positive harm, if any should suppose that one abandoned religion or Christ in abandoning the position of an English clergyman.

These and such like considerations have so far kept me at my post, though I have sometimes found it difficult to reconcile the changes of my opinions with the unchanging formularies of ancient centuries. Till quite lately I have accepted all the Prayer-book in some scriptural sense. Now I find myself unable longer to express my "unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer;" and, therefore, it is time for me to retire from a position which demands such "assent and consent" from its occupants.

So it is: position, income, friendship, outward prosperity, liberty, consequences, and an ability to accept "all the Prayer-book in some scriptural sense:" these are the things which keep men in the Church, when they are not of it. There is a depth of meaning in the phrase, "the Prayer-book in some scriptural sense," which we shall not endeavour to fathom; and it suggests reflections and applications which we shall not venture to make. One thing, however, must be said, and it is, that there are portions of that book which not even Mr. Macnaught could accept in any scriptural sense. Either his conclusion is right, or it is wrong; if it is right, he ought to tell the world what he knows, and the book ought to be revised; if it is wrong, it is because he has misunderstood the book, or has adopted erroneous canons of interpretation. In any case, he cannot harmonise the two books, and has very properly abandoned his position. People will naturally be anxious to know what the difficulties are, and to a certain extent they may be gratified. Mr. Macnaught affirms that he holds many great principles, but he adds that—

With many of the Prayer-book's teachings—for example, on the clergyman's supposed power to remit or retain sins, as expressed in the Ordination Service; on the subject of confession, as contained in the Service for the Visitation of the Sick; on the doctrine of "Regeneration," as treated of in the Baptismal Service; on the Athanasian Creed, on vicarious punishment—with the teaching, I say, of the English Prayer-book on these and other points, I can no longer express "unfeigned assent and consent," if these words and the Church formularies are to bear any natural and grammatical signification.

There are doubtless multitudes who can sympathise with him in all or much of this, but who do not, like him, ask, "Under these circumstances, what am I to do?" Perhaps if we except the one article of vicarious punishment, thousands will be found who do not know what to make of the points which he has mentioned. It is clear that the "unfeigned assent and consent" must, in such cases, be a very modified one.

Mr. Macnaught goes on to say, "I know of no other communion which is as tolerant as the Church of England, or whose ministers are as free as hers. Other communions vary very much in the liberty they give to their ministers." However, Mr. Macnaught will join none of them. He will go to seek a livelihood in any calling of simple industry that may open to him, and will take his place among the laymen of England's Established Church. No one can complain of this; it is the most straightforward course for him to pursue, and will leave him free to resume his ministerial functions, if the "phases" of his faith should bring him back to his original creed. Meanwhile, he has vindicated to himself the great and inalienable right of carrying out his convictions, and of this no man in England can justly complain. He has done more, he has established a precedent for his school. Nay, his act identifies him so far with those who have declared it an anomaly and an inconsistency for the Essayists to retain their status in the Church.

What will be the effect of this retirement? Who will follow Mr. Macnaught, and, abandoning all casuistry, declare honestly that it is not right to stay in defiance of the natural and grammatical sense of the Prayer-book? These questions must be answered by time. Common honesty is not a common virtue, and we anticipate that few indeed will do as the incumbent of St. Chrysostom's has done. To some extent we sympathise with him, but we regret to think that his quarrel is not merely with the Book of Common Prayer. The roots of his heterodoxy go deeper than that, and it is plain enough that he has imbibed the deleterious draughts which modern rationalism has prepared. These have done the mischief, and here, though he seem to know it not, lies the secret influence which has driven him from his office.

MUIR'S LIFE OF MOHAMMED.*

SINCE the revival of Arabic letters in Europe by the famous French Orientalist, Silvestre de Sacy, a large amount of attention has naturally been devoted to tracing the life of the founder of the Arabian religion and studying the averredly inspired volume which he bequeathed as a guide to his people. Older works, such as those of Prideaux and Gagnier, were obviously no longer adequate to the demands of the age, partly because they were based on insufficient documents, and partly because they were written in that violent party spirit which is the surest hindrance to impartial historical appreciation. As usual, the Germans were the first to break ground. In 1833, Geiger (now Rabbi at Breslau) published his prize essay, entitled "Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthume angenommen?" (What has Mohammed adopted from Judaism?), which was followed, in 1839, by Geroock's "Christologie des Koran;" whilst in the interval the French scholar, Noel des Vergers, had re-edited, with a translation and notes, the sketch of Abū'l-Fidā, which formed the basis of Gagnier's work. A new epoch was marked by the appearance, in 1843, of Weil's biography, "Mohammed der Prophet, sein Leben und seine Lehre" (Mohammed the Prophet, his Life and Doctrines), an admirable book, in which the author made use of many native works that were inaccessible to, or had been neglected by, his predecessors, and took far more enlightened and correct views of his hero's character and teaching than had been previously current. As a necessary supplement, Weil published, in 1844, his "Einleitung in den Koran" (Introduction to the Korān), in which, after enumerating the principal editions and translations of that book, he briefly reviews the life of its author, and then, for the first time, attempts to arrange in historical order the disordered mass of fragments of which it consists. After this there is a pause in these studies, for, with the exception of the third volume of Caussin de Perceval's "Essai sur l'Histoire des Arabes," 1848, nothing of importance was written regarding Mohammed, till Dr. Sprenger published the first volume of his "Life" at Allahabad, in 1851. Sprenger may be said to be as far in advance of Weil as Weil was of his predecessors. Their views regarding the Prophet's character do not differ greatly, but Sprenger has the great merit of having gone deeper into the original biographies and collections of traditions, which enables him to distinguish with more certainty between the real and the mythical in the narrative of Mohammed's life. Based chiefly upon the works of Weil and Sprenger, appeared in 1856 Noeldeke's treatise, "De Origine et Compositione Surarum Qoranicarum ipsiusque Qorani;" in which especial pains was taken with regard to the chronological arrangement of the Sūras, or chapters of the Korān. Three years later, the Académie des Inscriptions of Paris offered a prize for the best history of the Korān, which was competed for by, and finally divided between, Sprenger, Noeldeke, and Amari. Of the three prize essays only that of Noeldeke has as yet been printed under the title of "Geschichte des Qorāns" (History of the Korān). Commencing with a short estimate of Mohammed as prophet, the author notices at more length the style of the Korān, the manner in which it was at first committed to writing, and the alterations made in it from time to time by Mohammed himself. He next endeavours to classify and arrange the Sūras chronologically; after which he narrates the principal incidents connected with the first collection of the Korān, under Abū Bekr, and the second, under Othmān. The last portion of the book is occupied with the criticism of the text of the Korān, the various readings and their origin, the history of the written character (Kūfīc, &c.), and cognate topics. Of Dr. Sprenger's work, the first of four volumes is announced for speedy publication; but Amari's will, we fear, be long delayed by the present state of Italy, which is by no means favourable to literary undertakings of such a character. Meantime, that indefatigable Arabist, Wuestenfeld, has just completed a handsome edition of one of the principal sources from which all these writers have derived their materials, the Strat Ar-rasûl, or "Biography of the Apostle," by Ibn Hishâm.

Whilst the Orientalists of France and Germany were thus occupied in extending our knowledge of the origin of el-Islâm, but very little was done with the same object in England; for the productions of the Rev. Charles Forster and Dr. Macbride are scarcely, if at all, superior to that of Prideaux, nor does the work of the Rev. M. Arnold show any very decided step in advance; whilst Lane, in his "Selections from the Kur-ân," has merely reproduced Sale's preliminary discourse, with a few additions and corrections of no very great consequence. Happily, however, for the credit of our Oriental scholarship, Mr. W. Muir, of the Bengal Civil Service, brother to the well-known Sanskritist, Dr. J. Muir, began as early as 1853 to devote his leisure hours to the study of the earliest periods of Arabian history, and published the results in a series of articles in the Calcutta Review, from 1853 to 1856, which he has now expanded into the work of which we have placed the title at the head of this article.

To Mr. Muir no one can deny the credit of being a laborious, accurate, and, on the whole, impartial writer. Of Mohammed's claims to be considered a prophet, he not unnaturally takes a different view from Sprenger and Noeldeke; but he nowhere exhibits that bitter sectarian spirit which degenerates with Prideaux and Forster into personal abuse. Noeldeke regards Mohammed as a true prophet ("ein echter Prophet"), falling short of his mighty predecessors in Israel only because, though rich in fancy and feeling, he was deficient in speculative reason and the logical faculty of abstraction, and did not possess that fine, though strong sense of good and evil, which ought to have withheld him from the employment of bad means for the attainment of what he sincerely believed to be a good end. He looks upon Mohammed's sad decline in his later years as merely the natural consequence of his altered worldly position, and regards his acts of fraud as the almost necessary concomitants of an over-wrought religious enthusiasm, quoting with approbation the words of Sprenger ("Life," p. 124): "Enthusiasm, in its progress, remains as rarely free from fraud as fire from smoke; and men, with the most sincere conviction of the sacredness of their cause, are most prone to commit pious frauds." Muir, on the contrary, whilst admitting Mohammed's sincerity in the earliest part of his career, regards his assumption of the title of prophet and vicegerent of God as a yielding to a direct temptation of Satan. "The early doubts of Mahomet," says he (vol. ii., p. 90), "and his suspicion of being under the influence of genii or evil spirits, suggest the inquiry whether that suspicion had in reality any true foundation, or was the mere fancy of an excited imagination. It is incumbent upon us to consider this question from a Christian point of view, and to ask whether the supernatural influence, which appears to have acted upon the soul of the Arabian prophet, may not have proceeded from the evil One and his emissaries. It is not for us to dogmatise on so recondite and mysterious a subject; but the views which Christian verity compels us to entertain regarding the angel of darkness and his followers would not be satisfied without some allusion to the fearful power exercised by them, as one at least of the possible causes of the fall of Mahomet—the once sincere inquirer—into the meshes of deception." This view is, however, somewhat modified, or, at all events, expressed in a less decided manner, in vol. iv., pp. 315—20, where Mr. Muir judges more leniently of the character of Mohammed—a character uniting in itself the strangest inconsistencies—a character thoroughly Shemitic, not only in its excellencies, but also in its faults. Read Muir's account of his deathbed, vol. iv., pp. 277—8. "His strength now rapidly sank. He seemed to be aware that death was drawing near. He called for a pitcher of water, and wetting his face, prayed thus: 'O Lord, I beseech Thee, assist me in the agonies of death!' Then three times he ejaculated earnestly, 'Gabriel, come close unto me!' . . . After a little he prayed in a whisper, 'Lord, grant me pardon; and join me to the companionship on high.' Then at intervals: 'Eternity in Paradise!' 'Pardon!' 'Yes; the blessed companionship on high!' He stretched himself gently. Then all was still. His head grew heavy on the breast of Ayesha. The Prophet of Arabia was dead." And who shall dare to say that he did not find the pardon and the companionship on high for which he so earnestly prayed with his latest breath?

Another point on which Mr. Muir differs decidedly from most of his predecessors, is the view which he takes of the relation of Mohammed to the age in which he lived. At the end of the chapter, entitled "Review of Parties in Arabia" (vol. i., p. 285), after having spoken of the progress of Christianity in some parts, and of Judaism in others, and of the material for the religious inquirer ready prepared by both, he goes on to say:—

The material for a great change was here. But it required to be wrought; and Mahomet was the workman. The fabric of Islam no more necessarily grew out of the state of Arabia than a gorgeous texture grows from the slender meshes of silken filament; or the stately ship from unshewn timber of the forest; or the splendid palace from rude masses of quarried rock. Had Mahomet, stern to his early convictions, followed the leading of Jewish and Christian truth, and inculcated upon his fellows their simple doctrine, there would have been a "SAINT MAHOMET"—more likely, perhaps, "MAHOMET THE MARTYR"—laying the foundation-stone of the Arabian Church. But then (as far as human probabilities and analogy indicate), Arabia would not, certainly in his day, have been convulsed to its centre, or even any considerable portion of it converted. He abandoned his early convictions; for the uncompromising severity of inflexible principle, he substituted the alluring designs of expediency and compromise; and then, with consummate skill, he devised a machinery, by the plastic power and adaptive energy of which he gradually shaped the broken and disconnected masses of the Arab race into an harmonious whole—a body politic, endowed with life and vigour. To the Christian he was as a Christian;—to the Jew he became as a Jew;—to the Meccan idolater, as a reformed worshipper of the Kaaba. And thus, by unparalleled art, and a rare supremacy of mind, he persuaded the whole of Arabia—Pagan, Jew, and Christian—to follow his steps with docile submission. Such a process is that of the workman shaping his material. It is not that of the material shaping its own form, much less (as some would hold) moulding the workman himself. It was Mahomet that formed Islam; it was not Islam, or any pre-existing Moslem spirit, that moulded Mahomet.

Here, we think, Mr. Muir has spoken somewhat too decidedly; indeed, were we obliged to side definitively with either the one or the other, we would rather adopt the opinion of Renan, who, in his essay entitled "Mahomet et les Origines de l'Islamisme" (Revue des deux Mondes, t. xii., 1851), expresses himself as follows (p. 1,089):—

Mahomet n'est pas plus le fondateur du monothéisme que de la civilisation et de la littérature chez les Arabes. Il résulte de faits nombreux, signalés pour la première fois par M. Caussin de Perceval, que Mahomet n'a fait que suivre, au lieu de le devancer, le mouvement religieux de son temps.

But the fact is that both are right and both are wrong. It is the old story of the two knights and the shield, which the one maintained to be gold and the other to be silver, simply because they were looking at it from opposite sides. Renan persists in his, as we believe, erroneous idea of a "primitive Shemitic Monothéism," which is always cropping up through the superimposed strata of Polytheism; but, on the other hand, had not the spirit of inquiry been abroad, and a not inconsiderable number of inquirers preceded him,* we should, in all probability, never have heard of Mohammed, the Prophet of the Arabs.

Want of space prevents us from entering into a more minute examination of Mr. Muir's learned and deeply interesting work; nor can we do more than merely call attention to an excellent tract, also from his pen, entitled, "The Testimony borne by the Koran to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures" (2nd Ed., Allahabad, 1860†). But we would take this opportunity of impressing upon our missionaries, more especially on those in India, the necessity of studying and making themselves thoroughly acquainted with the life and character of Mohammed, as well as with the Korān and the theological and juristic literature that is based upon it, if they wish to make any real progress in converting the Muslims of Hindūstān. In their case, as well as in that of the strictly Hindū population, it will not do to ignore their past history and literature. The ground of which we wish to take possession is not unoccupied. The missionary has, in fact, a double work before him—on the one hand, that of eradicating certain ideas, and training others to a different growth; on the other, that of implanting such as are entirely new. The educated Muslim knows his Korān better than many Christians know their Bible, whilst in merely secular branches of learning he is not unfrequently well matched with the man who takes upon himself to convert him. If our missionary colleges and societies are wise, they will henceforward devote a portion of their time and their funds to encouraging the study of the Oriental languages and literatures among the men whom they send out to the East, and then we may hope that a larger measure of success will attend their efforts than has hitherto been vouchsafed.

Foreign Intelligence.

THE Papal Allocution has excited considerable notice in France, and is keenly criticised by our French correspondent. He also exposes the inconsistency of Count de Montalembert, who, in his pamphlet on Poland, strongly insists on the principle of nationality, which yet in the case of Italy he utterly repudiates. Of the intolerant proceeding at Sévres our readers have already heard, for the daily press of this country has been occupied with it. No act is too mean for a bigoted priesthood, and the denial to a poor child, because a Protestant, of the prize for diligence and good conduct, which has been awarded her by her schoolfellows, is the more remarkable as having taken place immediately adjacent to what Parisians deem the "centre of civilisation." Perhaps the most important fact from France, however, is the politico-clerical agitation set on foot in connexion with the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, and the suppression by the Government of the supreme councils of the associations which, under the pretext of piety, are enabled to disseminate sedition.

The additional information respecting the Geneva Conference will enable our readers still better to appreciate its memorable proceedings. Notwithstanding the space devoted to the Conference in our last number, it was found impossible adequately to notice some minor meetings and less public gatherings, which, with other interesting facts, are now reported. The unfurling of the Evangelical Alliance standard in Geneva called forth sundry attacks from the Rationalists, which were repulsed by the orthodox, and hence a host of pamphlets, the varied aims of which are described. The admirable address of Mr. Monsell, on "The Religious State of the Nations of Eastern Europe and Western Asia," we give entire, both on account of its intrinsic merits and of the importance of the subject at the present crisis in the history of Turkish Missions.

In Spain, a visit of Christian sympathy has been paid to the imprisoned Protestants, on behalf of the assembled brethren at Geneva. For an obvious reason, the fact that a deputation was appointed for that purpose is not published until its mission has been accomplished. The letter of Matamoros, referring to the Geneva address, will be read with mingled feelings of regret for his sufferings, admiration for the spirit in which they are borne, and thankfulness to the God of all consolation, who thus comforts those that are His, in their sorest trials.

Amid the darkness which broods over Portugal a solitary ray of light is just perceptible, revealing yet more manifestly the surrounding gloom. A suggestion is made for the employment of the pen in connexion with journalism, where the living voice may not be heard. It is worth attention.

Italy is the subject of two brief articles. In one we have cheering evidence of the thirst of the Neapolitans for instruction in the elements of secular learning, and the disposition of those possessing the ability to satisfy it, as far as possible. In the other, the interrogs tories which the Italian Government is alleged to have transmitted to the theological faculties of the kingdom show the business-like way which it is taking to get rid of the Pope's temporal power, and remind us of the course adopted by England's monarch, in addressing certain queries to the European Universities, shortly before the Reformation.

Germany sends three contributions. In the first our old and valued correspondent, whose communications have been for a while interrupted, resumes his pen to describe the interesting anniversary of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society at Hanover. Another respected writer traces, in the generous spirit of Christian love, the character and career of the late Dr. Stahl. And a third esteemed brother sends the first of a series of articles, in which he testifies to what he has seen and known of German piety generally, as introductory to his account of the latest German revival.

In Turkey, as many of our readers are aware, there exists a very peculiar state of things in relation to the native Protestants. Forming, as they have been compelled to do of late, a distinct political community, they have incurred certain pecuniary responsibilities which are unavoidably incident to their new position. With reference to this matter, the Vekeel, or Civil Representative, at the Porte, of the Protestants, addresses to us a statement, which we have the best authority for knowing contains nothing that does not meet the approval of our experienced friends, the American missionaries in the Turkish field.

A letter has been received by the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance from the new colony of Queensland, announcing the formation of a branch of the Alliance in Brisbane. This has suggested to the Committee the issuing of an address to Christian brethren in colonies. Both documents will be found in our subsequent pages.

FRANCE.

Paris, October, 1861.

HOW THE LAST PAPAL ALLOCATION IS REGARDED IN FRANCE.

You have read, I suppose, the address delivered by Pius IX. in a consistory of cardinals on the 30th of September last. This strange document, published in all our journals, has produced a most unfavourable impression on public opinion, and the organs of Ultramontanism have scarcely dared to make even a timid apology for it. Nothing, in fact, is more shocking than the language of the Roman bishop. When the Pope speaks in the Latin language before his venerable brethren, the princes of the Pontifical Church, he can say what he pleases, and employ the most bitter expressions. But when these addresses are translated into living languages, and come under the eyes of hundreds of thousands of laymen, the words in question acquire an unseemly, violent, and almost ridiculous character. It seems, in fact, as if some clerical Epimenides had quitted the tomb, after a sleep of six centuries, and were interrupting the discussions of the present day by the discordant accents of a barbarous age.

Pius IX. showers upon his adversaries the coarsest invectives. They are, upon his lips, profane persons, shameless and impudent men, criminals, wretches, cursed beings, who circulate infamous journals, who trample under foot natural and eternal laws, who outrage honesty, decorum, virtus—who ruin the foundations of the family and of civil society, &c. What is all this? Gratuitous abuse, revolting calumny. Cicero said, of a speaker who abandoned himself to this intemperate language, that he was like a drunken man among sober people (ebrius inter sobrios). It is what an English writer calls drunken prose. The Pope and his counsellors would do well to remember that they live in the nineteenth century, amidst intelligent people, and that, far from strengthening their cause, they compromise it more and more by employing terms which do violence to truth and decorum.

Another part of the Papal allocation has produced something more than astonishment. Pius IX. asserts that the Roman people have manifested towards him unshaken fidelity and devoted submission. "This people," he says, "thus prove how desirous they are to remain firmly attached to us and to this apostolic see, to this temporal principality which belongs to us, and with what warmth they repel and condemn the guilty attempts of those who seek to spread disturbance among them."

So that, according to the solemn declarations of the Pope, the inhabitants of Rome and of the Pontifical States are, by a great majority, very faithful and devoted to their temporal sovereign. But in that case, as the liberal journals of Paris have justly observed, this simple question is raised: Why is a French garrison maintained at Rome? The Pope's own subjects are amply sufficient to protect his throne! Besides, Pius IX. could easily prove, in the face of heaven and earth, this affection of the Roman people, by having recourse to the plan of universal suffrage. But lo! this same Court of Rome, which boasts of being so beloved and venerated by its subjects, urgently begs the support of foreign bayonets, and rejects with horror the bare idea of universal suffrage. What is the conclusion to be drawn from this circumstance? It is that Pius IX.—I regret to say it—has uttered a falsehood in bearing witness to the fidelity and devotedness of the Roman people—yes, a palpable falsehood—a falsehood which has not even the poor merit of deceiving a single intelligent man. Ought not the cardinals to have sufficient sense of shame to spare the members of their communion such a flagrant violation of truth?

Moreover, the Roman Pontiff (and I am still quoting the French press) has not addressed a word of thanks to Napoleon III., nor to our soldiers who defend his person and power. We are spending a deal of money, we are making heavy sacrifices for the temporal authority of the Papacy, and this is how we are recompensed! It is certainly high time that the Emperor should consult the true interests of the country, and of religion itself, by ordering our troops to return to France!

M. DE MONTALEMBERT'S PAMPHLET UPON POLAND.

The Ultramontane faction is a source of injury to every people which it essays to take under its protection; and if a fresh proof of the fact were necessary, I should find it in the recent publication of the Count de Montalembert. Everybody is aware that the Polish nation has excited in England, France, Italy, and elsewhere, profound sympathy. What liberal-minded and generous man has not cherished a desire for the political restoration of that people which succumbed beneath the formidable coalition of the three Northern Powers, and which is now loaded with the chains of the Muscovite Czar? But if these sentiments of compassion and affection have existed for many years, and are to continue, it is on condition that the Poles should proceed in the path of modern ideas, and should aid in the onward march of civilisation.

M. de Montalembert, in his pamphlet entitled, "A Nation in Mourning," has presented the question in a totally different point of view. He warmly embraces the cause of the Poles; but why? Because, in his opinion, the Poles are the best champions of the Roman See; because their emancipation will arrest the encroachments of schismatic Russia and Protestant Prussia; because, in short, the Papacy, with their assistance, will have more strength to struggle against its enemies in Western Europe. Nothing is more dangerous than an imprudent friend, said our illustrious fabulist, Lafontaine, and the present circumstance gives fresh force to the saying.

What is the practical result of the maladroitness of M. de Montalembert? M. Proudhon, the famous apostle of democracy, immediately took up his pen, and attacked the Poles as mystics, men of retrograde views, under the yoke of priests, and incapable of thoroughly recovering their independence. He reminds us how intolerant they were during past generations, and how they merited their fall, because of their blind obedience to the suggestions of the Jesuits. He adds that the restoration of Poland would be not a step in advance, but a step backwards; and the conclusion at which he arrives is, that the people would do better to unite cordially with the Russians, by forming the vanguard of the empire of the Czar, than to persist in demanding an emancipation which has become impossible. Assuredly I do not adopt M. Proudhon's opinions; but they deserve notice, as showing the discredit which the Ultramontane party inflict upon every cause they embrace. The greatest misfortune which could befall the Poles would be for them to be regarded as the soldiers of the Papacy. Already the French liberal press is less favourable to them. If they accept the dangerous encomiums of the Jesuits, they are lost.

The same Count de Montalembert, who has so warmly advocated the claims of nationality in the case of the Poles, has violently attacked Italian nationality. The Poles, beneath his pen, become saints and heroes; the Italians are vile revolutionists and senseless demagogues! Whence this contradiction? Is nationality less respectable, less legitimate, in the south than in the east of Europe? The explanation of these contrary sentiments is easy: the power of the Pope is in peril by Italian nationality, and M. de Montalembert hopes that it would be strengthened by the Poles.

LATEST DEMONSTRATION OF THE POLITICO-CLERICAL AGITATORS.

While Italy and Poland are the theatre of great and troublous events, it is not the fault of the Roman clergy if France continues to enjoy internal tranquillity, and her population to obey the laws. Bishops, priests, monks, and lay bigots, do all they can to create agitation among the humbler classes. I shall cite an example in the Conference of the Association of St. Vincent de Paul, which has taken place at Lusignan, in the department of the Vienne.

I have frequently spoken in my letters of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. This institution was formed ostensibly to distribute bread and other alms to the poor. The exercise of charity is the banner of the society; but it has also secret designs, which involve serious danger. In reality, the founders of the association have had recourse to this means in order to recruit and organise the adherents of the clerical and Legitimist party. Their centre of authority is at Rome, in the hands of the General of the Jesuits. The superior committee for France is at Paris. The country is covered with auxiliary societies, whose members are selected with scrupulous care, and who cheerfully obey the orders of their leaders. They constitute, in fact, a vast secret association—a well-disciplined army, which may, upon certain occasions, exercise the most powerful influence.

Well, from thirty to forty of these auxiliary societies lately sent delegates to Lusignan. This great conference was presided over by the Romish Bishop of Angoulême. Other ecclesiastical dignitaries and influential laymen were present. It is evident that the principal object of the meeting was to excite and increase politico-clerical agitation. Violent harangues were delivered by the Bishop of Angoulême and other speakers. "We must not fear the new Judases," said they. "Valiant soldiers of St. Vincent de Paul, form yourselves into one unbroken phalanx. If you are assailed by opposition and persecution, present to the revolutionary tempest a calm, dignified, and proud front—proceed forward under the spotless flag; tyranny lasts but a short time, and the bodies of our enemies shall be made our footstool. . . . Let us pray for Monsigneur Pie (the Bishop of Poitiers), that noble martyr of the faith. We will never place ourselves under the impious banner of sacrilege. Religion is menaced: it is in danger of perishing; and it is your mission, soldiers of St. Vincent de Paul, to prevent the edifice from falling," &c.

These words are clear enough. Everybody knows what personages are designated under the name of the new Judases, and who are the tyrants, those sacrilegious men who persecute the Roman Church. As to the spotless flag (drapeau sans tache), it is an equivocal expression, which means at the same time the white flag of the Pretender, Henri V., and the white banner of the Immaculate Virgin. The leaders of the Conference of Lusignan have therefore attacked, under the mantle of charity, Napoleon III., his Ministers, his policy, and existing institutions. The Jesuitical and Legitimist faction never, till now, displayed such audacious impudence. The object of this demonstration was to irritate, to arouse the people against the Government, and this enterprise appeared the easier, as we are now in a crisis arising from the price of food and the condition of the industrial classes.

The Paris journals have strongly censured these irritating proceedings. The affair is not ended. A well-accredited organ of public opinion, the Siccle, has suggested that a judicial inquiry should be instituted respecting what has passed in the Conference of Lusignan. We shall see if the Government, which suppresses with such severity all political associations, and even industrial and literary societies, will grant to the organised bodies of St. Vincent de Paul the exclusive privilege of attacking the laws and the proceedings of the authorities. The Siccle reasonably says, that if the priests and the Legitimists possess such great liberty, the same rights must belong to all. No privileges! Allow the friends of democratic ideas to struggle upon equal terms against Jesuitism and absolutism: this is all we ask, and it would be unjust to refuse it.

CONSECRATION OF A RUSSIAN CHURCH IN PARIS.

An interesting spectacle has been lately witnessed by the inhabitants of Paris: I refer to the solemn consecration of a church, according to the Oriental or Russian type. The building cost one million two hundred thousand francs (48,000*l.*). It is constructed according to the rules of orthodox architecture—that is to say, in the Byzantine style. It consists of a double church: the one, the upper church, dedicated to the Trinity; the other, subterranean, dedicated to St. Alexander Newski. The whole is surmounted by five gilded domes, having golden crosses.

A Russian bishop, Monsigneur Léonce, coadjutor of the Metropolitan of St. Petersburg, came expressly to Paris to preside at the ceremony. He was assisted by an archimandrite, seven priests, several deacons, and a large number of chorists. The Russian Government had given orders that all possible magnificence should be displayed in this festival. It appears that M^{onsieur} Léonce is the first bishop who has consecrated an orthodox church in the West.

The edifice was filled by a numerous and brilliant audience. The Russian Ambassador was there as the representative of his Sovereign. Marshal Vaillant and the Prefect of Police of Paris, both in official costume, had been directed by Napoleon III. to take part in the ceremony: it was a guarantee and an expression of the religious liberty which reigns in France.

The rites are curious and complicated. There are no organs, or other musical instruments, in orthodox churches; but edifying hymns are sung by men and children. There are numerous paintings, but, according to the arbitrary interpretation of the Orientals, respecting the command of the Decalogue which forbids the making of graven images, sculpture is forbidden. The sacerdotal vestments are of silver cloth, embroidered with gold. The incense, the holy water, the holy oil, the relics, the sign of the cross, the genuflexions, the ceaselessly-repeated salutations, the act of kissing the crucifix—in all these things there is a resemblance to Roman Catholic worship. The communion in two kinds, however, the frequent use of the national tongue in religious service, and the marriage of priests, prove that the Eastern churches are not so far removed from primitive Christianity as is Popery. The Russian Church in Paris and the usages of the orthodox clergy will long excite public curiosity.

AN ACT OF INTOLERANCE AT SEVRES.

While the Russians in France are peacefully exercising liberty of conscience and worship, it is sad to see that the Protestants are still exposed to painful and vexatious treatment. The Romish priests, in contravention of the express provisions of the laws, obstinately refuse to admit the complete equality of the various Christian communions, and wherever they possess a preponderating influence they endeavour to oppress and humiliate the heretics. Here is a fact which has taken place lately at Sèvres, near Versailles, in the department of Seine-et-Oise—that is to say, close to Paris. The affair is insignificant in appearance; but it involves grave questions of right, of justice, and of liberty. The entire daily press has been occupied with it.

There exists at Sèvres two schools, to which are admitted the children of Romanists and those of Protestants. An honourable citizen,

M. Loubat, who long filled the office of mayor of that commune, placed at the disposal of the cantonal committee of elementary instruction a sum of 300 francs annually, to be awarded to the best scholars, as a recognition of their application to study, and of their good conduct. By a wise provision, it devolves upon the scholars themselves to select the children who appear to them most worthy of the prize.

This year young Henriette Foras, twelve or thirteen years of age, was chosen unanimously by her companions, as most deserving the reward in question. There seemed to be no difficulty whatever in the matter. But alas! Henriette Foras is a Protestant. This was a stain of deepest dye in the eyes of the Popish priest of the parish and his curate, whose duty it was to give the prize, with their own hands, to the young girl. They, therefore, called together the committee, and, after much solicitation, got the lay members to consent to a new election. But the scholars persisted in their former choice. Did this end the matter? By no means. The priest and his curate resorted to other subterfuges. In short, Henriette Foras did not obtain the prize; and some Protestant ladies, having sent an additional sum of money, in order to repair the injustice of which she was the victim, the same priests consented to give this recompense, at a public meeting, in the name of benevolent, but not of Protestant ladies! It seems as if the word Protestant would burn the skin off the tongues of these reverend gentlemen!

Intense was the excitement and great the scandal. The priest and the curate having been publicly interrogated by the Paris journals upon this denial of justice, put forth the most pitiful excuses, saying that the prize is intended for the poorest children, that Henriette Foras belonged to a family in comfortable circumstances, and so forth. M. Passea, pastor of Versailles, addressed to the Opinion Nationale a letter in which he overthrew this scaffolding of puerile subterfuges. The question is now before the departmental council: let us hope that they will do justice to the Protestants.

OBJECTIONS OF THE LATITUDINARIANS TO THE CONFERENCE OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE AT GENEVA.

Two words more upon a subject which is of special interest to your readers. I shall say nothing respecting the sittings of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva. The last number of your journal contained copious details upon this subject. But it is not unimportant to mention the objections which have been put forth against the Conference by the Lien, the organ of Latitudinarianism, or Neological Protestantism in France. The editor of that periodical has published two long articles, in which he reproaches the Geneva Committee of the Alliance with having instituted a confession of faith, and in particular, with having laid down the doctrine of the divinity of Jesus Christ as a sine qua non of admission. From this fact, he draws the conclusion that the Evangelical Alliance is narrow, sectarian, and intolerant. Such accusations are a eulogy rather than matter of blame; for doctrinal fidelity is, to the disciples of Christ, one of the most sacred of duties. X. X. X.

SOCIETIES OF ST. VINCENT DE PAUL.

[Since the receipt of our correspondent's letter, M. de Persigny, the Minister of the Interior, has issued a circular, the effect of which will be the suppression, until duly authorised, of all the superior councils, or chief local committees, whether in Paris or the provincial towns, of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. Hitherto, its supreme central committee at Paris exercised almost unlimited power, and, according to M. de Persigny, governed the association by its sole authority, like a secret society, and levied a budget, of which the employment is unknown. Other associations are joined in name with that of St. Vincent de Paul, but it is understood that it is against the latter that the measure is really directed. The others are only mentioned to give an appearance of impartiality to the proceeding. Even the Freemasons are enumerated, and with commendations, and on a tone of equality with the rest, which must be particularly aggravating when we consider with what feelings that body is regarded by the extreme Romish party in France.]

FOURTH GENERAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS OF ALL NATIONS, AT GENEVA.

MEETINGS FOR SPECIAL OBJECTS.

Besides the public meetings of the Conference, of which we have given a lengthened report in our last number, several smaller gatherings took place, some of which were of the deepest interest; and as a picture of the Geneva Conference would be imperfect without some account of them, we are assured that our readers will welcome this additional information.

On Tuesday evening, Sept. 10, the subject of the Irish Church Missions to the Roman Catholics was brought before a well-attended meeting at the Salle de la Rive Droite. After an opening prayer by the British Chaplain of Geneva, the Rev. Mr. Downton, the reading of the 6th chapter of the Apocalypse by Pastor John Bost, and some introductory remarks of a most interesting and affectionate character by Mr. William Brooke, of Dublin, the meeting was addressed by the Revds. Alexander Dallas, and C. H. Eade, who gave full and interesting details of the mission among the Irish Roman Catholics, its difficulties and its success. M. Bost narrated some incidents of his journey in Ireland, twenty years ago, especially the history of a peasant who, on his way to a Bible meeting, was fired at. The ball pierced the Bible which he carried under his coat, and was found lodged at the passage, "Love your enemies!"

The friends of the Gospel in Italy met on the evening of Sept. 11, in the same place, for prayer in behalf of that country. Pastor Vallette, of Paris, who, thirty years ago, was called to the Prussian chaplaincy at Naples, presided. The meeting was attended by Christian brethren of different nations and denominations, and was occupied in prayer, the reading of the Word of God, singing, and short addresses. Pastors Vallette, Meille, Revel, Malan, Geymonat, and Turin, took part in the proceedings. The meeting was also addressed in Italian by Mr. John Bette, of Hertfordshire, who in touching words and trembling voice stated that for many years he had made Italy the subject of daily prayer.

The principles of the Systematic Beneficence Society were expounded by the Rev. Dr. Cather, to a meeting under the presidency of Pastor Barde. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. W. Arthur, Mr. Walker, Dr. Urwick, and by Pastors Emile Cook and Paul Cook. The meeting expressed a wish that a similar society might be established at Geneva, for the purpose of spreading on the Continent the principles of systematic Christian liberty, and the following resolution was adopted:—

"This meeting has listened with great satisfaction to the statements which have been made of the principles of the society, and hails its formation as a means of rousing the churches to a sense of their responsibility and duty to spread the Gospel to the ends of the world."

A meeting, of a social character, of about eighty French pastors and laymen, was held on Saturday, September 14, at Zerl, in the grounds of the late Professor Peschier-Fontanes. After having formed an immense circle, every one gave his name and place of residence. A friendly and cordial conversation then ensued among a great many brethren, who, though known to each other by name, had never seen each other's faces before. Short addresses were delivered by Messrs. Rosseeuw Saint-Hilaire, Pueux, Pozzi, and Casalis. The latter, the excellent Director of the Paris Missionary Institution, made a touching appeal to the brethren in behalf of the work to which he has devoted his life.

On Thursday evening, September 12, the large room of the Casino was filled with more than 600 young men. This meeting took place at the same time as the farewell meetings at the Oratoire and the Salle de la Rive Droite. The young men were successively addressed by Messrs. E. de Pressensé, Vallette, Rosseeuw Saint-Hilaire, and G. Monod; and the impression which these short, but eloquent, addresses produced upon this large number of young Genevese will not easily be forgotten. "We cannot," said M. Rosseeuw Saint-Hilaire, "give to your fine and noble city a truer testimony of our gratitude than by leaving to you this wish, which fills all our hearts: Young men of Geneva, be Christians!" This same wish was in various forms expressed by all the other speakers. "As to me," said M. Vallette, "I am not come to you as a stranger; I am one of you. Like you, I have in my youth boated on our lake and skated upon our old fosses. There is, then, in my heart a deep affection for you, and I prove it by giving you a piece of advice—respect and cultivate your conscience." A visible emotion spread over the assembly, when Professor Saint-Hilaire, speaking of the religion of Rousseau, said, with trembling voice, "And I, also, during twenty years, had no other God than that of the Vicaire Savoyard. But he left me just at the moment when I most needed him! When trials came to lay me low, in the midst of my pride and security, I could not pray to him; he was too far from me! Oh, my dear friends, operatives of Geneva, leave the God of Rousseau, and accept that of the Gospel!" M. Guillaume Monod, in summing up all these counsels, wished his auditors the two essential qualities of Christians, independence and dependence, "the liberty of the strong young man, who has overcome the evil, and the humility of the sinner, who humbles himself under the mighty hand of God."

During the whole time of the Conference there was every morning at seven o'clock a prayer-meeting in the Chapelle de la Pelissérie. Social and devotional meetings were held in the grounds of M. Eynard, on the evenings of Sept. 3 and 6, as well as at the country seats of Messrs. Lasserre, Sillem (for the German brethren), G. Naville, and Empeytaz. A large social gathering was proposed for all the members of the Conference at the country seat of M. Adrien Naville, at Malagny; above 2,000 persons were invited. A special train and two steamers were to have conveyed the guests to Malagny, but the rain which set in during the last two days of the Conference prevented this gathering.

SERMONS.

Sermons were preached every evening during the Conference, and on the two intervening Sundays—

In French, by the following pastors: G. Monod (Paris), de Pressensé (Paris), Bois (Montauban), Dupasquier (Neufchâtel), Rognon (Paris), C. de Faye (Lyons), Monsell (Neufchâtel), E. Panchaud (Brussels), Desplands (Canton de Vaud), Bonnet (Frankfort), and B. Noel (London).

In English, by Revs. Daniel Wilson, Prebendary R. Burgess, Wm. Arthur, Alexander Dallas, Dr. Guthrie, B. Noel, Dr. Cairns, and T. R. Birks.

In German, by Superintendent Hanstein (Pomerania), Dr. Krummacher (Potsdam), Professor Tholuck (Halle), Pastor Tretzel (Nuremberg), Pastor Burckhardt (Westphalia), Professor Cossack (Konigsberg), and Pastor Hahn (Wurtemberg).

In Italian, by Professor Mazzarella (P logua), Pastor Meille (Turin), Pastor Malan (La Tour), and Pastor Geymonat (Florence).

In Swedish, by Pastor Sivelius (Finland).

In Danish, by Pastor Kalkar (Copenhagen).

RESOLUTIONS.

On the day of the opening of the Conference a General Committee of about forty members of various countries was appointed for the purpose of examining propositions which might be submitted to the Conference. Three special sub-committees were nominated to prepare the different resolutions. No resolution was brought before the Conference without having been examined by one of the sub-committees, and approved and sanctioned by the General Committee. After this, they were submitted to the vote of the Conference. A secretariat, consisting of M. Lucien des Menards, Racine Brand, L. Serment, and Hermann Schmettau, was more especially charged with the business of the committee.

Among the resolutions adopted by the Conference were also the following, in addition to those which appeared in our last number :—

CALVIN TERCENTENARY.

The Evangelical Alliance having met at Geneva at a time not far from the third centenary of the death of John Calvin, which took place on May 4, 1564, and Evangelical Christians of different countries, grateful for the great blessings which the Lord has bestowed upon the Church through the glorious Reformation, having celebrated the anniversaries of the deaths of various Reformers, especially that of Luther, and, quite recently, that of Melancthon, in order to express their gratitude towards God, and towards those whom He has chosen to promote His kingdom, publicly give thanks to the Lord for having called forth John Calvin in the sixteenth century to the work of reforming His Church and of re-establishing Evangelical truth.

The Conference expresses the wish, that on the Sunday nearest to the anniversary of the death of this Reformer, in 1864, the remembrance of these benefits of God should be recalled; leaving it entirely to the wisdom and the piety of the leading bodies of the churches, either at Geneva or elsewhere, in what manner this may best be done; it expresses also the wish, on which the will of the Lord and the opinion of the brethren should be consulted, whether it might not be well to leave a permanent memorial of this commemoration; and rejecting the thought of a statue, because, among other reasons, this would not be in harmony with the humble character of Calvin, the Conference thinks that an edifice might be erected, destined for some useful purpose, which might be used for the religious services of the two churches—the National and the Free—towards the erection of which surely many Christians would be happy to contribute.

CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES IN RUSSIA.

In humble gratitude to God, that He has been pleased to answer the fervent prayers which rose to the Throne of Grace from the Conference of Berlin, the Conference of Geneva expresses its gratitude to the Lord, and to all those who have been His blessed instruments, that the New Testament has begun to be published and circulated in Russia, in the language of the people, and expresses the hope that the dissemination of the Word of God in that country may be still more widely extended.

RESOLUTION OF THANKS.

Arrived at the termination of its meetings, the Conference, with adoration, returns its humble thanks to the supreme and only Head of the Church.

At the same time, it feels itself bound to testify its sentiments of deep and lively gratitude to all those persons whom the Lord has condescended to employ to procure for it, during the whole time of its various meetings, the benefits of peace, order, liberty, and edification.

It presents, therefore, its heartfelt thanks to the Council of State, to the Administrative Council of the City of Geneva, to the Consistory, and to the "Venerable Company of Pastors," to the Presbytery of the Evangelical Church, to the President and Committee of the Alliance, to the families who have received the members of the Conference with such cordial and amiable hospitality, to the Evangelical Union, to the Christian Union of Young Men, to the Society of Sacred Music, as well as to the whole population of Geneva. Above all, it fervently invokes on them the most precious blessings of God, our Father in Jesus Christ, His Son our Lord, through the influence of the Holy Spirit.

PUBLICATIONS ON THE CONFERENCE.

It is not our intention to analyse the pamphlets which were published on the Geneva Conference; their number amounted, when we left Geneva, to twenty-three. They may be classified in the following manner: Nine or ten are decidedly hostile to the Alliance; three or four are rather favourable; and ten are calm, wise, and Christian replies to the attacks against the Evangelical Alliance. Among the latter we would especially mention the pamphlet of Pastor D. Tissot, "Who are We? A Word on the History of the Evangelical Alliance."

Among the violent opponents we mention particularly the following Theological Professors in the University of Geneva: Hugues Oltramare, D. Munier, and Chenevière. Among the able defenders of the Conference and the Evangelical Alliance we find Dr.

Felix Bungener, L. Roehrich, Mestral, and D. Tissot, pastors of the National Church: and Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, of the Evangelical Church.

It is with pain we refer to an address which appeared during the Conference, signed by twenty-two pastors of Geneva, who disavowed the doctrine of the Trinity, and in violent terms attacked the Alliance. A counter-address appeared the next day, signed by fifty-seven distinguished members of the Geneva clergy who had not signed the first address.

THE RELIGIOUS STATE OF THE NATIONS OF EASTERN EUROPE AND WESTERN ASIA.

READ AT THE GENEVA CONFERENCE, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1861, BY THE REV. E. W. MONSELL, OF NEUCHÂTEL.

We have to inquire into the religious condition and prospects of Greece, of Turkey in Europe, and of Western Asia. The Christian population, in the European part of the region with which we have to do, amounts to about eleven millions, and to about four millions in the Asiatic part.

The Greek Church—the most numerous and the most enlightened of the Eastern communions—has been placed by Schleiermacher at a lower level than the Church of Rome itself. It is with deep regret that I find myself constrained, by the evidence of facts, to accede to the judgment of the celebrated German theologian.

At first sight such a sentence may appear too severe. The errors and superstitious practices common to Roman Catholics and to Oriental Christians are more fully developed at Rome than at Constantinople, and they have been affirmed in a much more positive way. Many forms of religious corruption present themselves in the Greek Church in the bud, or in an intermediate, rather than in the final stage. It is thus there is but one monastic order—that of St. Basil. Celibacy is imposed on the monks and on the higher clergy, but marriage is required of the simple parish priest; the worship of pictures and images is carried to a great extent, but men are not allowed to honour the statues of the saints; there are prayers for the dead, without any formal recognition of the doctrine of a purgatory; confession of sins to the priest exists as a practice, but without any public confessional; there is faith in the traditional authority of the Church, but there is no attempt to fix upon any one centre of such authority, and no refusal of salvation to those who remain outside of it. Observations of this kind might be multiplied, and they apply more or less to all the communions of the East. They are so many unfinished ritualistic religions—so many patriarchal hierarchic organizations, without a pope. Unfortunately, the fact that sacerdotalism and the other evils of these Churches are imperfectly carried out, does not warrant us to suppose them less fallen from the faith and from real religious life; for, when closely examined, their moral immobility is found to be an evil more than equivalent to the progress which the Catholicism of the West has made in the definition and in the assertion of its errors. The development of evil has been suspended only because every kind of development is arrested. The various morbid tendencies have not produced all their symptoms, because there was not life enough in the sufferer to call them forth.

It was to the Churches speaking Greek, or else to their rulers, that the letters of the Apostles were addressed; for many generations the Churches of the West were but so many Greek religious colonies; to the Greeks belong the greatest doctors of the first four centuries, and the seats of the first eight general councils. However, almost all the great corruptions of Christianity, having had their cradle in the East, wrought their first ravages there. Moreover, the subtle genius of these nations made them more liable than others to fall into intellectualism—i.e., the temptation to substitute for conversion of the soul to God a mere speculative adhesion to Christian doctrines propounded with metaphysical precision. The despotism of the Byzantine emperors certainly presented, in their half of the world, the strong organization of the hierarchy under a single chief, usurping the place of God in His temple; but it also hindered all spiritual independence and energy. Finally, the Arabs, those locusts out of the pit, and the Turks, those angels of destruction, let loose from the Euphrates, crushed down under a cruel and degrading yoke whatever remains of Eastern Christendom they allowed to subsist. The grass, says the proverb, cannot grow where the Osmanlee has set his foot, and the same thing may be said of every virtue and of all moral dignity. Thus, while the barbarians who overthrew the Western Empire appropriated the faith of the conquered, and contributed to the formation of European character some of its most precious qualities, the barbarians of the East have done nothing but destroy, break to pieces, and tread under foot.

From these various influences has resulted a displacing of the centre of religious life. The great experiences of the Christian Church have been made in the West; first of all, that of the theocracy, then that of the Evangelical reaction at the time of the blessed Reformation. From Gregory I. to Martin Luther, all the really eminent men in Church history have appeared in the West. If the Eastern hierarchy has not rejected the truth of the Gospel as formally and deliberately as that of Rome, and if it has not been to the same degree drunken with the blood of the saints, it is because the sphere of activity for good or evil, and consequently the scene of all great conflicts, has been the lands occupied by the Latin and Germanic races.

At present no infidelity exists among the masses in the East, because of the intellectual apathy that prevails. We do not find there that scientific elaboration of Pelagian principles and of salvation by works which the Council of Trent have accomplished, because there has not been the antagonism of the truth to elicit it. But the consciousness of the corruption of human nature is wanting, as is also the understanding of the grace of God in Jesus Christ. Fasts, penances, pilgrimages, ceremonies, priests, saints, relics, fill the Saviour's place, and keep at a distance all thoughts of real and personal relation with Him. The worship of the Virgin Mary reigns supreme in all hearts; the first prayer the little Greek child is taught to lip runs, "All my hope rests on thee, Mother of God; save me!" The adult prays, "Amid all the sorrows of life, to whom but thee should I flee for refuge, most holy Virgin?" . . . "Grant that we may love thee with all our heart and all our soul, and all our strength, and never swerve from thy commandments!" Finally, the aged die with the name of Mary upon their lips, and the priest that accompanies the remains to the tomb proclaims that the resurrection is to be the work of Mary! The Armenian liturgy is marked, among all the rest, by this deplorable feature, that in it the Saviour is not even associated with other mediators; His intercession is never invoked at all.

The different communities which make use of dead languages in prayer may be compared to a succession of fossils, reproducing with tolerable fidelity the physiognomy of the Church at different bygone epochs. The Nestorians recall a phase comparatively little removed from primitive purity—at least in its usages; they honour the Scriptures, receive three sacraments only, baptism, the Lord's Supper, and holy orders; they revere the cross, but do not use either crucifixes, pictures, or images, and celibacy is only required of bishops. The Armenians, Jacobites, and Greeks, are representatives of the patriarchal and imperial age. The very bitterness with which the Greeks of to-day rake up controversies that have been forgotten by the West for the last ten centuries is a curious illustration of their comparative immobility; one would suppose them the contemporaries of Photius. The Church of Rome, in its turn, is a fossil of the feudal age.

If I have allowed myself to use this comparison, it is not, however, that there is the absolute immobility and rigidity of death, but whatever rare modifications do take place are made in the wrong direction. At this very moment we see the Church of Rome finishing off its Ultramontanism, and decreeing the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. Similarly, every time that the Churches of the East have been brought to declare themselves on the questions controverted between Evangelical and materialistic Christians, their decision has been in favour of the latter. The number of fast days has gone on increasing; the canonical authority of the Apocrypha was received by the Greeks of the 17th century; the word transubstantiation was formally sanctioned by a council of Jerusalem in 1672, but the germ of the doctrine had existed among them from the days of Chrysostom. So late as 1828 the clergy of Greece boasted that they had never hindered the diffusion of the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue; but shortly afterwards, as soon as the effect produced by reading the Bible became manifest, it was included among forbidden books. The Armenians followed exactly the same course.

Greek priests seldom preach except in places where they are compelled to do it by Protestant or Roman Catholic competition, and even in liberated Greece there is an almost total absence of any religious literature worthy of the name. The precious manuscripts of the rich convents of Mount Athos are only used to keep the feet of the monks from the cold and dampness of the flags during their long and sleepy services. The yet more marked inferiority of the other communions of the East is confessedly the absence of all literature whatever, and above all, by the state of ignorance and degradation into which woman has fallen.

However slow to preach, the priests can curse with the most astonishing energy; and there is one art in which it must be owned that even the clergy of Rome are unable to surpass their elder brethren—that of making money. The sums raised in various ways by the Greek priests are known to exceed the amount of taxes levied by the Ottoman rulers. The Government of independent Greece, in order to relieve the people, adopted the plan of substituting a regular moderate salary for their arbitrary dues and exactions; and ever since it is said that the higher clergy still remaining under the Ottoman sceptre have separated their cause from that of Greek liberation, and are now devoted to the maintenance of the Ottoman rule, because it is more favourable to their fiscal interests. Ordination costs from 32*l.* to 40*l.*, and every priest has to pay the bishop an annual contribution. When a new church is dedicated, the bishop is liberally paid for the “laying down” of the altar; in cases of marriage, he invents prohibited degrees, in order to sell a greater number of dispensations; in cases of death, the body must remain in pledge upon the funeral mat until the family have disbursed a ψυχωμερίδιον, varying from 16*s.* to 16*l.*, according to the fortune of the deceased. The prayers so procured only secure the rest of the soul for three years; before the expiration of this term, the tomb is opened, the bones are collected, they are washed with wine, a sort of cap or handkerchief is put upon the skull, more prayers are intoned; and this time, since the operation is final, it is rated higher than before.

The labours of the Evangelical missionaries present the first dawn of hope that has risen upon these benighted regions since the armies of Omar crossed the Syrian frontier. The children of a new world have brought the torch of life back to the cradle of the human race; they preach Christ at the sources of the Euphrates, and in the birthplace of Abraham, at the foot of Lebanon, and amid the ruins of the Acropolis. It was the desire of the American Board of Missions at first to quicken the old churches, if possible, rather than bring about the formation of independent communities; but this aim has not been realised except among the Nestorians, and even among these but partially. The ever-increasing hostility of the clergy, and the spirit of persecution which they have exhibited towards all professing the Gospel, have gradually compelled the latter to assume an attitude of complete independence.

The Greeks were the first to be brought into contact with Protestantism, so far back as the time of the excellent Mr. Hartley. Unfortunately—ever disposed, like their ancestors, to despise strangers, full of their glorious past, and of hope of future political greatness—they look upon every attempt at reform or proselytism as an outrage upon their nationality. They feel less need of the consolations of the Gospel than their neighbours, and exhibit less moral preparation to receive it. Thus the Constitution of 1843, which gave the liberated Greeks more control over their Government, was the signal for an increase of violence towards the venerable Dr. King and his fellow-labourers. During the last few years Professor Pharmakides, of Athens, has done a good deal to secure the ecclesiastical independence of his country, and to check sundry abuses; but he has given utterance to no direct protest against the great errors of his Church.

The Greeks still belonging to the Turkish empire are, in general, more accessible. Among those who are scattered throughout Anatolia and Roumelia there is a more and more widely-spreading conviction that the Bible is the great authority in religious matters, and that the Protestants have the truth on their side; but they are unwilling to change their religion, lest they should interfere with the prospects of their race.

Impatience of the odious tyranny of the priests awakens a spirit of inquiry in a great many minds. The Turks, under the double influence of indolence and of a feeling of disdain towards their Christian subjects, have never governed the latter immediately. They leave every community to the arbitrary control of its own ecclesiastical rulers, and deal with it through them. This system has allowed the rayahs to maintain their respective nationalities, and it makes the recovery of their liberty possible; but it has put in the hands of the priests a power which they abuse beyond measure. Thus, in the year 1828, ten thousand Catholic Armenians were at once deprived of their property and condemned to perpetual banishment, because the Porte made itself the instrument of the Armenian Patriarch's hatred. Very recently two Bulgarian bishops were banished in consequence of an unjust sentence pronounced by the Patriarch and the Greek Synod of Constantinople.

Of the various sections of the Greek Church, it is the Bulgarians whose present state is the most hopeful and interesting. This people—once the terror of the later empire, converted in the ninth century, a bone of rival contention to rival popes and patriarchs, subject to the Turks since 1396—is now dispersed in Bulgaria proper, Servia, Thrace, and Macedonia, to the number of 8,400,000 souls, of whom a strong minority have become Mohammedan. The Bulgarian peasant is mild, grave, laborious, and his neighbours will have it that he is as slow as his own buffalos. He has been reproached with servility, because he refused to take up arms on the arrival of the Russian army, in 1828, which only signifies that he distrusts the Russians, that he is weary of being a prey to the rapacity of the Greeks, and that he is not disposed to revolt for the advantage of others; but liberty in itself he would prize; for the communes of the Balkan are really so many little pastoral republics. Up to the year 1764 the Bulgarians had a patriarch of their own; but at that period the Fanariots, so called from the Greek suburb of Constantinople, managed, by dint of intrigue, to get the Bulgarian patriarchate absorbed by their own, and since then the higher clergy, chosen from the monasteries of Mount Athos, have governed this people with a tyranny only to be equalled by their avarice.

The patience of the Bulgarians has been completely exhausted by multiplied abuses, by the immoralities and extortions of their rulers, and by their systematic opposition to the use of the Bulgarian tongue. After the publication of the Hatti-Humayoun this down-trodden people lost no time in claiming the recognition of the independence of their Church. The Porte refused it, not wishing to offend the Greeks and to give umbrage to Russia, but the Bulgarians, three or four times more numerous than the Greeks under the same jurisdiction, are determined not to bear the yoke of the minority any longer. Some of them, in their despair, turned their thoughts towards a union with the Church of Rome, to which they were drawn both by the active proselytism of the Jesuits and by the political influence of France. Hence, on the 30th of last December, two archimandrites, three priests, and twenty heads of co-operations, meeting at the Latin Archbishop's palace, signed an act of adhesion, which reserved, however, the use of their own liturgy and the maintenance of their customs. For a time 150 deputies from different districts threatened that they would follow this example in a body; the French papers used to speak of the two millions reconciled with the Church as of a fait accompli, and on the 14th of April, in the Sistine Chapel, the Pope ordained the Archimandrite Joseph Socolski, Bishop of the United Bulgarians.

There is every reason to believe that the triumph of the Roman Catholic press was premature. The movement towards union with Rome has met with the strongest remonstrances from all quarters, and with an apparently invincible repugnance. Bishop Socolski himself speedily repudiated the step he had taken; the Bible and Protestant tracts are spread abroad and read with avidity; the missionaries, both at Constantinople and at Philippopolis, agree in thinking that the leading men are more disposed to become Protestants than Roman Catholics, and a formal appeal to the Evangelical Alliance has been signed by the bishops of the capital, and the representatives of the community there. "The Bulgarian nation is now awake," writes Mr. Meriam (March 12th). "It is the right time to sow the seed. For the coming few months, the people will think more on spiritual topics than they have done for the past five years. If, after the present excitement is over, they sink down again into stupidity and spiritual death, our work will be a comparatively hopeless one."

Meanwhile the Greek Patriarch himself has become conscious that he must make some concessions. He has just published an encyclical letter, which, had it appeared a few months earlier, would have prevented the whole movement. As it is, it may, perhaps, help to check Romish proselytism, without putting a stop to the spirit of inquiry awakened among this honest and persevering race.

The secondary communions of the East are beyond all comparison the best-disposed to welcome the Gospel, because they are not drawn away from it by hopes of earthly greatness; just as in the days of our Lord and His Apostles the Samaritans were more easy of access than the Jews, because they could not entertain any dreams of national glory or supremacy. In every sense, the kingdom of Heaven is for the poor.

The anastere Jacobites, a monophysite sect scattered through Mesopotamia and Syria, have not shown themselves hostile to the mission.

The Nestorians, estimated at about 150,000 souls, of whom a third are in Persia, and the remaining two-thirds in Kurdistan, are the feeble remains of a once powerful Church, that was persecuted by the Greeks, tolerated for political reasons by the Persians, and which spread the Christian faith abroad, even to India and China. The success of the missionary work among this interesting population has been great and rapid beyond all expectation. The pulpits of the community have been from the first open to the Americans; two seminaries with 80 pupils, 68 day-schools, with 1,430 pupils, of whom one-third are girls, are silently exercising an incalculable amount of religious and general influence; the press has awakened thousands from sottish ignorance to mental activity; nearly 60 native preachers, intelligent, believing, devoted men, carry the Gospel to the masses; and the faith and love of several hundred communicants adorn their profession in the midst of their countrymen. The present patriarch is favourably disposed; the recent marriage of a bishop, Mar Johanna, proves that superstitious traditions are losing ground. The astonishing transformation of the Nestorians has awakened general attention among the Mohammedans, whether Kurds or Persians, and this ancient body, after its long torpor, promises to become once more a missionary church.

The same state of preparedness for the truth, combined with still greater facilities for spreading it, is exhibited by the Armenians. This is a people driven from its home, dispersed throughout the East, isolated even among Christian communities by its monophysite doctrines. They now form only a third of the population in their native mountains, over the theatre of war and devastation; but like the Jews, they are to be found in all countries, and, like them, they have in their hands great part of the trade of the East, and are everywhere remarked for their intelligence and enterprising spirit. After the Jews, it is the race most fitted to become a missionary people.

Besides half a million and upwards scattered throughout Asia and part of Europe, they reckon two millions in Asiatic Turkey—that is to say, half the Christian and one-seventh of the whole population.

The beginning of this work dates from the arrival of the Revds. Dr. Goodall and Dr. Dwight at Constantinople, in 1832. The first sermon in Armenian was preached in 1836. In 1839 and 1846 the firmness of the little band of disciples was put to the test by severe persecutions: during the space of six months, the prison, the bastinado, banishment, and confiscation were the everyday arguments of a hierarchy determined to put an end to the Evangelicals.

Fifteen years have since elapsed, and now, without reckoning the Syrian and Nestorian mission fields, there have been added to the solitary Armenian flock of Constantinople forty-two more, having 1,400 members, and these represent a Protestant community of 9,000 souls. The result of six years of labour in one locality may show to what degree the doors are at present open to the Gospel in the very heart of Asia Minor. In 1855 two American missionaries succeeded in fixing themselves in the town of Marash after great difficulties. There are now at that place a Protestant community a thousand strong, a regular congregation of from 700 to 1,000 persons, a church which had 225 members last May, and is daily increasing, and six schools with 350 pupils. About 200 Protestant adult women and fifty Greek and Armenians have learned, or are learning, to read.

The elevation of woman is one of the most remarkable as well as the happiest results of the Protestant mission. Among the Christians of Asiatic Turkey the character and condition of women had fallen almost as low as among the Moslem. Now, seminaries to train female teachers, and day-schools also, are scattered throughout the remotest districts of Turkey, and upon the frontier of Persia. Future mothers of families and members of churches are prepared in them. There are mothers' prayer-meetings in every flock, and not only in the old Christian churches, but the very Mohammedans themselves are stirred up to jealousy, and begin to perceive that women have souls.

Even the Armenians who do not become Protestants are gradually emancipating themselves from practices which only a few years ago were regarded as the touchstone of orthodoxy. The symbols of superstitious worship gradually disappear from the churches. The fear once entertained of the anathemas of the priests have given place to a feeling of disgust at their selfishness, their duplicity, and cruelty; the Bible in the vulgar tongue is generally read, and the doctrine of the Church compared with its teachings; relations of private friendship have been re-established between the members of the two churches; the Armenian children attend Protestant schools, and the adults Protestant places of worship. Another crisis must speedily come about, says Dr. Dwight, another exodus from a corrupt Church, but this time it will be upon a far grander scale than before.

The American brethren have shown great practical wisdom and praiseworthy respect for the people among whom they labour, by aiming at the creation and organization of a native ministry, and of self-sustaining churches. Instead of rendering Armenian Protestantism for ever dependent upon America, they labour to prepare a state of things in which their own co-operation will be no longer necessary. The missionary himself is never, properly speaking, pastor of a church; he devotes himself to train the native preacher, who is thus set to work in a station or at the head of a church. The extremely moderate sum for which a theological education can be obtained in their seminaries—12*l.* yearly at Bebek, 6*l.* at Kharpoot—is of itself enough to show what care they take not to Europeanise their students, by inspiring them with a taste for the material side of our civilisation. The salary of the pastor and the expenses of the school are never entirely defrayed by the American Board; the churches are expected always to contribute to each according to their means, and the amount of their contributions increases from year to year.

The missions of Syria and Palestine are in one sense the most interesting of all, because of the sacred remembrances connected with the places which form their sphere; but they have not to do with a numerous population, like some of those of which we have been speaking. The most blessed result of the episcopal mission to Jerusalem may perhaps be found hereafter to consist in that intercourse with the Abyssinians which the venerable Bishop Gobat has been able to keep up or to renew. The American Mission has survived the horrible massacres which so recently dyed the slopes of Lebanon with human blood.

The zeal and impartiality exhibited in the distribution of the funds sent from Protestant countries have opened every door to the missionaries, so that the stations which they have been able to occupy once more are more promising than ever; they even possess the confidence of the Druses still more than that of the Maronites.

It was only recently that the American Board of Missions tried to reach the Bulgarians, and that without having as yet established any station north of the Balkan. Hitherto nothing has been attempted among the Roumans, although circumstances are most favourable. It is a people of the Greek religion, but of Duco-Latin origin; forming consequently an island in the midst of the Slavonian races which surround it. They boast of the tolerant spirit which has always distinguished them; they are extremely distrustful of Russian ambition, and exasperated against the Fanariots, and that Greek hierarchy which has so long and so shamefully preyed upon them. Without speaking of their congeners under Russian and Austrian rule, the Roumans amount to nearly 4,000,000 within the limits of the Principalities, and to 210,000 scattered south of the Danube. I should wish to speak of the proud and chivalrous Servians, of the Christians of Bosnia and the Herzegovina—in short, of the whole basin of the lower Danube, a vast and important region, where the advanced guard of Evangelical Christianity has scarcely appeared. But alas! for the present, we are not summoned to fresh conquests; as we shall see, it will be a hard matter to retain the old.

The Roman Catholics of Turkey in Europe and Greece, or the fractions of Oriental communities united with Rome, are reckoned by Professor Ayer, with perhaps some slight exaggeration, at 529,000 souls, principally inhabitants of Albania and Turkish Croatia. He computes those of Asiatic Turkey to be about 200,000, including the whole tribe of the Maronites. Rome is conscious of the great importance of this field, and she keeps up in it an entire army of servants, with which the little contingent of Protestant labourers cannot measure itself as far as number is concerned. In 1841, when the Catholics of Independent Greece only amounted to 23,000, they had an archbishop, three bishops, seven convents, forty-three churches, eighty-three chapels, and two seminaries. We know how Roman Catholic agents were able a short time ago to raise up all Lebanon in arms. Lazarists, brethren of Christian doctrine, sisters of charity, swarm in all the important towns of the Levant. I have not been able to procure a recent statistic of their establishments, but even in 1850 that of Constantinople alone contained a college with 80 pupils, a girls' school with 160 boarders and 60 orphans brought up gratuitously, day schools with 1,300 children, an asylum for foundlings, a hospital, an institution for distributing money and food to the poor, and lastly, a printing-office. The persons employed in these various establishments, at this single station, were fourteen Lazarists, seventeen brethren of Christian doctrine, and forty-four sisters of charity!

On the other hand, Catholic proselytism has to contend with the disadvantage of having to offer these populations nothing but a form of religion of the same order as that they already possess, and I believe we have every right to assert that the 10,000 native Protestants of the East—with characters elevated and ennobled by their faith, and a probity recognised even by their adversaries—constitute a moral power altogether out of proportion with their numbers.

Protestant missions have to confront an enemy more formidable than Catholic proselytism; Russia dazzles the Greeks by the hopes with which ever and anon she dexterously plies them, and she courts the Armenians, whose ecclesiastical centre and patriarchal seat, Echmiazin, is upon her territory. The Crimean war may, perhaps, have only suspended the dismemberment of Turkey, but it saved the American Mission; at least, humanly speaking, it is necessary that the political existence of the Ottoman Empire should be prolonged for some time, if Protestantism is to take root in the East with any measure of security.

We fully agree with the assertion so often made by the Continental press, that it is absurd to expect the least progress from a Mohammedan power remaining such. The evils of Turkey are inseparable from its religion; it is impossible, for instance, that a fusion of races should be effected there, or that a real equality of races should prevail there, as long as the Koran remains the supreme law of the land. It is impossible that there should be upright and devoted governors so long as the minds of all classes remain out of reach of any regenerating principle. We must also own that were we not to take into consideration the interests of Evangelical proselytism, we should see nothing to recommend that policy of superficial routine which persists in providing for the balance of power in Europe, by keeping the resources of this great empire locked up under the feeble guardianship of a race that is dying away, instead of committing them to races full of life and hope—races that are daily growing in number, wealth, and self-reliance. We have before us at one and the same time a rising and a decaying Eastern society, a cradle and a coffin. British statesmen have thought it wise to identify us with the latter; they have made its interests, real or supposed, override, not considerations of generosity merely, but even those of justice; they have made the disease and debility of the head to serve as a measure of the prosperity which the limbs might be permitted to enjoy. However, the designs of the only wise God are registered on high, far above the ken of shortsighted statesmen; and those who know what sort of Cross should replace the Crescent, in order really to regenerate the East, they may hope that these involuntary errors may one day be found to have contributed to the highest good of the human race.

The Evangelical public of Great Britain and upon the Continent is placed, at the present time, in a position of serious responsibility with respect to Eastern missions. Here is the only place in the world where the three great Christian sections, Greek, Catholic, and Protestant, meet on a footing of equality and reciprocal liberty of action—the only place apparently where great conquests can be made in our day at each other's expense, and where there is any present probability of changes affecting the standing of these several communions in the Christian family. It is the region where Christianity has fallen lower than anywhere else, except Abyssinia; at the same time, a general spirit of inquiry prevails; wants and aspirations hitherto unknown are felt in all directions; of missions upon the same scale, this is the most useful and the most blessed. These motives for increased activity should be enhanced by the feeling that the position is a most precarious one; our liberty to preach the Gospel apparently depends upon the fleeting breath of a man sinking under mortal disease. Time presses; it is necessary to establish ourselves in the heart of the place, so as never to be driven out of it. And now, just as if things were purposely ordained so to fall out as to render our responsibility more crushing—at this moment, at once so favourable and critical—the work receives a fearful shock from the fratricidal war which rends America asunder. While every post tells us of new doors open in the East, every month witnesses a lamentable diminution in the receipts of the mission. The Board has had to come to the determination of curtailing the expenses immediately, to the amount of 60,000 dollars. In order not to turn adrift its trained and tried missionaries, the reduction must fall upon the department of the schools and native workmen, and nothing short of a sudden and enthusiastic outburst of Christian liberality in Europe can hinder the dismissal of 300 pupils from various theological seminaries and boarding-schools, of 4,000 pupils from the day-schools that must be closed, of 100 schoolmasters, 100 catechists, and 50 preachers; many native pastors, belonging to the weakest churches, must also be left to their own resources. Tocat, where the ashes of Henry Martyn rest, is one of the places included in this melancholy sentence. Half of this retrenchment is to be made in the sphere of Turkish Missions, where it becomes a great disaster to the cause of Evangelical Christianity. What a practical appeal to a universal congress of the Evangelical Alliance! Hitherto, our American brethren have given of their abundance to the old world. They were better placed than any others could be for the work which they undertook, since of all Protestant nations they could be least suspected of any underhand political scheme. But it is for us now to sustain their failing hands. They have been doing our own work at our very door, they have been ploughing our field at their expense; the time has come to show them our gratitude and our sympathy.

The Turkish Missions-Aid Society was formed in 1854, in order to give assistance to all Evangelical missions in the Turkish Empire, but especially to the American; it has been enabled to be most useful to all departments of the work, but chiefly to the Bulgarian Mission, which was undertaken, I believe, upon its own recommendation. Unfortunately, its income has never been in proportion to the greatness of its end. Let us hope that it may no longer be so with a work which has the privilege of being so many things at the same time—a pledge of international friendship, a testimony of brotherly love, the stay of a mission, the existence of which is at once so important and so menaced.

Is it only with a view to the spiritual weal of the Christian populations that we should wish for a prolongation of the Ottoman Empire? or is there any ground to hope for a change in the Turks themselves? We are aware that all Moslem populations are now alternately disheartened or roused to fits of fanaticism. It would seem as if the consciousness of the decrepitude of their civilisation were now acting upon the minds of a number of thinking Turks, disturbing their confidence in the infallibility of their Prophet, and disposing them—to use the language of one of themselves—to change a dead mediator for one that “ever liveth.”

The number of Mohammedans actually baptized is inconsiderable, but the New Testament is sought after with avidity, conversation on religious subjects is well received by Turks of all classes, and the missionaries in general, especially those of Constantinople and Ualkir, are struck by the kindly feeling manifested towards them by men of every rank. Labourers among the Nestorians remark the same feeling among the tawny Persians and the savage Kurds. The ragged Moslem children of Aintab can be heard singing in the street the airs of American revival hymns! In a word, apart from the vexations caused by the venality of functionaries, requests for Protestant teaching are universal among all the Mohammedans who know how to distinguish between our worship and that of the idolators, as they are in the habit of calling Eastern Christians, with but too much justice. More than fifty families of Kurdish mountaineers of the sect called Guzlebulash call themselves Protestants, give up their habits of plundering, and ask for a teacher to explain the way of salvation to them, saying that they will honour him as they do their own sheik.

The rise of reforming sects, aiming at a syncretism of Mohammedanism, and of a modified form of Christianity, is a remarkable symptom of the process which is going on in men's minds. The most important specimen of this kind is the sect founded by Omur Effendi, at Broosa and in the neighbourhood. It is a sort of mysticism, presenting much that is analogous to the primitive doctrines of the Society of Friends. Its founder is at present in exile.

Are the barbarians of the East, then, about to become speedily Christian, and to form a new society, like the barbarians of the West? Our unbelief is disposed to tax as chimerical the very thought of the possibility of such a thing. For many centuries back we have seen no religious movements except upon a small scale; hence the looking forward to very little seems to us to be so much wisdom and sobriety; but real experience is that which draws its conclusions from the ways of God as a whole. Now, it is evident that human history has always presented great epochs of crisis, development, and sudden transformation, even though they have been prepared by the slow and silent labours of ages. The real connexion between the different spheres of human life is also an undeniable fact. Intellectual, social, and political progress, scientific discoveries, the consolidation of nationalities, the increase of intercourse between nations—all these elements of labour, of conflict, of a germinating future, synchronise mysteriously with a secret preparation of minds for a higher life. The half century preceding the Reformation is the most illustrious example of this great law of simultaneous development. Our generation has advanced with giant steps in its material acquisitions and in every kind of science, and, just as in the beginning of the sixteenth century, this progress has been accompanied by deep moral disquiet, by decomposition of opinions, and by increasing scepticism. A new effusion of the Spirit of Grace alone can bring this time of transition to a happy issue, and put the higher life of man in harmony with the magnificent expansion of all his faculties. It will surely be granted us this grace from on high. It is sound Christian wisdom to discern the signs of the times, to understand that we are on the eve or at the beginning of a great epoch of religious crisis, and to feel the responsibility of such a moment.

The commencements of spiritual revival in the East coincide with an even more marked tendency to appreciate the importance of these regions from a political and a commercial point of view. Asia Minor, Syria, the Valley of the Euphrates, are opening to European enterprise. The past and the future, the holiest remembrances of mankind, and part of its hopes, meet upon these ancient fields of battle between Eastern and Western hosts—these points of contact between the Japhetic and the Shemitic races, the bridge that unites the two continents, the land of passage for armies, and merchandises, and ideas. From the siege of Troy to the massacres of Soio, these regions have witnessed more horrors than any other part of the world—wars of extermination, followed by those stifling peacees in which races disappear, and their place knoweth them no more. When shall the nations only meet for their mutual good? When shall the happiest lands be those in which the most various tribes are found in contact? When shall Asia Minor become the high road of a loftier civilisation than that which three thousand years ago wended its way to Europe across its highlands and along its shores? There was a time when the prophet, standing on the mount of Judah, looked toward the distant West; he thought he heard the singing of hymns, voices glorifying the Lord in the isles of the Ægean, and from the extremities of then Pagan Europe. (Isaiah xxiv. 14—16.) Be it ours now to stand upon our watchtower in turn, look to the East, and listen.

SPAIN.

THE IMPRISONED PROTESTANTS AT GRANADA.

The sufferings of these brethren since the beginning of July have been intense. It was after the insurrectionary movement at Loja that Matamoros was dragged from his cell and sepulchred in a dungeon, the most distant and lonely in the horrible prison of Granada, poisonous with bad odours, and only lighted by artificial lights. Alhama was also placed in a vile cell and in solitude. These severe measures were adopted by the Government because the Jesuits had spread the report that the rising at Loja was a Protestant movement, and that the prisoners were connected with it. In order to obtain the necessary proofs of their complicity, a fellow-prisoner (under sentence of seven years' penal servitude) was summoned by the Governor and Captain Junial, who offered him his liberty and 8,000 reals, if he would obtain possession of the papers and documents which were believed to be in their possession, and to contain proof of their guilt. This man, who had been brought by the priests to give false testimony against the prisoners, robbed Matamoros of a letter which he had received from his friends in Dublin, his answer to it, two letters from his family, and a letter from Pastor R——. On the evening of July 7, these papers were given up to the authorities; on the morning of the 8th, the prisoners were placed in solitary confinement; and on the following day this wretched man was set at liberty; and not only so, but he was permitted to occupy Matamoros' and Alhama's former room for the space of a week, for the purpose of examining their property, to discover, if possible, some further proofs of their supposguilt. One day he robbed Matamoros of a pocket-handkerchief, and took it to Alhama's wife, asking in Matamoros' name for "papers," and showing her his handkerchief as a token. She was surprised, and told him she had no such papers. She declared that Matamoros had never entrusted her with any such things. Notwithstanding this, the spy reported to the authorities that she had them, and the whole family was arrested. After a fortnight of anxiety, they were released from their solitary confinement. Alhama's wife has been set at liberty, but his mother, seventy-two years of age, is still in prison. Matamoros, in a letter to a friend in England, to whom we are indebted for this information, writes: "The unhealthiness of my dungeon, my wretched condition, my sorrowful recollections of my unhappy family, and a thousand other causes, proved too much for my strength. On the third day a fierce and burning fever laid me low. For three days I struggled on without asking for any assistance, but on the night of the 13th of July I was so ill that I asked for medical aid. The fiscal refused to allow me to see a doctor. I asked for medicine; it was also refused. For eight days I lay there unable to rise, burnt by the fever, until the goodness of God saw fit to remove it. Then I heard of the unjust imprisonment of Alhama's family. On the thirteenth day of my imprisonment in this dreadful cell, at five o'clock in the morning, I was brought out to be examined by a military commission. I was eleven hours under examination, and only by the questions addressed to me I learned of what I was accused."

The friend to whom the letter was addressed, in writing to us, says: "I fear that when you hear Mr. Dallas' account of the emaciated, heart-broken captives, you will be constrained to confess that the half had not been told you. I, who for twelve months have had their weekly prison letters telling me all, one-tenth of which has not been in print, have some idea, though a faint one, of the insatiable and inhuman cruelty of the Romish Thugs that are around them."

Before we give the following two letters, we may mention that the person who desired to betray Matamoros and Alhama has since made three attempts at destroying himself, which were frustrated; and at length, remorse of conscience becoming too strong, he confessed that all his accusations were a foul calumny; but in spite of this, they are harassing these dear brethren as badly as ever. It is indeed a time for much prayer on their behalf. Nothing is too hard for the Lord. May He bless the combined efforts of God's children of all countries, which are being made at the very moment that we write these lines, through the medium of the Evangelical Alliance.

LETTER TO THE PRISONERS AT GRANADA FROM THE GENEVA CONFERENCE.

Dear brother Matamoros, and ye all beloved of God, who are in prison for the sake of His Word, and for the testimony of Jesus: The Evangelical Alliance, founded in the year 1846, for the purpose of uniting the children of God of different Protestant churches of the whole world, has just held its fourth Ecumenical Conference at Geneva, as its three preceding ones were held, successively in London, Paris, and Berlin.

The Evangelical Christians who attended this Conference from all countries of the globe, to the number of about two thousand, remembered in their meetings their brethren in Spain, who are prisoners for the Gospel's sake; they fervently prayed for them, and resolved to testify to them their deep interest in various ways, and first of all, by sending to them this expression of their fraternal sympathy.

We have been charged to write to you in the name of the Conference, and we hasten to do so with all our heart.

We all have been deeply moved by your affliction, for we can understand your privations, difficulties, temptations, and sufferings of all kinds; and as you are, with us, members of the body of Christ, and if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it, we feel ourselves associated in heart with you in all your trials, and visit you in spirit in your dreary dungeons, and fill them with our prayers.

These prayers we shall not cease to offer to the God of deliverance, begging Him, if it be His will, speedily to do for you what He did for Peter, when He opened for him the prison while the Church was engaged in prayer. We desire also to pray for your august Queen, that God would bless her, and make her heart favourable to you.

But meanwhile we shall continue to lay your case before God, and beg of Him to watch over you and keep you in health, to comfort you in all your sufferings, and above all, to sanctify you for the glorious service to which He has called you. For it is a great mercy and honour which He has conferred on you, that He has chosen you, not only to believe in Jesus Christ, but also to suffer for Him. He has chosen you out of all your countrymen to entrust to you the glorious office of testifying, even in chains and bonds, for the Gospel of His grace in Spain. In the blessed conflict for the faith which has recommenced in your country He has assigned to you the post of honour.

Therefore, dear brethren, if on the one hand we suffer with you, on the other hand, we praise God for the sacred mission which He has entrusted to you, and for the hope of those blessings which this will bring on your nation as well as on yourselves.

"Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness sake," says the Lord himself, "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven;" and as regards your people, he has declared, that His Word shall not return unto Him void.

Rejoice, then, and triumph in Christ, as He Himself rejoices over you and glorifies Himself in you, and take up for yourselves that word of the French martyrs of the sixteenth century. "If the feet are in chains, the head is in the heavens."

But we thank God, especially, that, as we have heard, He has given you grace to suffer with humility and patience;—that you have learned to glory only in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world is crucified unto us, and we unto the world; and that the earnest desire of your heart is to bring forth by the Holy Spirit, who dwelleth in you, ever more abundantly and more manifestly the fruits of the Spirit.

May He teach you more and more to love your enemies, to bless them that curse you, to do good to them that hate you, and to pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you.

And to this end, look continually unto Jesus, the Author of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down on the right hand of the throne of God. Yes, dear prisoners of Jesus Christ, carefully consider Him, who endured such great contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds; may you be kept steadfast, remembering that Jesus is always with you.

Finally, yet a little while and He that shall come will come, and shall not tarry. His last word is: "Surely I come quickly." Let us, dear brethren, keep this blessed hope in a good conscience, and may you and we, with all those who love Him, be always ready by the Holy Spirit to answer: "Even so, come Lord Jesus."

Now, unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever.

We greet you in Him with sentiments of brotherly affection. Let us continue in His love.

T. ADRIEN NAVILLE, President of the Conference.

LETTER FROM MATAMOROS.

Prison of the Audiencia, Granada,
Oct. 4, 1861.

... After three months of unspeakable suffering, and thirty-five days of rigorous and horrible solitude, we have been again for the last fortnight placed in our dungeons—this time on the pretext that we propagate the Protestant religion among the prisoners, that we set a bad example in never hearing mass, and other such charges. I am, however, permitted the visits of my dear and affectionate mother, and by her aid I am enabled to send you this letter. ... In this poor and lonely cell we have had the comfort of receiving the Christian visit of the worthy rector, the Rev. A. Dallas, and H. C. Eade (made in the name of those members of the Evangelical Alliance who met at Geneva), for the purpose of conveying to us a most important document; a document of great edification to us, as much by the eminently Evangelical spirit which it breathes and the wise counsels which it conveys, as by the important and comforting portions of the Book of Life which it recalls to us; and, finally, by the sympathy which that worthy and Christian assembly manifests for the disciples of Christ now in bonds in Spain. I need not tell you with what satisfaction we have received this expression of Christian love. You know enough of the communion of saints to be able to imagine the greatness of my joy and consolation, and of my eternal gratitude.

This eminently Evangelical society, which has displayed so much zeal, constancy, self-denial, and uninterrupted charity towards us, has now augmented its Christian consolations by this new proof of solicitude and interest, which cannot but produce a salutary impression on the minds of all Spanish Christians.

And what shall I say to you of those worthy pastors? What shall I say of their mission that will not appear weak and futile in comparison with the real value of this memorable visit? Oh, what love! what interest! what feeling were manifested by those saints! Their visit lasted three whole hours, which appeared but one moment—a moment of happiness, of such heartfelt joy! We, who only see around us sights of sin, and suffer daily from cruel despotism and Satanic injustice—we had the comfort of receiving evidences of the Christian love of those dear friends. All that I can say is inadequate and weak. No one can understand & save the heart that has experienced the blessings of such love.

In spite of a sentinel at our door, we prayed together to our Supreme Lord and Saviour, Mr. Dallas leading us with feeling and affectionate love like that of Paul. I should like every one to know my gratitude towards these good and venerable brethren. They also visited my mother, and she accompanied them to the diligence on their departure.

Your brother in Christ,

M. MATAMOROS.

THE INTERVIEW OF THE DEPUTATION AND THE FAREWELL.

It would be obviously undesirable to publish all that we have heard, though authentic, of what has transpired since the return of the deputation. They were instructed not only to visit the suffering Protestants, but to make certain inquiries, the answers to which will be published at some future time, if that course should commend itself to those with whom the responsibility in this matter lies. But we feel no such reluctance with reference to what has been stated respecting the prisoners themselves. One member of the deputation says: "We have seen the prisoners, and have had full conversation with them. They appear to be in the most settled and calm state of mind. They were greatly comforted by our visit. We delivered to them the letter of sympathy from the Conference, and I translated to them sentence by sentence, and they were charmed and grateful, and gave thanks to God for the consolation afforded by the sympathy and prayers of so many Christians."

The other member of the deputation thus describes the parting scene. We give his own words: "The parting scene, when we left these poor dear brethren, was touching in the extreme. They clung to us with a long embrace, as if they could not let us go, and went to the door at the foot of the steps of the one room to which they are confined, anxious to see us as long as possible. The key was then turned on them. They went back to their confinement, and we went forth to light and liberty. Yet, what were we better than they? And how truly they call for our sympathies and our prayers!"

PORTUGAL.

LABOURS IN CONNEXION WITH A PROTESTANT SCHOOL—THE ROMISH ORDERS AT WORK—POPISH VIRULENCE—LITERARY EFFORT SUGGESTED.

Portugal, October, 1861.

... I shall enjoy very much seeing Mr. Dallas again—God's messenger to me, as I always look upon him; for, after wrestling in prayer that some comforter would appear, after the deep affliction of 1856, he appeared. And it was after my interview with him that I turned to try to do something, and prayed to be allowed to do more, in placing the glad tidings of salvation before the souls of men around me. When I think of how the smallest beginning has been owned of God, I cannot help believing that my prayer has been heard—for most assuredly abundance of help has been given me. And how? I scarcely know.

Since you left us, I have commenced my school. It is going on very nicely, and increasing daily. The prior of the parish has told the schoolmistress that, if she does not teach the Ave Maria, he will report her. But I go on until it is put down, and sow seed while the sun is up. There has been a procession of all the four saints of the Church round the Largo, to keep evil from the parish; but I take no notice, not seeming to suppose that the evil was suspected to be originating in me. I have thirty-one children.

The state of things, however, has changed considerably during the last twelve months. Since the French Sisters of Charity, with their Lazarist confessors, have been allowed to settle in Portugal, an acknowledged reaction has taken place in the old Roman Catholic party. An aristocratic Popish association—long existing in France and Spain—has extended its ramifications to Portugal. Its central committee is at Lisbon, and it has several regular organised branches in the provinces. It is composed of a great many of the high and parochial clergy, of the old nobility, of persons favourable to the "Union Iberica," of weak-minded fanatics, and of French Jesuits, who, within the last two years, have established themselves in Portugal, and of the French Sisters of Charity, who are well known as the cleverest pioneers of Jesuitism;—and particularly are they so here, accompanied as they have been by their Lazarist confessors. To this powerful association there is also an influential auxiliary in the charitable institution of St. Vincent de Paul, which, through the free access of its members to families, and the knowledge they obtain of the most confidential kind, exercises great influence among the middle and lower classes.

The aim and effort of this great association, "Uniao Catholica," is directed against all liberal institutions—religious and political—and England and Protestantism is attacked until their abuse becomes quite ludicrous. I have sent you some numbers of their organ, A Nação, that you may judge of their virulence. Missionaries are being sent over Portugal, and the Sunday before last one of them was raving on the Largo of Belem against Protestants and Protestantism. It is absurd what these ignorant men say and make others believe of England and her religion. I often think, and therefore I now place it before you for consideration, whether great good might not be done by now and then inserting in the liberal papers an article, in which the truth of the Gospel, and the blessings it has conferred on all those nations which have received it, and allow the Word of God not only to be freely circulated and read, but make it the basis of all instruction, might be stated. France is doing its utmost to obtain religious and political influence in Portugal, and I often wish I had sufficient pecuniary means to have articles of the right sort written and inserted, to counteract in some measure the mischief which this society does among the ignorant, benighted classes, to whom the Protestants are represented as people who, since they have fallen away from the holy Church, no longer believe in God. Do you know of any society that would help in this work? I mean, the making use of opportunities as they occur, to make known the leading fundamental doctrines of Protestantism, as well as increasingly to enable Portugal to understand that England, and not Rome, is her faithful ally—her friend, and not her enemy—and that all the happiness, and the blessing, and peace which England and the other Protestant countries enjoy, are the fruits of the reverence and the high estimation in which God's holy Word is held. There are, as you know, not wanting men of talent and the right spirit, whom I could employ now and then in this important work, and I trust that among the friends of the Gospel there may be some who will support me in this particular work*. . .

ITALY.

THIRST OF THE NEAPOLITANS FOR EDUCATION—NUMEROUS ATTENDANCE AT TRAINING SEMINARIES—A SCHOOL IN THE STREET.

Naples, Oct. 6, 1861.

. . . The people are beginning to take breath, and to feel an interest in questions tending to improve their moral and material condition. The first symptom of this confidence in Government is shown in the eagerness with which they receive the proposals of the officers delegated by the Minister of Public Instruction for re-organizing educational matters in these provinces. Municipalitans and private persons vie with each other in voting funds for founding schools and colleges; and I must tell you that in some localities one has to restrain rather than stimulate their zeal in this direction. I will give you a fact: In the various provinces magisterial schools are open for preparing elementary teachers; well, at this moment more than 4,000 persons attend them. Is not this a good omen for the future? This people is, indeed, very wide awake. If well directed, it will do great things. Owing to the climate, it lives very much out of doors—in the streets and squares. To-day, for instance, I witnessed a curious spectacle—an elementary school held in the middle of a street!

An excellent citizen, an enthusiast for Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel, a man of property, and much esteemed by his fellow-citizens, has taken a fancy to teach the children of his street by establishing in the Quarter S. Guiseppe, where he resides, a school for the passers-by. A large board is hung on the wall with the letters of the alphabet, and the cardinal numbers printed on it, and this is never taken down. At four o'clock every

* If this suggestion should commend itself to the judgment of any of our readers, and they should be disposed to afford pecuniary aid for the proposed object, we shall be happy to secure the prompt transmission of contributions which may be entrusted to us for that purpose.—Eps.

afternoon there is a great influx of students, as then two masters explain the lessons and teach. The number of those who attend increases daily, and I assure you that they give good heed to the explanations given. When a child has learnt to pronounce the syllables clearly, and to spell, he receives a little book of easy reading, worth 2d.; and this prize is so valued by the little urchins, that not a few of them spend many hours in practising their lessons, in hopes of obtaining the prize sooner than others. The name of this good citizen is Edoardo Pangrazio. He is now about to form evening schools in his quarter.

GOVERNMENTAL ACTION UPON THE PAPACY—QUESTIONS TO ITALIAN THEOLOGICIANS RESPECTING THE POPE'S TEMPORAL POWER.

(From La Buona Novella.)

The national and foreign journals have spoken of a ministerial circular, in which the Minister of the Interior invited the theological faculties of the kingdom to give their opinions upon this question: Whether the following propositions are contrary to the faith?

1. The temporal power of the Pope is a fact, by its very nature accidental and of human origin.

2. The spiritual power and the religious liberty of the Pope being guaranteed, the temporal power may be diminished and even terminated.

3. In the actual order of things, the temporal power of the Pope lacks every reason for enduring longer, and instead of being useful, is injurious to the State and to the Church.

4. The holy father ought not to refuse to treat with the Italian Government, and to guarantee by such means the less difficult and more untrammelled exercise of his Catholic ministry.

It is reported that the theological universities of Palermo and of Milan, and others, have already replied, declaring the four above-named propositions not to be contrary to the faith.

Here the following dilemma presents itself: Either the Pope is silent, and by his silence abdicates the temporal power, or he excommunicates the theological faculties, and then—behold a schism! Except, indeed, the theological faculties should give to Italy and to the world the spectacle of the Montalemberts and the Rossinis, the spectacle of a retraction. This is the most probable.

We have no confidence, then, in such expedients, although we rejoice in all their manifestations, because they are so many steps onward in the great problem.

GERMANY.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING OF THE GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS SOCIETY.

Frankfort, Oct. 17, 1861.

A few days before the opening of the great meetings of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, of which Evangelical Christendom has given such a prompt and full report, other meetings were held at Hanover, which, although of less universal interest, nevertheless ought not to pass unnoticed by the readers of your journal. These were the annual sessions of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, some particulars of which will not, I think, be unacceptable to your readers.

On Tuesday, the 27th August, the capital of Hanover was as full of animation as on the eve of a national festival. At six P.M. the ringing of bells summoned the Christian inhabitants to one of the largest churches, which was soon filled. There was held a religious service, introductory to the festal meetings about to follow. The hymns, the prayers, and a fervent discourse by Dr. Ehrenfeuchter, Professor at the University of Gottingen (on John vi. 28, 29), were well adapted to excite gratitude towards God and hopeful anticipation of the coming meetings. On leaving the church the delegates from the auxiliary societies met to arrange the business of the succeeding days; they were to the number of 71, representing 44 auxiliary societies, exclusive of 28 other delegates, who sought the admission of newly-formed associations.

At ten P.M. a choral society, including nearly 200 members, met in front of the Hotel de Russie, where the majority of the members of the Central Committee were lodged, and sung several pieces with exquisite taste and skill. Thousands of listeners who filled the square, with one accord joined their voices to those of the singers, when the latter struck up the potent hymn of Luther, Eine feste burg ist unser Gott. All the surrounding neighbourhood re-echoed these strains of the Reformation, sung in the deep silence of the night.

Next morning, at three A.M., a procession of more than a thousand persons set out, at the sound of all the bells of the city, for the Market Church. Here the day was opened by another religious service, Prelate Dr. Zimmermann preaching from Heb. x. 32—34 a soul-stirring exhortation of the Apostle, which the orator applied to the sufferings of the Evangelical Christians who were the objects of the cares and labours of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society.

An hour afterwards the deliberations of the assembly commenced in another church. The President, Dr. Hoffman, after having offered up prayer, delivered a short speech, in which he expressed the thanks of the assembly to the King of Hanover, who had invited the society to his capital, saluted the delegates and friends present, and announced, with joy and gratitude towards God, the accession of the auxiliary societies of Austria, which for the first time had been authorised by their Government to unite themselves to the Gustavus-Adolphus Society. This was indeed an important fact—one of the numerous results of that new liberty of which the day has at last dawned on this great empire.

The Vice-President read a letter of the King of Hanover, in which he expressed his regret at not being able to be present at the meeting, and his warm desire for the success of the society. The Vice-President further announced that a goldsmith of the city, wishing to testify his joy at seeing Austrian delegates in the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, had presented a silver communion service designed for a church in that empire.

The Secretary of the Central Committee, Dr. Howard, of Leipzig, then read the annual report, from which we extract the following facts: In the course of the year, thirty-four new branch societies have been formed, and twenty-seven ladies' associations, making altogether the number of these last one hundred; on the other hand, the report announced the suppression of the auxiliary society of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. This is a fruit of that ultra-Lutheran fanaticism which has given that small country so unhappy a celebrity within the last few years. The report contained numerous facts, proving the existence of a growing interest on behalf of the society throughout the whole of Germany. The sum of 157,618 thalers has been absorbed in aid rendered to different Evangelical communities. The 550 communities who have shared in these donations are thus distributed in different countries: 1 in Africa, 4 in America, 2 in Belgium, 339 in Germany, 18 in France, 17 in Holland, 4 in Italy, 36 in Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia and Gallicie, 26 in Austria, 59 in Hungary, 32 in Poland, 1 in Portugal, 7 in Switzerland, 11 in Turkey, in the Danubian provinces, and in the East. The ladies' associations, the object of which is to supply certain necessities of the poor churches with which the society cannot occupy itself, have expended 15,627 thalers. By the instrumentality of the society, fourteen churches or chapels have been inaugurated, and seven more will be so during the course of the year. School-houses have been opened in ten communes. The building of twenty-two churches and eight schools has been undertaken. Notwithstanding this progress, however, the society is pressed by fresh necessities, of the most urgent character. Requests for aid have reached the Central Committee for the erection of 123 churches, 97 schools, and 61 houses for ministers. Amongst the churches which applied for aid to the society, there were 13 which have together a debt of 200,000 thalers, for building expenses.

The report concludes with an appropriate tribute to the memory of the deceased King of Prussia, who was the protector of the societies in his kingdom, and expresses the gratitude of the Central Committee to the present King, who has deigned to accept this inheritance from his brother.

After the reading of this report, which was listened to throughout with lively interest, permission was given to the delegates, and to those members who had communications or demands to make, to address the society. The first speaker was Pastor Meyer, President of the Consistory of the Lutheran Church at Paris, who described in a touching manner the wants and misery of the German Protestants, who live by thousands in that great city. Works of evangelization have been commenced and pursued in ten different quarters, but the need is still prodigious, and the work is prosecuted in the face of a deficit of 29,000 francs. (The Central Committee of Leipzig has allotted, for this year, 1,500 thalers for the German Mission at Paris.) M. Pastor Widmann, of Liesthalen, in Switzerland, expressed the salutations of the Swiss societies affiliated to those of Germany, and their thanks for a grant from the latter towards the new Protestant church built at Soleure (a canton until now entirely Catholic). This speaker called the attention of the society to the wants of the German church of Marseilles, for which the Central Committee designs 400 thalers. An Austrian delegate, Pastor Porubsky, of Vienna addressed the society, in the name of his country, with much emotion, and thanked it for all the good it had done during thirty years to the Protestants of that vast empire. He blessed God for the liberty now granted to them to unite with it. He sought the admission of two auxiliary societies, which had been formed in Austria, although he was constrained to confess that the Protestants of that country, in their poverty, will always have more to receive than to give. Another Austrian delegate, M. Teutsch, Director of the Gymnasium of Schaeßburg, expressed similar sentiments in the name of the Protestants of Transylvania. The President replied to these two speakers, with an emotion of which the whole assembly partook, and announced, at the same time, that he had just received, through the Austrian legation at Hanover, a telegraphic despatch, acquainting the society that his Majesty the Emperor of Austria had just made a large donation towards building an Evangelical church at Ferdinandsburg. On the motion of one of its members, the assembly resolved to forward immediately to the Emperor, by telegraph, the expression of its acknowledgments. To comprehend the feeling of joy which this incident caused throughout the assembly, one must be acquainted with the spirit of intolerance and oppression which has hitherto prevailed at the Court of Vienna, and the injurious attacks, on the part of the priests, to which the Emperor exposes himself by manifesting any interest in a Protestant church.

Interesting communications and pressing demands for help were laid before the society by M. Trümpelmann, Pastor of the German Church at Lyons; by Dr. Hurbau, of Hungary; by Pastor Coll, of Belgrade; by Prelate Zimmermann, of Darmstadt; by Director Silem, of Oberschützen, in Hungary, by Pastor Schmeidler, of Breslau; by M. Burger, Member of the Superior Consistory of Munich; by Pastor Neumeister, of Galatz; and by Pastor Frautenberger, who, in describing the poverty of the churches in Moravia, and the good that the society had done them, said that every stroke of the bells of those churches was an expression of gratitude to that society. The meeting was then addressed by the delegates of Königsberg, of Nuremberg, of Bremen, of Stettin, of Kiel, of Wiesbaden, &c.

The following day, like its predecessor, was opened by solemn worship in the Market Church; afterwards, at about eleven o'clock, the deliberations of the assembly were resumed.

Their first topic was the admission of the Austrian societies, which was decided by a unanimous vote. The President announced this result in touching language, expressing his ardent wishes on behalf of the Protestants of Austria. The whole assembly responded with heartiness to his Amen. Drs. Schenker, of Vienna, and Tentsch, of Schaeßburg, expressed, with visible emotion, the gratitude of the Protestants of Austria, who, by the mouth of these speakers, solemnly pledged themselves to form but one body with the Evangelical churches of Germany. This moment was a touching one for the assembly, which was moved even to tears.

The second object of these deliberations was the destination of a special and considerable donation, which the society grants every year to one of these poor churches which are the objects of its care, and towards which all the auxiliary societies contribute according to their power—a donation which this year amounted to 5,000 thalers. Three churches were severally proposed as recipients of this gift—those of Gruppe, in Prussia; Oels, in Moravia; and Uerdingen, in the province of the Rhine. The vote decided the point in favour of Gruppe, whither the telegraph immediately conveyed the news, and whence, too, it speedily brought back the thanks of the church in question.

After having elected some new members of the Central Committee, and discussed sundry propositions altogether of a practical nature, the assembly proceeded to consider the place of its meeting for the next year. Dr. Burger invited it to meet at Nuremberg, which he did with the authorisation of the King of Bavaria. The invitations of Lubeck and of Darmstadt were then withdrawn, and Nuremberg was chosen. This will be the first occasion of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society meeting in the kingdom of Bavaria, in which some years since the Protestant churches were not even authorised to receive assistance from its funds. Shortly before four o'clock the sitting was closed with a fervent prayer by the Superintendent-General Wiesmann. Several of the members of the society, in returning to their several countries, were invited to hold, in various cities, meetings, in which, in the midst of numerous auditors, they narrated what had taken place during these delightful days at Hanover. There is indeed ground to hope that precious Divine blessings have rested upon this general meeting of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society.

SKETCH OF THE CHARACTER AND CAREER OF THE LATE DR. STAHL.

Berlin, September, 1861.

The most important event which has happened during the last few months to the Established Church of Prussia is undoubtedly the removal of Dr. Stahl from the ranks of her party leaders. On the 10th of August he was unexpectedly called away by the Lord of Life and Death from the midst of the Church Militant. During his lifetime he stood forth as the most powerful opponent of the Low Church party in Germany; indeed, it was he who gave to his own party, which was otherwise rather deficient in men of eminent abilities, spiritual importance and unity; he raised the standard, which most of the others blindly followed. Now, at his grave, it becomes us, as Christians, to recall especially that point which we held in common with the deceased—viz., a living faith in the Saviour, to whom he clung with his whole heart. Allow me to give you a brief sketch of his remarkable life:—

Dr. Friedrich Julius Stahl was born of Jewish parents, in Munich, on the 16th of January, 1802, and originally bore the name of Schlesinger. When a youth he entered the Christian Church. In 1825 he took the degree of Doctor of Laws, and was appointed Professor at the University of Erlangen (Bavaria) in 1832. Already, at that time, he had attracted public attention by his parliamentary abilities in the Bavarian Diet; still more, however, by the publication of his "Rechtsgeschichte" (History of the Law). King Frederick William of Prussia, soon after his accession to the throne, in 1840, called him to the University of Berlin, where he laboured with the greatest success till his death. In the year 1848, when the infidel leaders of the revolution would have overthrown the whole Christian Church, as antiquated, he boldly stood forth in behalf of the Church, and took a leading part in the formation of the German Evangelical Kirchentag, of which he was for a long period President. He was also made a member of the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council of Prussia (the Evangelical Oberkirchenrath), and received the title of Oberconsistorialrath. This appointment, however, he resigned, because he found himself in a minority in his hostility to the Union (United Lutheran and Reformed Church of Prussia). By his lectures and his addresses as President of the Pastoral Conference of Berlin, as well as by his numerous writings, especially by his last book, "The Lutheran Church and the Union," and above all, by his personal character, he exercised great influence over his party; indeed, it was completely ruled by him.

A similar eminent and influential position he acquired as a political orator and debater in the Upper House of the Prussian Parliament (Herrenhaus); he guided in every question of difficulty. He was, without doubt, eminently fitted to be a party leader. In point of eloquence and logical acumen we have none in Germany who could ever be compared with him. Notwithstanding a total want of external and personal advantages, having an insignificant figure and rather a weak voice, there was a charm in the brilliancy of his diction, in which he eschewed all pathos and over-embellishment—in the force of his expression, which went immediately to the point—and above all, in the elevation and grandeur of his views, in which he treated even subordinate questions on the highest principles;—which irresistibly carried away the hearers, even those among them who did not share his views. It was his firm faith in the truth and in the triumph of his principles which gave his speeches this extraordinary power over the minds of his hearers. If the question should arise, how it was possible that a genius thus eminent could allow himself to be drawn into the service of so narrow-minded a party, it is necessary, in the first place, to dismiss the idea, rather prevalent at one time, that he acted from impure motives, and against his better judgment. Only those who were personally strangers to him, and had no opportunity of judging for themselves of the truth and purity of his character, could have so spoken of him. Much may be explained by the fact, that in churchmanship and statesmanship the peculiar character of the lawyer always predominated. He was accustomed to decide and judge every question according to strictly defined legal formularies. He was unable, therefore, to comprehend the great movements of the nations in favour of moral principles and convictions, which, above all things, cannot be measured and judged by legal standards; and on that account stand higher, and exercise a more powerful influence than that which can be determined upon merely legal principles. This is plainly shown in his relation to the United Church. The Lutheran and Reformed Churches, at the time of Luther and Calvin, presented many essential points of difference. This cannot be denied. In the course of centuries, however, both Churches, especially in the north of Germany, made such great approaches, that the differences as good as disappeared from the minds of the people, and could only be re-awakened by unnatural means. The right estimate of this fact was the motive for the formation in Prussia of the United Church. Dr. Stahl, in his book on the Union, almost entirely ignores the historical development of three centuries, which, it is true, cannot be demonstrated nor fixed by legal forms, but which is nevertheless a fact. He proceeds as though the confessions, which had their origin at the Reformation, in their various articles, and even all the consequences which his logical mind deduces from them (which, however, were never thought of in practical life), continued to express, at the present time, with the utmost exactness, the precise views of the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches. They do so, undoubtedly, in their great fundamental and essential truths, but not in every minor point. And thus Dr. Stahl finds, by his logical, abstract reasoning, that the two sister churches so far differ from each other, that to unite them is impossible. It does not concern him, that life, with all its rich indwelling aspirations, will not be bound and fettered by clauses.

On similar grounds Dr. Stahl entertained an instinctive aversion towards all movements which he feared might in their progress call in question "historical rights." His constant language, on all occasions, was, "the pernicious ideas of the revolution of 1789." To these pernicious ideas he traced nearly all that at the present time fills the minds of the nations with sublime thoughts, especially their desire for liberty. However justifiable in itself any movement might appear, the first question for Dr. Stahl was, Has it any connexion with the ideas of 1789; that is to say, the sacrifice of the sacred rights of the ruling powers, of the law of nations, and of all other well-established rights, to the will of the populace? And as soon as he discovered the most remote connexion of this kind, he opposed the movement with all his talent and energy. Dr. Stahl had no sympathy with a freely moving and independent national life. With him majority was always a wrong; "authority, not majority," was his motto. It is astonishing that a statesman of his abilities overlooked the plain truth, that each tendency and opinion which is the moving power of a whole age, possesses this power only by the certain measure of truth which it contains, notwithstanding, perhaps, many and grievous errors which accompany it. He might by an unbiassed examination of the principles of the revolution of 1789, which are certainly in part very detestable, have discovered the true justifiable cause of the movement—namely, the claim of every individual to free, unfettered development and to freedom of thought. It is impossible for a man successfully to combat a whole age, if his ideas are still those of an epoch long passed away, and for this reason Dr. Stahl's activity and influence will not have any lasting fruit. It is not yet seen who will be the leader of the Confessionalists. Dr. Hengstenberg, who, together with Dr. Stahl, formed the spiritual centre of that party, is totally deficient in the gift of eloquence. Most of the other prominent members, however distinguished they may be in their practical vocation as ministers of the Gospel, do not possess a high degree of scientific accomplishments. Perhaps an approximation of the two great orthodox parties in the Church of Prussia may soon take place; various symptoms and preparations for which event have lately appeared. Then the battle against infidelity and materialism may be carried on with united strength and energy.

RELIGIOUS LIFE AND THE RELIGIOUS REVIVAL IN GERMANY.

Bonn, Oct. 16, 1861.

The associations which the English mind forms with the German fatherland are not generally of revivals of religion, but the contrary. He thinks of a quiet, indifferent, speculative, tobacco-consuming population, among whom the Sabbath is desecrated, all positive belief annihilated, and the Bible itself, by their theories and speculations, reduced to a mass of wax. The people live in gardens, dine in hotels, have no carpets in their houses, speak in abstractions, rarely leave their country, and yet have no home. When the German appears among others in ethnographical pictures he is always in some kind of meditation, with a pipe in his mouth. He revels in the boundless domain of imagination; so that De Stael's delineation of the three great nationalities of modern civilisation has some grains of truth in it—to the English God has given the dominion of the sea, to the French that of the land, and to the Germans the air. So thinks the modern Englishman concerning the Teutonic races. He forgets the past in the present, and draws general conclusions from a particular premise. Yet Germany is, more than all other lands, the land of revivals. It was in this land that the first vigorous movements were made in the middle ages, both against civil and religious tyranny. Prague and Bohemia are associated historically with most glorious movements of the human mind. It was Luther and the fearless band of heroes that broke the power of the Papacy, and cleared the way for the religious and political revival of the sixteenth century. In the cold reign of stiff, starch, intolerant dogmatic orthodoxy, in the eighteenth century, the Pietists kept the flame of life still burning within the boundaries of the fatherland. They did not indeed, like Wesley and Whitfield, publicly assail the dead and corrupting dogmatism of the land; they wrought in silence and in quiet. The boundaries which the law gave them were narrow, but they used their opportunities well; they sought to unite the two principles of the conventicle and the Church, and they did so in their practice. They were ridiculed, they were slandered, but they held on in the course of well-doing, and to them Germany owes nearly as much as the English Church and the English nation owes to the Methodists or the Independents. Germany, too, gave birth to the Moravians, whose influence over their own country, and over the world, has been, and is still infinitely above their numbers. Their little brotherhoods formed centres of light in the land. They were not proselytisers, nor are they so now. Their mission was not enthusiastic, warlike, victorious. Their martyrs are not among the corrupt, persecuting Christians, but among the barbarians and the heathen. Their movements are marked by a bland, gentle, Quaker-like quietism, which seeks to convince you rather by example than by speech. They excited no commotions, awakened few jealousies, even in the Established Churches, and yet their influence over the Christian mind of Germany was both extensive and profound. Schleiermacher himself owed much to the Moravians. It is unjust, then, it is ungenerous in the highest degree, to associate only Rationalism and Sabbath-breaking with Germany. Their type of Christianity is not exactly the same as ours, but it may not be the less acceptable to God on that account. They have had far harder battles to fight than any other nation for the faith once delivered to the saints. The Deism of England, though fully as tolerated, was nothing to the Rationalism of Germany. It was confined to a few vigorous speculators, but it never either descended to the masses, nor influenced public opinion. Not so in Germany. It was sanctioned by a king, it was hailed by philosophy, it was preached from the pulpits, it was popularised among the masses of the population. Rationalism was dignified with a theology and a history. It flattered the thoughtful by appealing to the supremacy of reason, and it gained over the ignorant by making knowledge unimportant. The moral were entangled by its delineations of virtue and rectitude, while the vicious were delighted in the rationalistic message that there is neither hell, nor devil, nor judgment to come. The upper classes were naturally pleased with it. It flattered their pride, it was their own child, and its home was among them. They did not see (what the lower classes speedily found out, and were charmed with the discovery) that by relaxing the restraints of religion, it was dissolving the bonds of society, and preparing the way for an equal division of property. He that has no fear of God will not long continue to reverence his fellow-men. All authority, and order, and superiority of place, or power, or person, must go down in the deluge of universal infidelity. God and Christ and the future world influence the people no more; then how could you expect reverence for kings and earthly superiors? No, the thing is impossible, and this truth is confirmed by the theology, and progress, and downfall of Rationalism in Germany. Into this terrible furnace Christianity was thrown, bound hand and foot, like the three Hebrew children. Its history was a mythology, its miracles were tricks, its origin was of the earth earthy; and, like the other religions of the world, it was destined to perish and be forgotten. So wide were these destructive principles disseminated, that they had nearly become universal. It is a historical fact that, fifty years ago, among the many hundreds of theological students in Halle, you could not have found half-a-dozen who believed in the atonement and godhead of Christ! How different it is now in that celebrated seat of theology we all know, where Tholuck and many other faithful men surround the banner of the cross. There is no land in Europe where the revival of religion has made such progress during the last fifty years as in Germany. They have revered the faith of their fathers, they have fought and conquered in the bloodiest battle that ever was waged against the claims of the Son of God. Rationalism is dethroned. It is far from dead; but its power over the minds of the nation is gone; and as soon as the rationalistic pastors and professors die, they are generally succeeded by men of a more earnest and positive religion. This is the revival of the German Churches, and, so far as I know, there is nothing to compare with it in Christendom. It is true that the life of the Church is much less revived in Germany than her faith. But is not this quite natural? How could life flow in but through the channel of faith? The cross must be erected before the Spirit could draw men to it. It was so with ourselves. We passed through the same process of national and ecclesiastical purification. Did love and joy and missionary fervour abound in England when the doctrines of Arminianism and passive obedience ruled in the Church? Was not the overthrow of Moderatism in the Church of Scotland necessary before she could receive and develop the treasures which the Saviour had in store for her? It is and must be the same in Germany and in England and the whole world, for "without faith it is impossible to please God." Life without faith is impossible. Therefore the first thing for a nation or a family, or an individual, is faith as it is written, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." God is now saying to Germany, "Believe," and we need not fear but in due time the fruits of faith will follow. Life will flow in through the channel of the Apostolical faith, and works of faith and labours of love will surely and necessarily accompany it. There are many questions connected with the doctrine of revivals which are keenly discussed in Germany, and which bring out quite different phases of truth from those we are accustomed to meet with in England. Elberfeld has become the centre of an extensive literature, and the voice of the Orphan-house, like a cry among the rocks, has awakened a multitude of sleeping echoes. What is revival? How does it stand related to theology? To the Bible? To prophecy? To the nationalities of the world? To the ministry of angels? and to the moral and psychological nature of man? We shall have occasion, in discussing the Orphan-house of Elberfeld, to touch more or less upon most of these questions. W. G.

TURKEY.

MEETING ON BEHALF OF THE PROTESTANT COMMUNITY IN TURKEY.

We have been requested to publish the following statement:—

The financial affairs of the Protestant civil community of Turkey having been for some time in an embarrassed condition, a committee was recently appointed by its representatives to consider in what way a remedy could be found, and especially to endeavour, by a full statement of the circumstances, to enlist the sympathies of Protestant Christians of all parts of the world. With this view, the committee requested the presence in the Protestant Chancery of all the Protestant chaplains, missionaries, and ministers in Constantinople, to hear a statement of the facts. The meeting was held on September 2nd, when the following parties were present to meet the Vekeel, or representative, Stepan Effendi, and the committee—viz.: Rev. Charles B. Gribble, Chaplain to the British Embassy; Rev. Dr. Riggs, American Board; Rev. Alexander Thomson, Agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society; Rev. Alexander Tomory, Free Church of Scotland; Rev. W. Marcusohn, Church of Scotland; Rev. Mr. Weakly, Church Missionary Society; Rev. Mr. Tien and Mr. E. Williams, Society for the Propagation of the Gospel; Mr. P. O. Flaherty, Free Church of Scotland, and the members of the native committee, including the Rev. Pastor Simon Eutujan.

Having called upon the Rev. C. B. Gribble to open the proceedings with prayer, the Vekeel briefly addressed the meeting in Armenian, the Secretary translating his remarks to the following effect.

"Rev. Sirs,—We have invited you here to-day for the consideration of a matter of great importance; and I feel much obliged to each one of you for your kind acceptance of our invitation. The matter to be proposed to your consideration is the present financial state of the Chancery of the native Protestant community, over which I preside. I will, gentlemen, briefly explain how it is that, although this Chancery is wholly a civil establishment, yet the sole reason for its existence is the profession of the Protestant religion by subjects of this empire. On account of the particular form of Government exercised in this country, the professors of each different religion must be represented at the Sublime Porte by a separate president, otherwise they cannot enjoy any civil or religious right. According to this principle of the Turkish Government, the Protestant Chancery stands here to represent the Protestant religion, and to see that all professors of that religion, of whatever nationality they may be, fully enjoy all the religious and civil rights and privileges bestowed by the Government. Fifteen years ago no one could profess Protestantism without incurring open persecution from the chiefs of the Rayah communities, whether the Greek or Armenian Patriarch, or the Jewish Rabbi; now it is not so. Anybody may now profess Evangelical Christianity, and enjoy full protection. Our Chancery spends, for its four officers, about 60,000 piastres annually; and, as the committee appointed to inquire into the financial state of the Chancery will represent to you, our community can at present hardly contribute the half of this sum. For the other half, which is absolutely necessary in order to maintain the Chancery, we have no other resource to look to but the Protestant Christian churches—our co-religionists—who are, we believe, greatly interested in the Protestant movement going on in this country. We have, therefore, invited you here as representatives of almost the whole Protestant Christian world; and being confident that you will sympathise with our difficulties, and be interested in the matter, we shall now present the facts of the case to your kind consideration."

The Secretary was then directed to read the statement prepared by the committee, the substance of which may be briefly expressed as follows: "The office of the Protestant Vekesl, or president, is the only regular and recognised means of communication between the Turkish Government and the Protestant community; the only means by which a Protestant can be protected in case of molestation or encroachment on his rights and privileges; in a word, but for its existence, nobody could in this land profess Evangelical Christianity, and enjoy the civil and religious privileges granted by the Sultan to his Christian subjects. This institution, however, unavoidably requires, and that with the strictest economy, an annual expenditure of 60,000 piastres, or less than 300l. The Protestant community, numbering at present rather more than 7,000 souls; of whom 1,500 or 1,600 may be liable to assessment, cannot, in its present circumstances, possibly raise the whole of the required revenue; because, first, they are generally poor. Secondly, they have, as a civil community, a great deal to expend for the transaction of their local civil affairs, in more than 120 places, which was unnecessary till their separation from their old communities. Again, they have a great deal to expend for religious and educational purposes, in which they are always prone to be considerably more interested. For instance, in Marash the Protestant community contributed, in 1860, 11,500 piastres for religious purposes alone, while for the Chancery they sent only 2,500 piastres. Besides these expenses, the people have to pay three different taxes to the Government, the amount of which is two or three times more than all their civil and religious and educational expenses put together. And once more, those who are indirectly persecuted by being deprived of employment, or being forsaken by their friends, for their adherence to Protestantism, must necessarily depend for help on the charity of their brethren—a not unrequent occurrence. Taking into consideration these and other similar causes, we think that the inadequate support extended to the Chancery does not arise from any reluctance on the part of our people to perform their duty, but from their present circumstances, a change of which would soon enable them to support this establishment for themselves. Now, however, with a balance of 25,000 piastres already against the office, and with the certainty that the end of the year will exhibit a deficiency of 30,000 more, the Board of Representatives of the Protestant community is placed in a condition of painful embarrassment.

"Now, gentlemen, in coming to you to ask your advice in these, our difficulties, we feel convinced that you take as much interest in the existence and good standing of this Chancery as we ourselves do. And as Protestantism, in this country, still requires missionary sympathy and political protection, and as the Chancery is the means not only of protecting the personal interests of Protestants, but also Protestantism itself, we think it claims the earnest consideration and support of all who are desirous of seeing that religion take a firm stand in this great empire. We think the societies you represent will not refuse to help, and specially if they know that to have Protestantism properly represented at the Sublime Porte will greatly facilitate all missionary movements here. We believe that from year to year the revenue of the coumunity will increase, and not very long hence it will be large enough to keep the Vekeel office in thorough working order. But, in the meantime, what is to be done? Can we look to you for the making up of the amount required? or if not, what advice would you offer in a matter which places us in such perplexity?"

It was then suggested that, as the substance of the facts now communicated had been stated by members of the American Mission some months ago to several of the missionaries present, and a short statement of them furnished for the purpose of being transmitted to several of the missionary societies in Britain and America, some report might possibly be now given of the result of that movement. In reply, the Rev. Mr. Weakly stated that on the personal application of Dr. Pfander, the committee of the Church Missionary Society had agreed to give 50*l.*, on condition that the London Jews' Society, the Turkish Missions-Aid Society, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, should agree to give a similar sum; that application had accordingly been made to each of those societies, but that the only answer received had been from the Turkish Missions-Aid Society, and was to the effect that they were prepared to sanction the application of 50*l.* to this object out of the funds they transmitted to Turkey, provided such a course should be approved of by the American missionaries there. As it did not appear that the matter had ever been formally proposed to the American Mission, it was arranged that Dr. Riggs should take steps for that purpose, while the Rev. Mr. Gribble undertook to apply to the committee of the London Jews' Society, in the absence of any missionary from that body now in this city. Mr. Tien reported that the Rev. Mr. Curtis had applied twice to the committee of the Propagation Society, but without receiving any reply; while Mr. Tomory stated that the Free Church Jewish Committee had given 10*l.* last year, and were prepared to make a similar grant for this year.

Mr. Thomson then stated that though, from the peculiar constitution of Bible societies, it had not been thought advisable to apply to either the British and Foreign, or to the American Bible Society, for aid towards this object, he was sure it would command the sympathies of all the true friends of those institutions. He himself had always regarded the Protestant Chancery with peculiar interest, not only for the sake of his excellent friend, the Vekeel, who presided over it, but as the material embodiment of the religious liberty which, through God's blessing, had been achieved for this country, chiefly through the influence of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, but perhaps scarcely less so through the high moral character of the Protestant Armenians themselves, and the self-sacrificing constancy with which many of them had submitted to pecuniary losses in defence of their principles. To allow it to collapse would be to relinquish nearly all that had been gained by twenty years of labour, suffering, and representation to the Government, would reduce the Protestant Rayahs to their former bondage under ecclesiastical authorities, and deprive them of the only recognised medium of intercourse with the Government in any case of persecution that might unhappily arise in time to come. On all these grounds, and further, as it admitted accessions from every class and race of the subjects of the empire, whether originally Armenians, Greeks, Jews, or of any other race, he thought the maintenance of the civil organization of the Protestant community an object in which every society was interested which was engaged in seeking the evangelization of this country.

Mr. O'Flaherty and Mr. Tomory followed. The latter illustrated the practical value of the Chancery, by relating how it had shielded more than one Jewish inquirer from being immured in the madhouse by the Spanish Hacham-Bashi, or Chief Rabbi.

After some conversation, the following resolution was moved by the Rev. Alexander Thomson, seconded by the Rev. C. B. Gribble, and unanimously agreed to, viz.:—

"This meeting, having heard the statement of the committee of the Protestant civil community, and being convinced that the maintenance of the Protestant Chancery is essential to the protection of the civil and religious rights and privileges of the Protestants of Turkey, as well as satisfied that it is conducted with all possible economy,

"Resolved, that the brethren here present do recommend it to the cordial support of the various religious bodies with which they are connected, and that until such time as the native Protestants shall be in circumstances to meet its expenses without foreign aid.

Evangelical Alliance.

THE ALLIANCE IN THE COLONIES.

FORMATION OF A BRANCH OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION IN BRISBANE.

We are requested by the Secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance to insert the following letter and address:—

TO THE SECRETARIES OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Brisbane, Queensland, July 11, 1861.

Gentlemen,—I have great pleasure in conveying to you the information that on June 24th a public meeting was held in the Congregational Church, of which I am the minister, which was attended by Christians of all denominations, for the purpose of forming in Brisbane a Branch of the Evangelical Alliance.

The following resolutions were adopted:—

1. That it is desirable to form a Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, to be called the Brisbane Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, for promoting objects similar to those of the parent society.

2. That all Christians holding the doctrinal views expressed in the basis of the British Organization of the Alliance may become members of this branch.

3. That for the purpose of meeting expenses which may be incurred, each member be expected to subscribe 5s. per annum; that a committee be formed; and that Rev. E. Griffith be secretary and treasurer.

It was thought by us all that there might be some communication which we might periodically have from you, which would give us an account of the work of the Lord in the world, especially on the Continent. Will you inform me if such expectation is correct?

The week of special prayer was observed by us here, and a very interesting united prayer-meeting held in the Wesleyan Church. From that time to this fortnightly or monthly prayer-meetings have been held alternately in the various churches for united prayer. The sweet feeling induced by these has led to the desire to establish some more organised association amongst us, and hence the meeting at which the branch was established.

We trust much good will be seen to result from this union; we pray that it may be so; and whilst we ask your society to recognise our desire to belong to the Alliance, we also earnestly seek that in your various meetings for prayer the colonies should largely share in supplication.

I remain, Gentlemen,

Yours in Christian bonds,

(Signed) EDWARD GRIFFITH, Secretary.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN BRETHREN IN THE COLONIES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Dear Friends,—We doubt not that you, in common with others, will read the above letter with interest, as giving another instance of the observance of the week of special prayer at the commencement of the year, and a statement of the blessed result of that observance in the establishment of periodical meetings for united prayer. We have every reason to believe that the fervent supplications which were offered during the week of prayer continue in the same manner to be prolonged in many places in different parts of the world.

We desire to call your attention to the other result referred to, of the united prayer-meetings held at Brisbane. Our brethren there, feeling the pleasantness and profit of the union of Christians at these meetings, were led to form a branch of the Evangelical Alliance, which will at once enable them the more early to arrange for co-operation at any future time, and bring them into closer intercourse with their fellow-Christians in other parts of the world. We earnestly commend this example to you and to others, and we trust that, for their own spiritual benefit, and for the strengthening of the bond which unites the real people of God, many may be induced to unite themselves in a similar organization.

We beg to remain, dear friends, yours faithfully in Christ Jesus,

W. CARDALL, } Secretaries of the J. DAVIS, } Evangelical Alliance.
H. SCHMETTAU, Foreign Secretary.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION.

We learn that the following are the arrangements for the Annual Conference of the Evangelical Alliance:—

Wednesday, Nov. 20.—The Conference will meet in the Large Hall at Freemasons' Hall, at ten o'clock. With a short adjournment for refreshment between one and two, it will sit till five o'clock, when those who desire to do so will dine together. At seven tea and coffee will be served, and the remainder of the evening will be given to discussing the subjects treated by the Conference, with a view to their disposal by the newly-appointed Council on the next day.

Thursday, Nov. 21.—The new Council will meet at eleven o'clock, in Adam-street; and in the evening a public meeting will be held to supply information of the principal matters transacted at Geneva.

The following are among the subjects which will come under consideration at the several meetings:—

1. Communications from Germany and Switzerland, with a view to combined action for the better observance of the Lord's-day on the Continent, in consequence of the paper of Professor Godet, of Neuchâtel, with a view to mutual advice and encouragement in regard to the observance of the Lord's-day.

2. Religious liberty on the Continent, and the steps taken at Geneva in regard to Spain, Russia, Sweden, &c., &c. Communications from the Geneva Committee, relative to deputations to Madrid, Granada, &c., concerning the Spanish prisoners.

3. The American war and slavery, and the steps taken at Geneva on the subject.

4. The Geneva resolutions on Syria and the Holy Land, and the steps being taken in furtherance of the object.

5. The steps taken for the New Year's Prayer for 1862 in England, and subsequently at Geneva, and communications from Australia on the same subject.

6. Preaching in the languages of Europe during the London Exhibition of 1862, to receive report, and consider steps to be taken.

7. State and prospects of the Evangelical Alliance; to consider the duties devolving on the British brethren in consequence of the Geneva Conference.

The moment is propitious for deepening, by the Divine blessing, the universally favourable impression made by the Geneva Conference, and we learn that the Committee are, therefore, anxious to secure the presence of the chief friends of the Alliance.

BELGIAN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Witchampton Rectory, Wimborne,
Dorset, Oct. 2, 1861.

Can you give a corner in Evangelical Christendom for the following?—

The cause of God is encouraging in certain parts of Belgium, and especially at Mons and the surrounding densely-populated country towards France. The people are inclined to Protestantism, and there is life in many of the large villages amongst those who are seeking for Christ.

The two great weapons in Belgium for Protestantism is the glorious work of the Bible Society, which since 1835 has circulated one million and a quarter of the sacred Scriptures, and also the Belgian Evangelical Society, now having 17 stations, with men of God preaching Christ at each station, besides 15 schools. The Society is much in want of funds, and I do not know any way of more furthering the Gospel than in supporting the Society. If any of your readers are inclined to aid this cause, I shall be happy to receive subscriptions to be added to that I am collecting to send to the Belgian Evangelical Society.—Yours very truly,

CARR J. GLYN.

PASSAGLIA, GUIZOT, AND THE POPE.

THE abbés are not all in favour of the temporal power of the Pope. Whatever opinion they may have as to its lawfulness and desirableness, some of them question the expediency, or at least the necessity, of it just now. There is the Abbé Döllinger, of Munich, who has been compelled very much to eat his words wherein he did not advocate the temporal power. There is the Abbé Guettée, in France, who has very consistently and earnestly lifted up his voice against many abuses for a number of years. And there is the Abbé Passaglia, in Italy, we may say, under the Pope's own roof, adding his voice to those who demand that the Bishop of Rome, "orbis et urbis," should be content with his bishopric, that the spiritual empire which he claims over the world and outside its limits should be sufficient for him. There are others, in different ranks of the clergy, who lean the same way, and have spoken in favour of the renunciation of the temporal kingdom. To these, however, his holiness has turned a deaf ear, and hitherto has failed to give any intimation that he means to abandon his worldly dominions. The government of souls is not enough for him; the care of all the churches does not fill up the measure of his ability or of his ambition; and having all this, he sighs after the beggarly supplement of a province or two in Italy. It can hardly be the fear of poverty which creates this longing after the things that are seen and temporal. The many millions who call themselves the children of the holy Father surely have ability and reverence and love enough to maintain him comfortably. Christ said to the Jews, "Show me a penny," and they showed it to Him. And he who claims to be Christ's vicar upon earth has only to say to every one of his flock, "Give me a penny," and it would be given him. A bull from the Vatican, or a canon from a Council-General, could impose upon every Roman Catholic in the world the obligation to give one penny per annum towards the support of the Pope. Or each province could be compelled to give as many pence as there are Catholics in it. In this way there would be provided, say one million pounds a-year, which would be a tolerably good salary even for the Pope, and would enable him to keep about him a respectable establishment. But it is not merely a money question: it is more. For it is boasted that the papal throne is the oldest secular government in Europe; some have said the oldest in the world. This boast is of course an empty one. It must be remembered that the monarchy is not hereditary, but elective, and that its succession has been quite as much interfered with, by various causes, as other governments have been by change of dynasties. Egbert was the first sole monarch of England in A.D. 827, about the very time when the Popes were metamorphosed into civil rulers, and considerably before they were honoured with a coronation. There have been periods when there was no Pope at all, and periods when two or three rivals contested the dignity, and periods when the Popes have had no seat at Rome nor even in Italy. But even if it be conceded, this plea of antiquity, reaching back a thousand years, is worthless. The Pope claims to be a temporal ruler, by Divine right, and this is what has to be proved; and if it is proved, it matters not how old or how new the dignity is. Let the Pope or his friends produce their charter under the great seal of heaven, and the world will be silent. This has not been done, and cannot be done, and therefore men may question the divinity of the institution. The Jesuitical argument, that the temporal is involved in the spiritual, is an idle fallacy, because it would prove that the Pope ought to be sole ruler and king of the whole world. This consequence was seen and avowed in those palmy days when the Popes took upon themselves to set up and to put down kings as they thought proper, and when nations and whole continents were disposed of by wholesale. The allegiance of a kingdom was transferred by a papal edict from one king to another, and in other forms this supremacy over the world and its rulers was asserted. And why not? It was assumed that God had said to the Pope what He said to Jeremiah, "See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant." In the last century, even, that scandalous forgery called the donation of Constantine was appealed to as a fulfilment of the words just recited.* The writer we allude to goes into the reasons for and against the temporal power, and winds up with the following astounding declaration: "Therefore, our opinion stands confirmed by the suffrage of the old canonists, that Christ the Lord conferred upon Peter and his successors all power in heaven, and at the same time on earth, from which the authority of the Popes over secular princes emanated—that is, of crowning emperors, of investing kings, of judging and deciding in their controversies, as we have abundantly taught above."† This impious doctrine has never been disavowed, and we are asked to believe that although Christ said, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth," He gave the same power to the Pope of Rome. In accordance with this teaching, the canonists declare that the Pope is judge of all, and recognises no superior, that he has jurisdiction over the emperor, that he transferred the empire from the Greeks to the Germans, and from the Franks to the Germans, that he rightly gave the islands and territories of India to the King of Spain, that his jurisdiction extends over all the globe and its inhabitants, that he has the same power over temporal things as Christ had, that he is under no law, that he can release others from obligations to positive law, and sometimes even from oaths, that he can dispose of all Church livings, that he can do all things, and has the fulness of power—that, in fact, the whole world is his territory, and that all ought to obey him, because he presides over all the sun sees, from its rising to its setting. Such are the monstrous assertions of papal law and its interpreters.

Happily, the universal kingship of the Pope is no longer within the range of possibility, although the claim to a limited territory is insisted upon. Even this restricted claim is strongly opposed, and it is thought that as he has given up so much of the world, he may give up the few square miles he holds in Italy, or may remove and take possession of some other part of his lawful but extensive territories. The world is all his own, and surely he can find some spot more lovely and paradisaical than Rome itself, where he can sit on his throne, and set up his court. Or he may do as many emperors and kings have done before him—lay aside his crown altogether. In the meantime, the subject is discussed, and although its settlement is long delayed, the end will certainly come. The French troops surround his holiness with armed ranks of friendly bayonets, and he can still thunder from the Vatican, and say, "Am I not a King?" Men tell us, not that Italy preserves Pio Nono at Rome, not that the Roman citizens rally round him, and declare they will not let him go; but that the pious and upright Louis Napoleon, the Church's eldest son, is the trueegis of his protection. We very much doubt this, and recent occurrences have deepened our conviction that the Pope owes the most to the Church's eldest daughter. It is possible we may be wrong, and that we are not giving honour to whom honour is due. Possibly we may be right. Of one thing we are convinced, and that is, that it is not the clamours of the papal clergy, nor the devotion of the Queen of Spain, which perpetuates this chronic disturbance of the peace of Europe—this unending source of discord and strife.

Father Passaglia has not been forgotten in these remarks. This man is a Roman Catholic of extreme doctrinal opinions. He is a Jesuit. He was the chosen organ for propounding and explaining the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. The work he wrote on this subject is, or rather, we should say, his works on this subject are, authoritative, and almost official. Their author was encouraged in his labours and complimented on his success by the Pope himself. It was Passaglia, too, upon whom devolved the honour of defending the new doctrine after its publication, and of removing the natural scruples which some good Catholics felt about it. In a word, he has been the herald and the champion, the prophet and the apostle, of the Immaculate Conception, a doctrine which its admirers said would suddenly bring "peace on earth, and goodwill among men." They said this literally, because they believed that Mary would be so pleased with her new honour, that she would at once vindicate her character as the destroyer of all heresies, and the silencer of all disputes. Altars and images to our Lady of the Immaculate Conception sprang up everywhere as if by magic, and papal poets began to compose their millennial songs. The long years of famine were past, and the years of plenty were at hand. The Church had come to the borders of the wilderness, and was about to enter its land of promise. The cherubim had put up their flaming swords, and paradise was once more open to the Church on earth.

Seven short years have passed away since then; but they must have sufficed to dissipate the pleasant visions in which Pio Nono, Father Passaglia, &c., indulged. To the Pope sorrow has come upon sorrow, and now he finds himself shut up to a corner of his dominions, and hemmed in on all sides by those who would deprive him of what remains, but for the foreign bayonets before referred to. Seven years! and Father Passaglia finds himself compelled to flee from Rome, to take shelter amid the Pope's opposers, and availing himself of a free press to publish opinions which the Pope condemns. The Jesuit may have renounced none of his theological dogmas; no one says he has; but he has succumbed to what we call "the inexorable logic of facts;" and, like an honest man, he declares his convictions.

Three of his publications are now before us—"The Duty of the Roman Bishop and Chief Pontiff to Reside at Rome, as the Metropolis of the Italian Kingdom;" "On Excommunication: a Warning by a Catholic Priest;" and his celebrated pamphlet, "For the Italian Cause, to the Catholic Bishops, by a Catholic Priest." The first and second are written in Italian, the third in Latin, but it has been translated into Italian and French. The one for the Italian cause is that to which our remarks will be chiefly restricted. The one on the duty of the Pope to reside at Rome proceeds on the very natural principle that he ought not to be non-resident, and establishes the views advocated by appeals to canon law, the declarations of competent authorities, &c. The one on excommunication argues the questions which have naturally arisen on that subject since Pio Nono fulminated his excommunication against Victor Emmanuel, as he would have done against Louis Napoleon, if he had dared. Several points are laid down and defended. For example: "The Roman pontiffs themselves solemnly affirm that they can be sometimes drawn into error in the use of ecclesiastical pains and censures; and add, moreover, that the inculpated have the right to appeal against their sentence, and that it is, at the same time, the strict duty of the pontifical authority to hear and to satisfy appeals so made." Another of the points is, "that it is solemnly declared by the Popes, that, considering the fallibility of their judgment in decreeing it, it may happen either that he is excommunicated before the Church, who is not excommunicated before God, or that he is excommunicated before God, who is not excommunicated before the Church." The abbé declares that, "considering the original rights of the Church, and the proper nature of excommunication, excommunication neither can nor ought to be decreed, except in matters purely spiritual." The conclusion to which he arrives is this: "That those censures and excommunications which tend to public injury, when launched against the multitude, or when some one is incriminated so powerful as to be able to draw the multitude into his plans, so that a schism may be produced; such censures and excommunications ought to be reputed null, and as of right revoked, even if absolution has not been requested on account of them." If this be so, he is justified in saying: "How greatly it misbecomes the Divine authority of the Apostolic ministry, in confirmation of the need and occasion for excommunications and other ecclesiastical penalties, to add threatenings and predictions of temporal chastisements; and how far they go from the truth who esteem that God must necessarily, forced as it were by the voice and judgment of His vicar on earth, cause the spiritual damages inflicted by Him through His censures to be followed also by worldly damages."

It is somewhat novel to hear a Jesuit father proclaiming such doctrines as these while he yet maintains that "the authority from which ecclesiastical censures and penalties are derived is supernatural and immediately Divine." But the fact is, that he sees clearly enough that some limits must be imposed even upon the quodcumque ligaveris super terram—"whatever thou shalt bind on earth"—which he quotes; that in truth quodcumque "whatever" does not mean everything. But if it be strange to hear a Jesuit reason in this way, it is not much, if at all less so, to find him taking advantage of the liberty of the press, publishing books which have been condemned at Rome itself, and publishing others, without submitting them to the censors appointed by Leo X. in a general council. Such a man, we may hope, "is not far from the kingdom of heaven."

Father Passaglia has gone further than this, and in his work, "Pro Causa Italica," he has calmly and deliberately undertaken to tender the Pope some very wholesome advice. In his preface, he justifies his claim to state his opinion as a Catholic priest. Of the state of Italy he says: "A great number of Italians, openly or tacitly, are already separated from their mother (the Church), who thus finds herself bereft of a chosen group: a great part of the clergy are in disaccord with the laity; almost all the pastors are separated from their flock; and the pastor of pastors himself, the successor of St. Peter, the august vicar of Christ upon earth, rages by censures and the thunders of excommunication against the kingdom of Italy and Italian society. One would suppose that, of the double power of binding and loosing, the bishops have only kept that of binding, so unanimously do they reprove, reject, and execrate that which all the Italians, of every age and condition, desire with ardour, and carry out with courage." He does not ascribe this to the defection of the Italians from the faith, nor to their indifference to their pastors, nor to their contempt for the supreme spiritual power of the Pope, nor to their wish to rob the Church of her liberty. He maintains that unity is perilled by the course which the Italian bishops have thus far pursued, whereas that unity ought to be maintained by them by all possible means, because for this the episcopate was instituted. No good can come of the obstinate endeavour to arrest the progress of the Italian revolution, and to destroy what it has accomplished. The views of the author are set forth and confirmed by many extracts from the Fathers, the application of which is easy. The Pope and his allies have not acted wisely in the matter of the late excommunication, which may irritate rather than correct, and provoke a schism rather than establish unity. It is in vain to plead the injustice which has trodden down the lawful rights of so many princes, and the impiety which has deprived the Pope of his states, and threatened his liberty and independence. As for the first, it is not a question for the decision of the Church, which is called upon to obey "the powers that be." In any case, the justice or injustice of the Italian kingdom is an open question, and therefore the Catholic bishops, with the Bishop of Rome at their head, ought not to provoke and persecute the kingdom of Italy, and to neglect nothing for its destruction. They ought then to obey the counsels of reason rather than blind passion. Meanwhile, "one name alone rings joyously from the Alps to Sicily—that of Victor Emmanuel: provinces, cities, and mansions rely on one sole and supreme government; almost all the nation is represented in parliament, whence salutary laws emanate and provide for the common weal; taxes are paid to one single government, and from all points rises the unanimous prayer, that Italy may be politically united and strong in its independence. If, like Christ, we ask whose image and superscription the money bears, all make the same response — VICTOR EMANUEL. A single army watches over public peace, and guards the frontiers. England, France, and Sweden, Denmark, Holland, America, Portugal, and other generous nations, salute the newborn realm of Italy as a new star, the omen of happy events: they congratulate it, send their ambassadors, receive those of it, and contract alliances with it, which by the law of nations are inviolable and sacred. The conduct of these states is in harmony with the old laws and practice of the Church; but have Pio Nono and the Italian bishops faithfully followed their own rule? The priests of Poland, Hungary, and France, have known better. But the bishops cannot be expected to change in Italy till the Pope himself shall withdraw his opposition, and consent to give the country peace. Will he do this? His many declarations seem to say no. These, however, are in their nature material, terrestrial, human, and temporal, as the kingdom he defends is terrestrial, human, and temporal." The arguments on which they rest are human, and therefore, however often and solemnly repealed, they may change: indeed, "we have the firm conviction that we shall soon see the pontifical ministry radiant as gold by its condescension, as we have seen it hitherto radiant as silver by its constancy."

Father Passaglia next examines the oaths by which the Pope is bound to transmit his domain intact to his successors, and imagines circumstances to the force of which he may be compelled to yield, or be justified in yielding. "It is of supreme necessity," he says, "to determine Pius IX., in the interests of the Church and of society, to discharge himself for the future of all political anxiety for the Roman States, by accepting immediately and freely another equal advantage and one of greater importance;" that is, "a free Church in a free State." Many things will prevent this, although the theory of a civil government for the Pope is "not ancient, but modern, not heavenly, but earthly, not spiritual, but carnal." The Pope ought to be satisfied with the free exercise of his apostolical functions, and the dignity, honour, and independence which would be guaranteed him.

Such is the meagre outline of this remarkable book, which is equally distinguished for its honesty, transparency, and learning. In its aim and intention it strangely contrasts with the work of M. Guizot, "The Christian Church and Society in 1861." Yet M. Guizot is not a Jesuit, but a Protestant; and as such imperils his reputation among his co-religionists, by defending Catholic interests, and by advocating the temporal power of the Pope. He is not the apologist of the Papal régime, the errors and the crimes of which he knows too well; but he is the apologist of legal rights and vested interests; and rather than see the Pope lose them, he would see Italy what it was. We are astonished and confounded by the strain in which he writes, for we cannot understand how any man, who is a minister of religion, can claim as such to be a temporal ruler. M. Guizot knows that the Papacy has stood in the way of liberty and progress, that it has suppressed free thought, and speech, and action, wherever it had the power, that it has excluded the Gospel from the Papal States with a blind persistency, and that in every way it has been injurious to man's present and future welfare. But the Pope occupies a throne, and an ancient throne; he rules, nominally at least, over a certain territory, and his temporal dignity seems to heighten his spiritual majesty. These things may be true, but there are considerations on the other side so many and so weighty, that they ought not to prevail. We regard the old Protestant battling for that power which has always sought the ruin of his Church as an eccentricity and an anomaly which nothing can explain but the worship of an idea, call it legitimacy, or what we will. Still we wonder at it, far more than at Athanasius Coquerel's advocacy of the Pope's forced restoration to his throne, because the old Rationalist seems on principle to oppose all that is generally wished for by Evangelical Christians. The truth appears to be, that the farther men are from the Gospel, the nearer they come together. But M. Guizot is not a patron of heresy and false doctrine. He is, we repeat, the slave of an idea, and is hunting after a chimæra. How often has the Pope met every appeal to his humanity, his charity, and his common sense, by his instinctive "non possumus," the confession of weakness and the death knell of all hope from that quarter? No; he cannot fall in with modern ideas; he cannot acquiesce in the movements which are on foot for better constituting society, and for better governing men. He reminds us of the preacher whose sermons have driven all his congregation away, while he remains in the pulpit, to the exclusion of a better man. The pulpit is his, and he will abide by it, forgetting that it was not erected for him, but for the flock. So the Pope has wearied, and disgusted, and driven away well-nigh all his subjects. He has shown himself unable to rule them, and they have left him. And yet he remains, gathering about himself the tattered robes of royalty, holding his head aloft as the only lawful king, and uttering his mingled edicts and execrations. What right has he to do this? A legal right, the right of custom, the right of actual possession, say his friends. But others say that morally and religiously, and in the interests of men and of national peace, unity, and progress, he has no right. We love law and we love order, and where such interests are not at stake, we should tremble to ask the removal of a ruler. But the Italians say it must be so, and the question is, where is the fountain of civil power? If with the people, what they gave they can take away. In any case, M. Guizot has, in those parts of his book which relate to the civil affairs of the Papacy, broached opinions which will not be accepted by Protestantism, which will startle the Italians and their friends, and which are due to a false and erroneous view of the true state of the question. What a contrast to Father Passaglia! that the man who has all his life had an open Bible, and been active in the study of religious as well as political questions, who has himself seen changes in the dynasty of his country, and has at such times submitted to "the powers that be," should now occupy such a position! How much more we admire the man who after long years among the fathers, and involved in Papal errors and superstitions, comes to the light on such a great practical question, and on all grounds, temporal, moral, and religious, advocates concession! How true are the words of One whom both confess, "many who are first shall be last, and those who are last shall be first!"

ECCLESIASTICAL JUDGMENTS AND SYNODS OF THE CHURCH.*

ALTHOUGH "Archbishop Punch" is seriously and severely rated by the Record for poking fun at "Archbishop Lushington," the substance of the affair is not altogether so hollow against the "inveterate joker." Whether Punch be indeed sitting in the chair of the scorner, and scoffing at those who uphold the Bible, is a question that may be pretermitted; but it is certain that others than contributors to his whimsical columns have been very much impressed with the nature of the judgment which Dr. Lushington has been "coerced" to deliver. A bishop accuses a clergyman of false doctrine—that is, of doctrine opposed to the Prayer-book, and a fortiori, opposed to the Bible. A civilian hears the case, and decides, not that the doctrine impeached is erroneous in a theological sense, but that it is legally erroneous, as being contrariant to the Prayer-book and articles of religion. This distinction, we learn, “makes the mild buffoonery of Punch evaporate into sheer stupidity.” It may have that particular chemical or comical effect for aught we know or care; but we think there must be some egregious fallacy in the notion that Dr. Lushington, being appealed to, not as a theologian, but as a “legal judge,” could, if he were “a Mohammedan or Pagan,” be competent to decide “as an interpreter of the laws of the Church,” whether such or such doctrines be or be not in accordance with the laws of the Church Established—that is, with her doctrines. This question is one of deep interest and importance, quite apart from the fun of Punch, or the solemnity of the Record; and we have reason to know that, in its various aspects, it is now occupying the thoughts of many persons of very opposite theological opinions. In the Gorham case the main question was whether a clergyman holding certain opinions about baptism was to be deprived of his civil rights—to be prevented from entering on his temporal benefice because he held those opinions. The judges decided, not that the opinions were true, or false, or right, or wrong, but that men who held the Gorhamite views had not been heretofore, and should not, therefore, now, be ineligible to benefices. Dr. Lushington, in the present case, seems obliged to go a shade further than was done, or necessary to be done, in the Gorham case; and this is the chief point of interest before us. The views of Mr. Heath, whether right or wrong, theologically or legally, are novel views. It cannot be shown that clergymen holding such views have heretofore been either admitted, notwithstanding, to benefices, or excluded from benefices, on account thereof. The judge is, therefore, de novo, compelled to decide whether Mr. Heath's views be or be not contrariant to the articles of religion. And in arriving at his decision he is coerced to put his own “judicial construction” upon those articles. That judicial construction involves an inevitable appeal to theology; but as the “legal judge” is by hypothesis debarred from referring either to the Bible or to the opinions of divines, to ascertain the truth or falsehood of doctrine, he finds himself in a very peculiar fix. His business as a “legal judge” is to ascertain “the plain grammatical meaning of the articles;” and his difficulty is, that he cannot ascertain the plain grammatical meaning of theological terms and propositions without ascertaining their theological sense. A Mohammedan, Pagan, Jew, or Papist, would be in a most remarkable posture, no doubt, as judge of such a cause. And Dr. Lushington himself was evidently not quite comfortably at ease while he was endeavouring to reconcile what seem to us contradictions.

Before, however, we proceed to sift this matter farther, we must premise that, as thoroughgoing Protestants, we do not deny, but, on the contrary, assert and maintain, the perfect competence of any spiritually-enlightened layman, or any jury of such, to decide any question of doctrine whatever. In the court of heaven and of sound reason there is no difference between Cleric and Laic in such respects, whatever there be in the Court of Rome. And in the present case, we will add that our judgment and sympathies go entirely with the Bishop of Winchester and Dr. Lushington, and against the foolish and extravagant absurdities of Mr. Heath. But we think it impossible for any unprejudiced mind to read Dr. Lushington's own words in this important judgment without perceiving the enormous difficulty or impracticability of separating between the law and the truth or error of doctrine in causes of this character. In other words, we believe it impossible in such a case to decide judicially without pronouncing theologically. And we think it unlikely that a Jew, or Papist, or unbeliever, could arrive at a decision as to what is the true legal intent of Church and State in the Eleventh Article, on the Justification of Man, so correctly as would an enlightened Protestant like Dr. Lushington. The fallacy seems to lie in this, that doctrinal articles of religion are termed the "Laws of the Church," and the "Laws of the Land" therefore, because the Church is by law established. But their nature is, that they are theological formula, and can only be theologically expounded after all. The Church is a Reformed Protestant Church; the State has established the Church as such; the Articles of Religion are intended to express grand Bible truths, and deliberate, if mainly implied, protests against Romish and other errors and perversions of the truth. And to pretend to expound such documents in a dry legal way, without any reference to these grand fundamental principles, proves not only a logical failure, as the present case, we think, demonstrates, but might in other hands involve no slight peril to liberty and truth!

Dr. Lushington first elaborately and carefully defines the duty of the court to be "the ascertainment of the plain grammatical meaning of the Book of Common Prayer and the Articles." The construction which the court has to put on those documents must be "a judicial construction." He notes the fact that there are a multitude of most learned works, by most eminent divines, as to the meaning of the Articles. But the court, he says, cannot venture to make much use of such assistance, "because such works very naturally and properly refer constantly to the Holy Scriptures." And any authority, however high, even if supported by appropriate scriptural quotations, could be of no avail, "unless such authority concurred with the plain grammatical meaning of the Articles," in which case it would, we presume, be superfluous.

How, then, is this plain grammatical meaning to be arrived at? Let us follow this learned judge in his own application of the above principles to the "judicial construction" of the Eleventh Article, and see. He says: "The first difficulty he had to encounter was that in ascertaining the plain grammatical meaning of the Article, he had to affix a meaning to words which had not, by any commanding authority, had any precise meaning affixed to them, and which words might, if Bishop Burnet were right, have been used in the New Testament in different senses!" He was then, by the necessity of the case, coerced to give his own construction of the Eleventh Article of Religion." Proceeding hereon, he gives his own notions of the terms, "justification" and "faith," as well as his views of the object of faith—viz., the merits of the Redeemer, and (to some extent) of the nature of faith. We have no fault to find with Dr. Lushington's views on these points. We mainly agree with him. But then we are compelled to think that if no commanding authority has affixed any precise legal meaning to these and similar terms, and if no reference is to be made to the Holy Scriptures to ascertain their true meaning, and if every judge can assume the right to put his own judicial construction upon such terms, such judicial construction differs in no whit from an arbitrary theological interpretation of their meaning. Justification by the merits of Christ, for instance, might be held by some other judge to be justification by those merits infused into the justified person, thus establishing a Romish sense of the term. Justification by faith only seems, in Dr. Lushington's opinion, to mean simply that faith is indispensable to justification. In the opinion of others it means that and more. It means that faith is not merely the indispensable, but the exclusive instrument of justification.

It is unnecessary to pursue the subject further. That a clergyman should hold and print the extravagancies which Mr. Heath has at various times published is wonderful. That he should for fifteen years have been the pastor of Leigh Richmond's parish of Brading is lamentable. He is now deprived, and has appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, until whose final decision is pronounced it would, perhaps, not be well to say more. An isolated prosecution like this, here and there, illustrates rather than redresses the existing condition of the Established Church. But if that existing condition exhibits so many anomalies, and excites so much uneasiness, where is the remedy to be found? Practical men like the Bishop of Ripon would go on ignoring what they cannot help, and labouring in the vast field of practical usefulness before them. Better to bear the evils that we have than fly to others that we know not of. Some, ashamed of the sight of such blemishes and inconsistencies—the sight of parties so diverse in opinion, all subscribing the same articles, and assenting and consenting to all and everything in the Prayer-book in very different senses, are groping about for a revision, and for new terms of subscription. But revision in the Evangelical direction seems to most men at present a hopeless imagination. And any change in the terms of subscription, it is generally thought, would, instead of being more stringent, relax still further, and open still wider, if that be possible, the bonds, which, as it is, appear to have so little binding power for good. Some, again, would revive synodical action as the great panacea; but others fervently deprecate any such attempt, foreseeing, as they think, that clerical assemblies of the kind would tend, in the first instance, to undue clerical assumption; and probably, in the second instance, by revolting the liberal spirit of the age, lead to the overthrow of the union between Church and State. Meanwhile, of all the ideas we have seen broached as the true and proper help for the need of the Church, the most singular seems that now put forth by the Bishop of Cork, in his late charge to his clergy. His lordship, after very fairly and ably stating the right of the Irish Church to a share in any revived synodical action of the United Church of England and Ireland, passes on to consider the particular instance of the 29th Canon, relative to sponsors at baptism, which has created so much stir and discussion in the Church, to the bewilderment of ignorant or indifferent laymen. The institution of godfathers and godmothers has become practically rather a queer thing. We have heard of coal porters being hired out of the street for half-a-crown to discharge the office. We have heard of one lady being godmother to every child in a parish. We have heard of parents refusing to allow any to be godfathers or godmothers to their children except themselves; and we know it is the most well-settled, and ancient, and universal law of the Church, that parents shall not be permitted to be godparents to their own children at all. This is the law of England, independently of Canon 29; and no alteration of Canon 29 can affect the law of the land, except it be altered by Parliament. All this is tolerably well ascertained, and generally known; but it is not so patent universally what is the radical or paramount value of this question. The Bishop of Cork invests the subject with new dignity and importance. He is of opinion that “the old Puritan error, long since exploded,” of imagining a child to be entitled to baptism, on the ground of its descent from believing parents, has been greatly checked by the operation of the law requiring godparents at baptism, “though, even now, that error is far too common.” Consequently, a relaxation of the law would tend to foster and extend that “error.” The evil tendency, theologically, of this “error” the Bishop feels and states strongly. Our space permits us not at present to enter into an examination of his lordship’s views on this point. Our impression is, that the existence and the operation of the supposed erroneous opinion, and of the check presumed to have been given to it by the law of sponsors, is, to a large extent, imaginary. But, however this may be, we stand amazed at the notions of the Bishop of Cork relative to the true use and value of sponsors, and the possibility of their discharging the functions of so many modern instrumentalities as he thinks have been substituted for, and imperfectly fulfil, while they supersede them. The Bishop says: “I believe that, if we would diligently teach the people the true nature of the Church—the true nature of baptism—the true use and value of sponsors—we should soon see an end of present difficulties.” [Surely his lordship is rather sanguine; but he goes on.] “It is because the sponsorial office has been allowed to become a form that these difficulties have arisen! (Sic). In reality what are schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, Sunday-school teachers, lay assistants, parochial visitors, and all the machinery by which, in our days, Christian charity seeks to cope with the mass of ignorance and vice in our parishes, but means of supplying the defect of real sponsors—means in many respects less perfect, and certainly less gracious and venerable? When I see so much Christian activity every day taking new directions, and (for want of better guidance) breaking out into even irregular exertion, I cannot think that, if the case were properly put before the people, it would be impossible to restore the life of our ancient and regular institutions."

Earnestness in a cause is generally respectable, but it is difficult to repress a smile or an allusion to the old fable of the currier and his leather when we read a passage like this. If history could show us any period when godfathers and godmothers had effectively discharged the functions of schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, and Sunday-school teachers, and parochial visitors, and such like varied and multiplied, though irregular instrumentalities, it would be something to the purpose. But even if history could do us this service, we are doubtful of the modern realisation of the Bishop of Cork's ecclesiastical aspirations. We doubt if baptismal sponsors will readily come to bulk so vastly in the eye of this generation. And at a time when the very foundations of the faith are boldly assailed by ordained and learned clergymen, when the Bible is stigmatised as effete, and the existence of a personal God sceptically questioned, and the doubt insidiously insinuated throughout society, we scarcely think it desirable to expend very much energy upon the task of so resuscitating and reinvigorating the ancient, venerable, and gracious, but still human, institution of godfathers and godmothers. With Mr. Disraeli, however, coming forward as the champion of Church principles and institutions, it is difficult and dangerous to say what may or may not ensue. Scepticism and ecclesiasticism have played into each other's hands ere now, and may do so again.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE : ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Our readers will find elsewhere an interesting report of the proceedings of the Fifteenth Annual Conference of the Evangelical Alliance. Those who were present at the meetings must have had forcibly impressed upon their attention the fact, that the work of the Alliance is not all or chiefly to be accomplished on the public platform, but by the more quiet agencies which it can set in motion. Large numbers were not drawn together to hear speeches and a report of the proceedings of the past year, although these included some things which were both interesting and important. The truth is, that the constituents of the Alliance had been already made acquainted, through the press, with the principal transactions of the period. Perhaps it was also felt that, as it regards the future, plans and arrangements were better left to the committees and managers. Sir Culling E. Eardley showed, however, that the influence and activity of the Alliance was not to be measured by the numbers at a meeting. The illustrations he gave of the power of the body are striking and encouraging. There were the Bulgarian bishops and clergy appealing to the Alliance in their troubles. There was Louis Kossuth appealing to the Alliance on behalf of an institution in Hungary. There was the beneficial action of the Alliance in Sweden; and every one remembered the recent successful gatherings at Geneva, notwithstanding the hostility of the Rationalists. All this is very satisfactory, and holds out the hope that in time to come the same power will be successfully exerted for good. The movement in favour of a better observance of the Lord's-day is one which will no doubt increase in vigour and extent, and has already been warmly taken up. The subject was a very appropriate one for the Conference to consider. As for "Essays and Reviews," the matter is a difficult and a delicate one, and could scarcely be discussed in a manner to please everybody. Yet all must have admired the manly Christian utterances which the subject called forth. Still more delicate and difficult was the subject of Church-rates, and the utmost that the Alliance could do was to recommend mutual forbearance and charity in its discussion.

Mr. Birks took a sober and moderate view of the course which the Alliance has pursued, and of the success which it has attained. He was probably right. His remarks on the union for prayer in the first week of the year were encouraging and truthful, and the same may be said of his remarks on the dangers and defence of Evangelical doctrine. What he said of the Church-rate question and the bicentenary of the Act of Uniformity is suggestive, and shows how difficult a course lies before us in the coming year. Mr. Finch, also, was unfortunately right in telling us that the Alliance usually ended its financial year in debt. We say unfortunately, for it ought not so to be.

The resolution for united prayer in the first week of 1862 is one which was appropriately urged by Mr. Dobson; and we do hope his appeals, and those of Mr. Jenkinson, will have effect. The address of Mr. Watson brought out the interesting fact that the out-door meeting of 1,500 to 2,000 working men at Geneva during the Alliance sittings was the first of the kind since the Reformation.

Dr. Davis's resolution on "Essays and Reviews" is a weighty and important document; not simply nor so much in relation to that book, as to the style of teaching which it represents, and which is becoming more and more general. The decided and outspoken manner in which this resolution was moved, and in which Major-General Alexander seconded it, showed how deep the feeling is upon the subject, and that such doctrines will not be disseminated without the most energetic opposition.

The Sabbath question was very well introduced by Mr. Thornton, and the resolution on the subject is a good one. The next, on Church-rates, moved by Mr. Minton, was adopted in a slightly modified form; and of this we are not sorry, because of the delicacy required by the prevailing sensitiveness on that much-debated matter. Such questions cannot always be avoided; but they must be handled very tenderly by the Evangelical Alliance.

The resolution respecting Spain was every way proper and praiseworthy, and we trust will not remain a dead letter. It well deserved the prominence which was given to it. Neither do we think the message to Geneva other than a graceful expression of brotherly affection and gratitude.

A practical matter was brought forward by Professor Hoppus, in relation to the Great Exhibition of the coming year. We hope the arrangements will be wisely made, and we believe that if they are made wisely, much good may result from the kind of religious services contemplated.

The resolution of sympathy with Dr. Steane, in his affliction, was due to him; because the Alliance has drawn upon his energies of heart and intellect for many years. How faithfully and how earnestly, how wisely and well, he has served the cause, probably none of us will ever fully know. His absence was marked; for it was the first time he had not been present at the meetings. We are quite sure the motion introduced by Mr. Henderson, in regard to him, will gratify and comfort him, as it shows he is kindly remembered.

With reference to the public meeting we have not much to say. Sir Culling Eardley made—what he always makes—an interesting and instructive speech on matters connected with the Alliance, which no one understands better than himself. Mr. Birks made a speech for the times, and both he and Dr. Winslow very well advocated the claims of the Alliance, which is, after all, not supported as it ought to be. The statements made by Mr. Dallas, respecting Spain, were no doubt new to some, and were listened to with deep interest, because they came from one who had himself seen, in their dungeon, the victims of Popish persecution. It is Popery, more than Spain, which ought to be accused in this matter; for Spain is but carrying out principles of that cruel and sanguinary canon law which requires secular princes to imprison and punish heretics.

From Spain it was but natural to turn to Italy, upon which subject Signor Ferretti could speak as one who knows the heart of the people. It is our conviction that Italy does not take hold upon Christian people as it ought in this matter of evangelizing its inhabitants; but we do hope that there will be a rapid growth in our benevolent endeavours to help those who are labouring to disseminate the Gospel in a country which has for so many ages been bound hand and foot, heart and soul, by the Papacy.

And now we must refer our readers to our report of the meetings of the Alliance. We earnestly intreat them not to regard it as independent of their sympathy, prayers, and aid; to sustain it and to encourage it in its work of faith and labour of love, and to wish it God-speed in its undertakings. We could find much to moralise upon in connexion with the Conference, both as to the past, the present, and the future, but we refrain; and we conclude by saying to all who belong to this most excellent and valuable institution, "Be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labours are not in vain in the Lord."

HEBREW ACCENTUATION. *

ONE portion of Hebrew scholarship which is very much neglected is the accentual system of the Masorites. Our Hebrew grammars are generally defective on this point, not excepting the grammar of Gesenius. A list of the accents is, indeed, usually given, and they are divided into disjunctive and conjunctive, of greater or lesser power; but as nothing more is said concerning them, the student is liable to mistake their uses, or to give over noticing them at all. A list of between thirty and forty names is not easily remembered, when it is felt to be, after all, of little or no use.

We, therefore, hail most cordially the appearance of Mr. Davidson's little volume, which supplies the defect alluded to, and which is worthy of being put into the hand of Hebrew students as a text-book on this portion of their studies. It is fully up to the scholarship of the day on the subject it treats of; and we have rarely read, with so much pleasure and profit, a work of a similar nature, on what some might at first think a tedious subject, but which is both interesting and useful.

The accents, in common with the rest of Masoretic punctuation, have met with various treatment at different times. The great scholars that arose at and immediately after the Reformation, were accustomed to view them as of Divine origin, to trace them back, at the least, to the time of Ezra, the reputed arranger of the Canon and of all other matters that needed to be set on a fixed basis.

But although this view had the support of numerous Jewish writers, and, in fact, was almost undisputed until the time of Elias Levita, whose views were adopted con amore by the celebrated Cappellus, recent investigations have now set at rest this long-vexed question, and the invention of the present system of punctuation is considered by all competent scholars to have been a work completed not earlier than the sixth century after Christ, and more probably not much earlier than the ninth or tenth centuries.

Notwithstanding, however, their comparatively modern invention, the points are of the highest possible value. The scholars to whom the common title of Masorites has been given, were men of the highest eminence, of great impartiality, and who committed to writing the traditional method of reading their ancient language. The various modes of reading Hebrew without points, proposed by Parkhurst and others, have long since been exploded, the Masoretic punctuation alone agreeing with the cognate Arabic, Ethiopic, Syriac, and Chaldee.

* Outlines of Hebrew Accentuation, Prose and Poetical. By the Rev. A. B. DAVIDSON, M.A. London: Williams and Norgate. 1861.

ספר תהלים Liber Psalmorum Hebraicus. Textum Masorethicum accuratius quam adhuc factum est expressit, brevem de accentibus metricis institutionem præmisit, notas criticas adjecit S. BARR. Præfatus est Fr. DELITZSCH. Lipsiæ: Dörffling et Franks. 1861.

It would appear from the Phœnician inscriptions which have been brought to light that even the vowel letters, which used to be called the matres lectionis, were not generally used even so late as the sixth century before Christ. It is very probable, therefore, that they were not used at all by Moses and the early writers of the Old Testament, and that the examples we meet with now in the MSS. of their writings, as well as the frequent use of these vowel letters in the later Hebrew works, are owing to attempts of early scholars to make the sacred writings more easily read.

The accentuation is a child of the same age as the vowel punctuation. In the earliest MS. known to exist—namely, that in Odessa of the year 916, described by the Hebrew scholar Pinner in 1845—the accents are found side by side with the vowels, though in this case both the vocalization and accentuation are considerably different from those in common use. Nor, indeed, is there need of any such testimony, as the fact that the vowels are frequently modified by the accents is quite enough to prove this point.

The study of the accentual system has not been neglected by many great scholars in Germany—though Mr. Davidson's work is the only English treatise on the subject that is generally available. The American scholar Nordheimer has also treated of the accents in his grammar, but not very fully. A very interesting sketch of the literature of the subject is given in Mr. Davidson's introduction.

Hebrew accents have various uses. They are used to mark the tone syllable of each word; they are used as signs of logical interpunctuation, like our points; they are used sometimes for emphasis, in some measure serving in the place of our italics; and they are used as rhythmical signs to guide the voice in declamation or cantillation. The last-named use is the key to all the rest. We are not to look on them as an embodiment of the Temple music, though, no doubt, here and there they may possibly preserve some fragments of it. As Mr. Davidson says, the accentual system "is simply the synagogal delivery, the traditional living utterance of the reader, seized and photographed, and handed down to us as a precious monument of ancient pulpit oratory. It is possible that the public readers and expounders may have preserved in the poetic books some fragments of the former melodies of the Temple; their ears may have caught up strains which their memories still retained across the long captivity; and these might still, as familiar sounds, ever and naturally find expression in their reading, and the declamation thus pass over into perfect music. That something of this kind is not unlikely, is evident from the very peculiar accentuation of some of the Psalms, which are very different in many respects from the other poetic books—Job and Proverbs—in the fine play of the smaller accents, and the frequent employment of double or even triple accents on the same word; but a complete music, or a music exclusively, we have not even here."

One great principle should be ever borne in mind by the student in noticing the accents, and that is their relativity. The accents mark the relation of the words in a verse to one another, but extend no farther. The greatest distinguisher, Silluq, does not necessarily, like our full point, break the connexion with the verse succeeding. Few verses, too, in the Hebrew consist only of one clause, and nearly all are divisible into two portions, generally distinguishable in prose by the occurrence of Athnach. Every word is marked with an accent, either conjunctive or disjunctive, but the former unites it only to the word immediately following, while the latter separates it from the word or clause immediately succeeding. Then, again, much will depend on the nature of the distinctive accent, whether the word marked with it be subordinated only to the next word following or to the entire clause.

For this purpose the distinctive accents are divided into several classes, fancifully styled emperors, kings, princes, and servants, to express the various relations they hold to one another.

We cannot, of course, go into this matter at all, but must refer to Mr. Davidson's treatise, which we would very earnestly recommend to all Hebrew students as a sine quâ non, if they desire to understand fully their Hebrew Bibles.

In conclusion, we would give just an instance or two of the use of the accents. As expressing emphasis, we would cite the very first verse of the Bible, Gen. i. 1.,

בְּרֵאשִׁית בָּרָא אֱלֹהִים אֶת הַשָּׁמַיִם וְאֶת הָאָרֶץ

where, in order to give prominence to the Divine authorship of the creation, the word "God" is marked with a great distinctive (athnach).

So in the instance given by Mr. Davidson—namely, Hosea vi. 10.,

בְּבֵית יִשְׂרָאֵל רָאִיתִי שַׁעֲרֹתֶיהָ

(we have omitted the points, with the exception of the diacritic points and accents). Mr. Davidson renders it correctly—

"'In the house of Israel!

"'I have seen—a horrible thing.'

"The greatest pause is at Israel, where there is an intentional break, to keep Israel, with all its Divine environment, and all the history which the name suggested, as long as possible before the mind. Then another pretty great pause at seen, best represented by a dash, as if the speaker hesitated and trembled to utter the last word—a horrible thing."

The parallelism, too, is often spoiled by a neglect of the accent. Thus Mr. Davidson gives the instance of Isaiah i. 21, thus rendered and punctuated in our Authorised Version: "How is the faithful city become an harlot! it was full of judgment; righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers." The full sense and meaning of the passage is better seen by regarding the accents as Mr. Davidson does:—

"How has become an harlot,

"The city that was faithful!

"Full of judgment, righteousness lodging in her;

"But now murderers."

The accentuation followed here is that of Michaelis' edition of the Hebrew Bible. Unfortunately, the accentuation has not been carefully looked to in the editions in general use, and the Masoretic rules have been often set at naught.

And this brings us very briefly to speak of the second work, the title of which we have prefixed to this article—namely, Baer's edition of the Hebrew Psalter. No commentator has paid more attention to the accents than Delitzsch, in his Commentary on the Psalms, and this little book is intended as a companion to his valuable commentary. The very name of Seligman Baer, so well known for his Hebraistic researches, is enough to recommend the edition. Unquestionably, it is the most accurate Hebrew Psalter. Some few errata there are to be found, and they are corrected at the end of the book; others may possibly yet be noticed. But, taking it as a whole, it is a most valuable edition, and it would be well if it were to be generally used in the place of the many inaccurate Psalters which abound. Though we do not mean to assert that all the injunctions of the Masorites are worth being carried out, yet it is well to have an edition in which they have been attended to. We have partially collated this Psalter ourselves, and can testify to its accuracy, and it is besides adorned with critical notes and with a valuable sketch of the Masoretic accentual system.

Foreign Intelligence.

ALTHOUGH Pio Nono is still supported by French bayonets, the divorce between the Emperor and the Ultramontane clergy seems to be complete. Of this various indications are given in our French correspondence, one of the most marked being the proceedings of the Minister of the Interior, with reference to the Societies of St. Vincent de Paul. The question at issue, as to whether these societies are to any extent political in their character, is one of fact, upon which, it will be observed, our correspondent gives his testimony, that at "every election the candidates of St. Vincent de Paul are well known." M. Guizot's book has, as might have been expected, occasioned great regret to that eminent man's friends and admirers.

Our Italian intelligence refers chiefly to the spread of Christian literature by the friends of Protestantism at Naples and Florence. The gift of a Bible to a sailor two years ago, by one of the Madiai, has resulted in an Evangelical movement in the island of Elba.

The movements of the Roman Catholic prelates in Germany form the subject of the first half of our Frankfort correspondent's letter. He also gives some interesting particulars of the anniversary of the well-known Protestant institutions, for benevolent purposes, at Kaiserwerth. In another communication, an eye-witness of the revival at Elberfeld describes that remarkable awakening, with especial reference to the opposition which it has called forth. It will be seen that the movement still continues.

From Vienna we have an address, the substance of which is inserted, delivered by Dr. Lipsius, the newly-appointed professor at the faculty of Protestant theology in that city, on occasion of the anniversary of the death of Gustavus-Adolphus. Standing where he did, the Professor was able to appreciate, as few elsewhere could do, the triumphs of religious liberty in the Austrian empire.

A letter from the banks of the Tigris affords some interesting information as to the efforts, during the last twelve months, of Dr. Gregory Wortabet, and of the openings in prospect among the different classes of Arabs.

Among our other communications will be found a letter from the United States, reporting the proceedings of the annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. At the close of our correspondent's letter are some remarks on the civil war; and we are informed there is a growing conviction that the real question at issue between the North and the South is freedom or despotism.

FRANCE.

France, November, 1861.

GREAT DISCUSSIONS UPON THE CIRCULAR RELATIVE TO THE SOCIETIES OF ST. VINCENT DE PAUL.

You have already mentioned, at the end of my preceding letter (p. 648), the official document in which the Minister of the Interior requires the societies or conferences of St. Vincent de Paul to conform themselves to the common law, by demanding a previous authorization. The same circular blames the institution of a central committee and of provincial councils, affirming that such an organization is not at all necessary to the exercise of charity.

This ministerial production—let us do justice to M. de Persigny by saying it—is written in a moderate and becoming style. "Religious associations for beneficent objects," says the Minister, "and particularly the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, recommend themselves to public respect by the virtues which they practise. The numerous conferences of St. Vincent de Paul, founded with the object of distributing relief to the indigent, of instructing and promoting the morality of the working classes, pursue, with remarkable zeal, an end which cannot be too much commended. This is beneficence giving the hand to religion. . . . And not only do these societies contribute largely to the relief and moral elevation of the poorer classes; they further tend to maintain, amongst the higher classes, a generous order of sentiments, making men of fortune and of leisure comprehend the mission of the rich amongst those who suffer."

All this is very good and very flattering. But M. de Persigny censures the provincial councils, which, under the appearance of encouraging particular efforts, absorb by degrees all the resources, and employ the societies of each province as instruments of an idea foreign to beneficence. He attacks still more plain the superior committee, which, recruiting itself by its own sole authority, governs the local societies, of which it makes a sort of secret association, &c.

In reality, what is it that has awakened the solicitude of the Government? It is that the affiliated societies of St. Vincent de Paul are principally composed of men who, docile at the word of command given by the priests and the Legitimist party, entertain sentiments hostile to the dynasty of Napoleon III. Moreover, so long as the Emperor and the priests walked in the same path, these men were useful auxiliaries. But ever since the campaign of Italy this good understanding has ceased. The clergy have become the most ardent adversaries of the Imperial authority, and, naturally, the members of the Association of St. Vincent de Paul follow the impulse given by their ecclesiastical chiefs. Whilst giving food and clothing to the poor, they labour to form a large army of devoted clients, who, by the aid of universal suffrage, may exert a considerable influence upon the elections of deputies to the legislative body, and on those of municipal councillors. This is the political danger. The Government proposes to itself, in some sort, to decapitate this vast institution, by depriving it of its chiefs and its centre of action. It approves the exercise of charity, but it will not permit that charity should serve as a mask for the conspiracies and attacks of anti-Napoleonic agitators.

This circular has filled, for a month past, the columns of the French press. Three opinions have been put forth upon the subject. First, the Jesuits and the Legitimists have loudly complained—pretending that this step is an insult to the clergy, a gratuitous act of suspicion as regards the most respectable of the laity, a misfortune as respects the poor, who will lose their benefactors at the beginning of the winter, &c. Secondly, several liberal writers in the Journal des Débats and other daily papers, without partaking the wrath of the clerical faction, have expressed their regret at these new restrictions imposed upon the right of association, and the liberty of citizens. Lastly, the Siccle and the Opinion Nationale, the organs of the democratic party, have warmly applauded the circular of M. de Persigny, affirming that it is a just application of the common law. Since the law interdicts all other associations, even those which concern themselves only with industry and literature, unless they obtain a previous authorisation, they ask why the Roman priests should have the privilege of association, without the permission of the Government.

I will not discuss these different opinions. I will make only two brief remarks. The first relates to the spirit of the Romish Church. Every one knows that the high dignitaries of that Church, beginning with the Pope himself, hold ideas and maxims entirely opposed to the principles of 1789—to the laws and to the wants of modern civilization. This is a radical antagonism. Hence it follows that all the measures which weaken the authority of the clerical party, in civil affairs, are favourably received by the majority of the nation. Whose is the fault? Is it not that of the priests themselves? Were they but sincerely reconciled to the fundamental institutions of our age, like the pastors of the Protestant communions, their charitable works, and even their political activity, would be accepted with gratitude. My second observation relates to the conduct of the priests in France within the last ten years. When their influence preponderated in the decisions of the Government, they demanded, with lively importunity, coercive laws against their adversaries. It is to them and to their friends that we must ascribe all the ordinances which have restrained the freedom of the press, the various associations, the colportage of books, primary instruction, &c. Now the arms which they placed in the hands of the civil power are turned against themselves. Patere legem quam fecisti. There is here a retributive justice, which is approved by the human conscience. Let the ministers of Rome learn at length to demand liberty for all, to respect the rights of all; let them admit equality in the exercise of liberty; let them consent to see Protestants, philosophers, and even infidels, possess and exercise rights equivalent to their own, in such sort that a materialist, for example, may speak, write, convene meetings, and form associations at Paris as freely as in London; then the Popish clergy will have, for their own free action, solid guarantees. But if they strike their antagonists, they will be struck in their own turn.

PAMPHLETS OF THE BISHOPS OF ORLEANS AND OF NISMES, AND REPLY OF THE MINISTER OF WORSHIP.

The members of the French episcopate cannot be silent at so grave a crisis. Two bishops have published pamphlets which have merited special attention: the one is M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans; the other, M. Plantier, Bishop of Nismes.

M. Dupanloup is doubly distinguished by his character and by his literary talents. He brings to all discussions an elevated mind, an upright heart, a noble and eloquent speech. We render willing homage to his eminent qualities. His last publication is worthy of him. He has pleaded the cause of the societies of St. Vincent de Paul as well as it could be pleaded. But the most skilful of advocates has no power to change the nature of things, or matters of fact. M. Dupanloup labours to establish that the associations of St. Vincent de Paul have never mixed themselves up with political quarrels; he invokes in their favour the letter of their regulations. This is a poor equivocation. Doubtless the association abstains from politics in their official relations, but it by no means abstains from them in the committee-rooms of its members: at every election the candidates of St. Vincent de Paul are well known. M. Dupanloup then shows that the common right is that there is no real right for any one. This is true; but we have already said that the responsibility of this common servitude falls back upon the Romanist party itself, which has constantly solicited measures of repression. In concluding his pamphlet, M. Dupanloup says, "I appeal from it to the Emperor, better informed." But it is very probable that the Emperor will not contradict M. de Persigny. He knows perfectly well that the Pope and the Jesuits have become his most implacable enemies.

As to the Bishop of Nismes, M. Plantier, he is infinitely beneath M. Dupanloup. This prelate is an ignorant, ill-conditioned fanatic, who substitutes gross invectives for arguments, and imagines he has triumphed when he has thrown dirt in the face of his adversaries. How comes it that the grave men of the French episcopate have not imposed upon him silence? His letter to the Minister of Public Instruction is a monument of passion, and almost of delirium. M. Plantier dares to say that the sceptical and revolutionary journals (for which read all the Liberal journals) have never had the sense of shame, and that these contemptible pamphleteers resemble the Jews, who preferred Barabbas to Jesus! He adds that the Minister has been guilty of great impropriety in putting in the same category the Association of St. Vincent de Paul and that of Freemasonry; for "these two kinds of association," says he, "are as opposed the one to the other as heaven is to hell!" All the rest of the letter is in the same tone.

M. Rouland, Minister of Public Instruction and of Worship, has addressed to M. Plantier a well-merited reply. He says that the letter of the Bishop of Nismes appears to him much to be regretted, and that warmth of conviction exempts no one from the observance of propriety and the rules of moderation. "It was useless," he adds, "to make use of the most bitter expressions against an act emanating from a Minister of the Emperor. . . . I intreat you, Monseigneur, to abstain henceforth from addressing to me, on our religious or political affairs, letters in which I should have to deplore further insinuations and intemperate assertions." Finally, he reproves the bishop for having allowed himself to be carried beyond the limits of wisdom and of charity. The reprimand is severe for the prelate, but it is perfectly just, and France has applauded this act of firmness.

HOSTILITIES BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND THE ROMISH EPISCOPATE.

You may perceive, from the preceding details, that the period of the cordial understanding between the councillors of the State and the dignitaries of the Papal Church has decidedly passed away. War is openly declared. How will it terminate? God alone knows. Intestine hostilities sometimes take one form, and sometimes another. At Besançon, the Cardinal Archbishop Mathieu has had a quarrel with the President of the Academic Council, and the irritable prelate has prohibited all the priests of his diocese from being present at the opening session of the State Colleges. What is the result? An order from Paris enjoins all the civil and military authorities not to take part in the reopening session of the larger and smaller seminaries. The breach is patent and complete. It is the same at Orleans. The Minister of Justice commanded the Imperial Court of Justice not to send any letter of invitation to the bishop and his clergy. The first President of the Court not having complied with this injunction, the prefect and the other functionaries absented themselves from the solemn sitting, so that the judges and the priests were alone face to face.

What is to be the issue? The Roman Church—too long exalted by the favour of the Government—has persuaded itself that it ought to direct and to oppress the State. The bishops have been accustomed to assume a haughty attitude and an arrogant tone. Their pride was gratified to behold the public employés trembling at their feet. They gave expression to their sovereign wills, like Mussulman pashas to their subordinates. If a poor prefect dared to resist the omnipotence of the lord bishop, he was displaced or dismissed. Now things are altogether different. Napoleon III. and his Ministers have opened their eyes. Sad experience has taught them that the Jesuit party is insatiable in its exactions, and that they would be precipitated into the abyss, should they continue to walk in that path. Let us await the course of events, especially the decision of the French Government upon the temporal power of the Pope. Religion is absolutely necessary to the life of peoples; but it is also necessary that the ministers of religion should respect the just rights and privileges of civil society.

MYSTIFICATION OF THE BISHOP OF POITIERS.

I have already referred to the lesson inflicted on the Bishop of Nîmes. M. Pie, Bishop of Poitiers, has received a still more severely-felt chastisement. You will remember that this prelate, in a very transparent allusion, had compared Napoleon III. to Pontius Pilate. This excess of audacity provoked general indignation, and the Council of State declared that M. Pie was guilty of abuse. This was something, but not a great thing. The condemned bishop, from the pulpit, glorified himself on account of this judgment, and claimed the title of a martyr. Another punishment awaited him, and the whole nation has laughed at the mystification undergone by M. Pie. The following is a brief summary of the facts:—

An individual, named Gicquel, had set out for the Roman States, after having been enrolled as a volunteer in the corps of Pontifical Zouaves. This Gicquel is one of the most vile men that can be met with: idle, drunken, ill-conducted in his private relations, a liar, and a swindler, he abandons himself to the most shameful vices. Thus, feigning to be a Protestant by birth, he has, more than once, extorted money from the priests, under pretence of being converted and baptized into the Roman Church. His enrolment amongst the Pontifical Zouaves was also an ignoble calculation on his part.

Suddenly there arrived at Poitiers a letter announcing that Gicquel had been grievously wounded at the battle of Castelfidardo, and upon the envelope of the letter were written these lugubrious words, "Dead! dead! dead!" Immediately M. Pie, without obtaining further information, resolved to pronounce the funeral oration of this Gicquel. The Cathedral of Poitiers was actually decorated with a magnificent catafalque, and hung with black cloth. All the pomp of the Romish worship was displayed; and there, in the midst of an immense concourse of priests and devotees, the Bishop delivered a discourse, in which Gicquel was represented as a hero of the faith, the type of all the virtues—an accomplished Christian—a saint who had always walked in the path of honour, probity, devotedness, and self-denial! So many words—so many falsehoods!

Unhappily, Gicquel returned to France, and recommenced his disgraceful career of swindling. He went from house to house, obtaining here 100*fr.*, and there 50*fr.*, by means of his misrepresentations, and expending in the most scandalous manner this money, so ill-acquired. The attention of the magistrates was awakened, and Gicquel was summoned before a judicial tribunal. The Procureur-Imperial narrated from the outset the immoral life of the accused, then he read the funeral oration pronounced over him by the Bishop of Poitiers. The contrast was extremely piquant, and all the journals have reproduced the curious details of this affair. M. Pie is covered with ridicule and overwhelmed by shame, and his word is for ever discredited. Certainly, it is no sin for a bishop to be deceived. But upon what documents did M. Pie found his panegyric? By what right did he transform this contemptible malefactor into a martyr and a saint? His whole discourse was thoroughly Romish. To meet the exigencies of his case, the bishop invented false facts; he drew a portrait of a personage who never existed. This was the grand fault of M. Pie. He ascended the pulpit of truth to utter falsehoods. He has been wanting in the elementary duties of morality, and has wounded the human conscience. Will the bishops be corrected by this rude lesson? We must hope so.

M. GUIZOT'S BOOK UPON THE CHURCH AND CHRISTIAN SOCIETIES.

One of the principal events of the last month has been the publication of the book of M. Guizot upon "The Church and Christian Societies in 1861." Everything that proceeds from the mind and pen of this illustrious writer excites universal interest. M. Guizot unites to vast historical knowledge the consummate experience of a statesman. His last work bears the impress of his superior talents. The weight of years has abridged nothing of the vigour of his understanding or the manly nobleness of his style. But this work has, nevertheless, occasioned deep regret to the admirers and friends of the author. M. Guizot here reproduces, and enlarges at greater extent, upon the extraordinary idea which he had already put forth at the annual meeting of the Society of Primary Instruction—namely, that there ought to exist a great and general Christian Church, in which Roman Catholics and Protestants of every denomination might form a close alliance to oppose unbelievers. How is such an alliance possible? The Papists regard the Protestants as heretics and rebels. Can we give the right hand of fellowship to those who refuse to accept it? Before we unite, we ought at least to be in agreement on some fundamental articles of faith. M. Guizot maintains, still further, that the temporal power of the Pope is indispensable to his spiritual independence, and demands, in the name of the liberty of Roman Catholics, that the Pontifical States should remain under their present master. This strange theory has not made many proselytes, notwithstanding the genius of the author. If the Pope cannot maintain himself upon his throne without the aid of foreign bayonets, it is evident that his temporal authority is at the last gasp. The will of the people in the States of the Pontifical Church must not be set at nought. The Papists go beyond their rights when they make their liberty depend upon the perpetual oppression of several millions of human beings. It is never lawful to despoil others of what belongs justly to them, in order to preserve one's own liberty. Let Pius IX. preserve his spiritual independence as he best can: the inhabitants of the Roman States have the right, like all other nations, to demand and to establish a government which shall meet their real wants.

CONTINUATION OF THE CONTROVERSY RESPECTING PROFESSOR COLANI.

I have already mentioned the dogmatic controversy provoked in the Lutheran Church of France by the nomination of M. Colani, a negative theologian, to a chair in the Seminary of Strasbourg (Evangelical Christendom, p. 570). This dispute continues, and assumes greater dimensions. The Lutheran Consistory of Paris, with its pastors, elders, and deacons, is in direct opposition to the General Consistory of Strasbourg. The President of the Parisian Consistory, M. Meyer, has publicly and solemnly protested against the election of M. Colani. This resistance will bear good fruits: it will teach the neologians that Evangelical truth and piety cannot be misrepresented with impunity. X. X. X.

ITALY.

SPREAD OF EVANGELICAL LITERATURE—A CLEVER PICTURE—SALE OF BIBLES—THE DREAM OF CHURCH REFORM—ITALIAN ESTIMATE OF THE POPE'S CHARACTER—FATHER PASSAGLIA—POPULAR HISTORY OF THE POPES—RESULTS OF THE CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES—THE BIBLE IN ELBA.

Florence, Nov. 16, 1861.

Evangelical literature is multiplying fast in Italy. No sooner is an evangelist arrived in a town, than some priest, monk, or canon drags him into controversy. In this way truth is at present being elicited, and public attention called to it, in Palermo, Porto Ferrario, and Leghorn. The Christians of Italy are likewise bestirring themselves. While many of their productions are still marked by immature thought, or tainted with political allusions, their simple force and earnest sincerity betoken a day of better things. Nor should the efforts of transalpine authorship be overlooked. The enthusiasm which has been kindled by recent events on behalf of poor Italy is showing itself in a very gratifying way. Not only have the leading writers of Christendom offered every facility for the circulation of their popular works in an Italian dress, but some of them are preparing works as suitable as possible for the inquiring mind of Italy, which are to be published here before appearing in home circles.

Though the press has been so lately freed from Papal censorship, and the various departments of scriptural exposition and illustration are far from rich, a sufficient number of tracts and books, doctrinal and practical, historical and expository, existed in the rapidly-increasing dépôts to call for a catalogue of Evangelical Italian works, which was printed in Florence in May last. Since then, at least, an additional page might be added to the list, which we trust is destined to expand into a goodly volume.

The young but energetic committee at Naples has furnished several tractates on the Mass, Papal Infallibility, and the Worship of Saints. The Waldensian printing-press at Turin has been publishing new editions of standard works, like "Lucilla," and the "His-ric Impossibility of St. Peter's Voyage to Rome," for which a great demand exists. The Italian committee at Geneva sends us, among other things, the deservedly-popular almanack, the Amico di Casa, of which a few years ago only 5,000 or 6,000 copies were issued, whereas 40,000 copies were last year exhausted before 1861 opened, and this year the edition of 80,000 promises as speedily to be bought up.

In Florence an appeal to the people on the subject of "The Religion of our Ancestors," by De Sanctis, has been well received. May Italy soon recognise that Popery is the new, and Evangelical Protestantism the ancient faith.

Professor Geymonat has written a very readable work on Vaudois history and doctrine, which I hope the English public will soon possess a translation of. The former portion of the book contains a synopsis of the romantic incidents connected with this persecuted people, while the latter exhibits in a new form those scriptural truths in the maintenance of which they have dared and suffered so much. A Tuscan lawyer has printed two treatises, full of scholarly research, and fitted to influence the men of thought, though written in popular style, on the worship of saints among the Papists, and the falsification of the Scriptures, in the Martini version of the Bible. Mr. Ribet vindicates the doctrines of the Gospel in a masterly exposure of half-a-dozen pamphlets, issued by the priestly party in Leghorn, in the "Expectations and Exaggerations of a Monk." The clearness, conciseness, and power displayed in his brochure leads us to hope for some permanent contributions from Mr. Ribet's pen on some of the leading topics of controversy.

A very clever and attractive picture has just appeared in the windows. It is from the French original of Napoleon Roussel, but on a larger scale, and represents the interior of a Roman Catholic church, with priests and people going through the different parts of the Papal ritual, confession, praying to the Madonna, kneeling at the altar, and before the statues of apostles and angels. Beneath each of these services is quoted in legible letters a text of Scripture, which shows it is of human invention. It is not possible to give in a few words a just idea of the tout ensemble of this happy sketch, "The Church of Rome judged by the Word of God." Beneath a beautiful picture of the Madonna, on the left, is cited 1 Tim. ii. 5, "There is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus;" while below the confessional box, on the right, we read Luke v. 21, "Who can forgive sins but God alone?" In the centre of the picture, above the crucifix on the altar, is written, John iv. 24; upon the place where the sacred vessels are kept we find Mark xiii. 21 and Acts iii. 21 emblazoned; while 1 Cor. xiv. 19 is written on the steps of the altar, from which the priest is pronouncing, in Latin, a benediction upon a group of kneeling devotees.

The sale of Bibles and Evangelical books during the summer has not been large. In continental countries the winter is the favourable time for sowing the seed of the kingdom. This is so much the case, that in several parts of France colportage is suspended from June to October. This year the heat has been so extraordinary as to paralyse all energetic action, and therefore no friend of Italy is discouraged by the meagre returns. During the last two years no such strong dislike has been manifested to the Evangelical cause by the general public as is now shown. The dream of Church-reform has again entered with great power the waking thoughts of the Italians. To this delusion they have clung with wondrous tenacity from the time of Arnaldo da Brescia and Savonarola to the present hour. About twelve years ago the famous Gioberti tried to practicalise the visionary hope, and Italy was intoxicated with joy at the prospect. Ten years of bitter experience have sobered somewhat the deluded masses. Every sign on the horizon has been disappointing. The priests are at the lowest ebb of popularity, their system is held in abhorrence, and the very Pope, so long looked upon as weak, but well-meaning, is now generally regarded as personally a bad man. But the vision of Church-reform, though less vivid, has not faded away. The remarkable utterances of Reale, Liverani, and Passaglia, and a large following of liberal priests in regard to a "free Church in a free State," have quickened the aspirations of every lover of his country in favour of a reformed Papacy. These great men protest as mightily against a nascent Evangelicism as they do against the misdeeds of the Roman Camarilla. Passaglia, the man who was chosen by the present Pope to expound and defend in an official theological treatise the new dogma of the "Immaculate Conception," is in no mood for tolerating the progress of a Protestant propaganda. And when he leads the way, who dare say nay? A popular history of the Popes, by an able and liberal Tuscan writer, which is now appearing, reflects most faithfully the feeling of the Italian heart. The frontispiece is sufficiently startling, for Italy, in the person of a dauntless female, has seized the keys with her left hand; the right points upwards to a Bible with the white cross of Savoy upon it, while with her right foot she tramples on the Papal tiara. But in the work itself a return to something like primitive purity in the Church is argued for hopefully, and various modifications in the present dogmas and practices of the priests of Rome are suggested as necessary and likely to be acceptable. Our hope is that Passaglia and his party, having once broken with the Papacy, will be led further than they purpose. The prolonged occupation of Rome, and the persistent obstinacy of the Pope, may well enlighten them further. Meanwhile the Bible, with God's blessing, is doing its convincing and converting work. A young priest, who has devoted himself to God's service, found his Saviour in a Bible, which he secretly bought from the colporteur some miles south of Florence, about a year ago. A young man from the country, visiting the Florentine Exhibition and his friends at one and the same time, was asked on the Sabbath morning, by a comrade, if he was going to mass, when he promptly answered by pulling a Testament from his pocket, which he bought on the vine-clad hills of Montepulciano. And our hearts are just now greatly cheered by a remarkable Evangelical movement in the island of Elba, which may date its origin to the giving of a Bible by Francesco Madiai to an Elba sailor in Nice some two years ago.

With reference to some of the publications mentioned above by our correspondent, we select the following notices from La Buona Novella.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS BY THE FRIENDS OF THE GOSPEL.

"The Evangelical Waldenses, an historical summary, by Paul Geymonat, Professor of Evangelical Theology at Florence." The author of this abridged history was struck with the words of Count Maniani, in the Rivista Contemporanea: "Let public thanks be rendered you, O Waldenses, who have never shown ill-will or ingratitude to your ancient mother, down to the glorious day when God crowned your constancy, and a common bond of liberty reconciled you with your amended persecutors." The author desires by this sketch to make known the Waldenses to the new provinces of the Italian kingdom, where their history and doctrines are unknown. The work is divided into two parts, historical and doctrinal. The reasons for this arrangement are very apparent; it will enable all who read the book to ascertain not only what the Waldenses are, but what they believe and teach. Other publications by the same writer, [which deserve to be mentioned, and have done good service, are—

"A Defence of the Evangelical Doctrine:" a short, but lucid explanation of the doctrine of justification and free salvation by faith in Jesus Christ.

"The Church or the Gospel:" a striking contrast between the method of the Roman infallibility, and that of the free examination of Holy Scripture.

"Priesthood, or Ministry:" a clear and precise distinction between the Pagan-Jewish-Roman idea of sacerdotalism, and the Biblical-Evangelical notion of a ministry of the Word.

Signor Leorati, of Naples, also has published three excellent tracts:—

"The Worship of the Saints," in which, after an ingenious comparison of Popish and Pagan worship, he shows that Roman idolatry is opposed to reason, history, and the Bible.

"What is the Mass?" an appeal to the reason and the conscience of the Italians.

"A Comedy Among the Dead, or the Bull Unigenitus:" a spirited affair in the form of a dialogue between Clement XI., Quesnel, Lan- celotto, a Jesuit, and the principal Fathers of the Church, about the Jansenist propositions condemned by the bull. The form and tendency, the lively style, and the able reasoning of this little book, are very much commended.

POPIH BIGOTRY AT NOVI—RECEPTION OF A PERVERT—INTEREST AWAKENED.

Although the following letter from La Buona Novella records a painful circumstance, in the public apostacy of a lady born Protestant, it shows how even such an occurrence may awaken interest and lead to inquiry.

Novi, October 18, 1861.

Having concluded my sojourn at Pavia, which, if it presented the advantage of a city important for its size and historical associations, yet had the inconvenience of an atmosphere vitiated by the marshes which are produced by the annual overflow of the Ticino, I betook myself to Novi, which is just the opposite. The climate is very healthy, and the city is one of the smallest among the chief places in the province. It possesses a hospital, an orphan-school, and infant-schools. The trade chiefly consists of silk, which is much valued, and the industry consists of large silk mills and manufactories of fustian. But Novi is probably still the most bigoted city in the state; the number of priests is very considerable; and from time to time we encounter crowds of boys, who do not yet know how to distinguish between good and evil, but who are already arrayed in the long robe and covered with the three-cornered hat. And their number is exactly in proportion to the catholicity of the inhabitants. Nevertheless, notwithstanding so great superstition, and so many priests, Novi has a small Evangelical community, but with what effort and prayer it succeeds continuing its existence, I am unable to describe. They have had to change their quarters several times, till they have succeeded in congregating in one corner of the city. I have spoken with some of the citizens who had confessed the faith of the Gospel to me, but they dared not declare themselves openly, for fear of the world; and indeed would have been soon put under the ban of society if any one had presumed to proclaim that faith in Jesus Christ alone saves, or had said that masses were useless.

But an event as important as unlooked for has made a great noise in all Novi, and has put religious conversation in every mouth. He who before dare not avow himself a friend of the Gospel now makes open display of Evangelical doctrine; and this is all due to an act which the priests believed must confound the Protestants there are in Novi.

Yesterday, the 17th, there was grand confusion, a going and coming of priests, friars, and persons in ecclesiastical habits, pinsochere (women who wear the dress, but have not taken the vow), up and down the stairs of a mansion outside the city. Nobody could tell what it was; but in the evening the church where the military go to mass was all illuminated, and the priests, arrayed in their robes of silk resplendent with gold, received a lady all clothed in white, with her hair loose hanging down upon her shoulders, to whom they presented a series of questions in Latin. The lady sometimes answered yes, and sometimes oui. Finally, they administered baptism to her, and so she was received into the bosom of the Holy Mother, the Catholic, Apostolic Roman Church.

The lady in question is Scottish, and by birth a Protestant, who resided for a long time at Paris, was espoused to an Italian emigrant, and now resides at Novi, the native place of her Catholic husband. She has been instructed by the priests in the Catholic belief, and finally, yesterday evening, was induced to receive baptism at the age of forty-five years. Report says she was compelled to this, because her own faith was an impediment to her entering the high society of the ladies of Novi, who are mostly more bigoted than can be described. Next Sunday, they say, the bishop himself will come to confirm her in her new faith, by administering to her the sacrament of Chrism (or confirmation).

This event has made a little stir. Such of the Novese as think, say that since she had been baptized, when an infant, although a Protestant, she was a Christian, and there was no need for such a parade, and hence there is a general discussion about baptism and Evangelical doctrines. A colporteur, who has a head there, has sold a good number of tracts and Bibles.

GERMANY.

GREAT ANNUAL MEETING OF THE GERMAN ROMAN CATHOLIC SOCIETIES AT MUNICH—LETTER FROM THE POPE AND RESOLUTIONS THEREON—VIRTUAL RETRACTION OF PROFESSOR DOLLINGER—ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHRISTIAN BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS AT KAISERWERTH, AND TESTIMONIAL TO REV. DR. FLIEDNER.

Frankfort, Nov. 15, 1861.

Whilst the Evangelical Alliance was holding its noble assemblies at Geneva, and the Gustavus-Adolphus Society was sitting at Hanover, as related in my last letter, there was being held at Munich a grand session of an altogether different nature, of which I will, to-day, at the outset, speak a few words. This was the annual general assembly of the Roman Catholic societies. These societies, which all have for their object the propagation of the faith in Germany and foreign countries, were represented at the general assembly by their delegates. On September 9 a meeting of 1,200 members, surrounded, it is said, by 8,000 auditors, was opened at Munich, under the presidency of the Baron von Andlau, of Fribourg. They listened, first, to the reading of a letter from the Pope, forwarded by the Apostolic Nuncio, Prince Chigi, and in which the sovereign pontiff exhorted the assembly "to take measures suitable for protecting the cause of the Holy See—to defend its rights, to propagate the salutary doctrine of the Church, to resist the corrupting errors of corrupted men," &c. This letter naturally furnished the principal subject of the deliberations, and exhausted all the eloquence of the day. The temporal power of the Pope, so formidably menaced, inspired all the declamatory harangues, as well as the resolutions which were adopted. Amongst these resolutions, we must note, above all, an address to the Pope, which, in the actual circumstances, is very remarkable, since it shows what is, at the present time, the Ultramontane opinion in Germany, and the degree of blindness which characterises it.

Listen! "The Holy See is the immutable rock of the Church, and of the kingdom of God, founded for eternity; its temporal domain, although of a nature in itself terrestrial, is, nevertheless, the very corner-stone of order in the family of Christian peoples, in the alliance of States, and in the law of nations founded by the Church alone." And, after having adroitly insinuated that the temporal power of the Pope is the only preservative against all revolutionary movements, the address continues: "We consider, therefore, every attack upon the integrity of the domain of the Church as an attack upon that Church itself, upon our holy faith, and upon the prosperity and the existence of the Christian life of nations. We see, in the overthrow and spoliation of the Holy See, a danger to all property, the overthrow of every right, the fall of thrones, the tomb of the liberty of peoples, the ruin of Christian society." Lastly, the address expresses the hope that God will confound the designs of the enemies of the Church, as He confounded the language of those who sought to build the Tower of Babel, that they might live without God.

How many absurdities in a few lines! Must we not be struck with the blindness of those who make their Church and their faith dependent on the possession of a nook of territory already more than half lost, whose inhabitants are in full insurrection against the mild and holy power which governs them, and which power is upheld only by a foreigner, whom it has excommunicated? According to this notion, then, should it to-morrow please Napoleon III. to withdraw his troops from Rome, there would no longer be Church or Catholic faith! In this case—O fools and blind!—in this case, your Pope is at Paris, not at Rome; your address should be sent to the Tuileries, not to the Vatican. What folly, moreover, and what blindness, to speak of liberty—of the liberty of peoples—as guaranteed by your holy see, when you see that the peoples, degraded—crushed by the gloomy despotism, religious, moral, and political—which your holy see has caused to weigh upon them during fifteen centuries, are now making desperate efforts to trample it beneath their feet! But that which is not folly, but a very skilful ruse of Jesuitism, is the fear with which you seek to inspire the Powers of the earth in the presence of their peoples: it is this policy which constitutes your religion—this incessant appeal to the arm of flesh, to terrestrial weapons, to defend your domination, which is crumbling on every side. Nevertheless, even this is a folly, for you thus show to the whole world that spiritual strength has escaped from your Church: and it is written, "Cursed is the man who trusteth in man, and who maketh flesh his arm."

Amongst the resolutions passed by the assembly of Munich, we note the following: 1. Without the Pope there is no Catholic faith. (Do they then begin to fear a defection—a schism in Italy and elsewhere?) 2. All the complaints which the Pope has made in his recent allocutions are the simple truth. 3. To take from the Pope his domains, is to disobey God (sacrilege). 6. The rights of the Church can never be altered either by princes or parliaments. 7. Catholics are men and citizens. 8. Protestants ought to be brought back to the Church only by the way of free development, because they have been separated from it for 800 years. 9. The Catholics are not reactionaries. Another resolution runs thus: "It is a crime to abrogate a Concordat." This has not prevented the Government of Würtemberg from recently abolishing its own, after the example of the Grand Duchy of Baden, which is a great victory of the people of Würtemberg, and of the Chamber of Deputies, over the dominating spirit of Ultramontanism, and also over the weakness of the Government, which has conceded to the people all that they desired.

But I wish here to mention, in addition, a curious incident of the Catholic assembly at Munich. Your readers will possibly remember a certain Professor Döllinger, of Munich, who, last winter, in a public discourse, declared, in strong and unmistakable language, that the temporal power of the Pope was neither essential to the faith, or necessary to the Church. His discourse, or, at least, his opinion, was made known throughout Europe by the hundred voices of the press, and created a great sensation. Now, behold this same Döllinger, in the meeting at Munich, has, nevertheless, voted his acquiescence in all the fine sentiments that have there been expressed respecting the temporal power. Doubtless his astonished friends, and possibly his superiors, exhorted him to vindicate and maintain his consistency. However this may be, on the last day of the session, the 11th September, the learned Professor mounted the tribune, and said: "I have been informed by my friends that there exist doubts respecting the sincerity of my assent to the resolution which has just been passed by the assembly relative to the Roman question, seeing that I have, as it is thought, expressed my opinion altogether to the contrary in another place. I declare, therefore, that I have nothing to retract, and do not wish to retract anything. I have this morning drawn up some propositions which I may be permitted to read, in order to dispel all misunderstanding." And these propositions, what do they express? The most explicit and energetic confession of belief in the absolute necessity of the temporal sovereignty of the Pope! Will it yet be said that the Catholic Church no longer works miracles? since it can make no to signify yes, and black to be white? Oh! fear is indeed a potent means of conversion! Here, then, we behold, still further, a man ruined in the good opinion of all upright men—a man, as the French say, "fallen into the sea." Let us hope that Rome will not work the same miracle, on the same question, in the person of the Rev. Father Passaglia.

If your readers will now follow me from the capital of Bavaria to the borders of the Rhine, we shall there find ourselves at a Christian festival more in harmony with our faith, and more edifying than the Ultramontane gathering at Munich. This was the celebration, on the 16th September, at Kaiserwerth, of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the numerous establishments of Christian philanthropy which owe their existence to a man whose name will ever be celebrated amongst the benefactors of suffering humanity—the Rev. —Fliedner, D.D. On Saturday, the 14th, the friends of these institutions arrived in great number, in particular the deaconesses and the schoolmistresses who had there received their education, and who are now employed in different parts of Germany. Sunday, the 15th, was a day of preparatory festivity, occupied by various religious services and fraternal communications. A valuable souvenir was then presented to Dr. Fliedner. This was a magnificent album, large folio, containing more than 121 leaves, artistically painted, to represent the incidents of his laborious life, and the numerous institutions which owe to him their existence, both in Germany and foreign countries. The idea of this beautiful present originated with a noble lady of Berlin, who has laboured indefatigably for several years amongst the patients of the hospital of Kaiserwerth.

On Monday, at six in the morning, all the friends repaired to the church to celebrate there a religious service of thanksgiving and prayer. At ten o'clock the examination of the orphan-school took place. Amongst the orphans were remarked fourteen daughters of poor Moravian pastors, who, with six others, who are yet expected at Kaiserwerth, will there receive a liberal and gratuitous education. These young girls will then return to their own country, there to diffuse—either as schoolmistresses, or as deaconesses visiting the sick—those spiritual blessings which they have themselves received. At half-past two the bells summoned the numerous assembly present to the establishment itself, at which more than twenty-five pastors were present, and took part in the services. After singing and prayer, Dr. Fliedner ascended the pulpit, and spoke with emotion of all that God had condescended to effect through his instrumentality during the twenty-five years now past. His mere presence in that pulpit proclaimed to all God's mighty aid, for the physicians, four years since, forbad him all labour, on account of his ruined health, telling him that he would not live to see the spring of 1858. Nevertheless, he has survived to witness this noble anniversary festival, and to take in it an active part. After having given expression to his gratitude by the reading of the 126th Psalm, he related the very humble beginnings of his work at Kaiserwerth in 1822, the establishment of the deaconesses' institution, not less humble, in 1836—a striking contrast with the actual condition of this enterprise, which has distributed the aids of Christian charity from the banks of the Rhine to those of the Nile and the Ohio, and from the Holy Land to the shores of the Northern Sea. Four spheres of Christian activity at Kaiserwerth were referred to in Fliedner's rapid sketch—the sick, the poor, children, and prisoners. Independently of numerous hospitals founded or restored under the influence of Kaiserwerth, the deaconesses of that establishment devote the labours of their charity to fifty-three hospitals. As to the attention given to the poor and the sick at their own dwellings, the deaconesses of Kaiserwerth are at that work in a multitude of communes, into which they are called, and where they are entertained, by different benevolent associations. With respect to poor and deserted children, the labour is not confined to founding schools and asylums, but is specially directed to the training of capable and Christian instructresses. More than 900 of these devoted young women have received their education at Kaiserwerth. Through the agency of the deaconesses, several countries of the East are beginning to feel the Christian influence of the Evangelical Church of Germany. They are engaged in the work in the hospitals founded by them at Constantinople (1852), at Alexandria (1857), at Beyrout (1861), and at Sidon (1861), as well as in the schools founded at Smyrna (1858), at Bucharest (1859), at Beyrout (1860), at Florence (1860). Lastly, other deaconesses dispense their charities in different places in the prisons for women.

A great undertaking, upon which the blessing of God rests, always has for its result, beyond its own direct action, the inspiration of other similar undertakings. Thus it is that, after the example of Kaiserwerth, establishments of deaconesses have been founded in twenty-six different cities of Europe.

Amongst the numerous testimonials of respect and affection which M. Fliedner received on the occasion of this anniversary festival, we must notice a letter from the Queen Dowager of Prussia, and another from the reigning queen, expressing the most lively interest in the enterprises of Kaiserwerth, and enclosing on their behalf new proofs of munificence; and, lastly, a letter from the Berlin Committee for the relief of the Christians of Syria, conveying to M. Fliedner, with touching expressions of sympathy and encouragement, a donation of 2,680 thalers, destined for these establishments in Syria. Let us mention, further, an address of thanks sent to M. Fliedner by the Superintendent-General, Dr. Wiegmann, in the name of the Consistory of Coblenz, and of the Church of the province of the Rhine.

This edifying assembly was terminated by the solemn reception of ten new deaconesses who are about to enter upon the sphere of their labours, and by fervent prayers on behalf of the establishments of Kaiserwerth, and of all those who work in the same spirit for the relief of the innumerable evils under which our poor fallen humanity now suffers.

REVIVAL AND RELIGIOUS LIFE IN GERMANY.*

Bonn, November, 1861.

It shall be my task in this paper to give you a brief outline of the history and present condition of the Revival in Elberfeld. In the commencement of this year many Christians united at stated hours during one week in the solemn exercise of prayer to God. The state of the world, the condition of Christendom, and the promises of God, drew them unitedly to the Throne of Grace. Never did the unity of the body of Christ, however apparently divided, manifest itself more really than in that week of prayer. It was not the call of despotism, bringing nations and churches to chant their Te Deums over tyranny triumphant, or enemies slain; it was not superstition coercing its victims for selfish or sinister ends into an external uniformity, like the slaves of the Papacy; it was the voice of love proceeding from the fountain of life, and leading the strangers and pilgrims of the earth to think of their everlasting home. Hence, as it appeared to be a universal sympathy, it was obeyed by the more earnest members of the Church in most parts of Protestant Christendom. In the midst of this great office of prayer and supplication a wonderful movement made its appearance in Elberfeld. God's ways are indeed wonderful, and His paths past finding out. It was not the rich and the cultivated, nor even the moral and earnest portion of the community, which the Divine Spirit chose for the manifestation of His presence and power. He chose the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and the things that are not to bring to nothing the things that are. He brings forth praise from the mouth of babes and sucklings. Come with me into that noble building, the Orphan-house, standing on one of the neighbouring hills. It is one of the many monuments of the piety and benevolence of the Christian people of Elberfeld. The spirit of prayer and supplication has fallen on these 300 orphans in a very wonderful manner. Many of them are prostrate, some of them in agony, and all of them highly excited. They sing, as they never before sang, of the grace of God and the love of Jesus; they read the Divine Word as they never did before; they confess their sins, in the midst of their meetings, as if no eye but God's saw them, and no ear but His heard their cries. They are of all ages, from seven to nineteen years, and upon all, though in different degrees, the spirit of prayer rests. Many of them were mischievous, some of them hardened, abandoned outcasts, to whom the house of prayer has been a weariness; but now, in an instant, all is changed! They pray alone; they meet to pray unitedly; they seek for retirement, where no earthly eye may see them, and they continue in these exercises as long as they are permitted, with unabated ardour. All is new, and strange, and wonderful, in that great Orphan-house. All listlessness and former indifference seem, for the time at least, changed into burning zeal, and the voices of prayer, or praise, or thanksgiving, or confession of sin, arise from every corner and chamber and lobby of the great building. The teachers and superintendents are as much astonished as the children, and know not what to do; but they are Christians, and have the instinct within them that prayer is a duty, and that they have no right to quench the spirit of prayer in the children. Hence they all yield to the mighty impulse, and either lead the supplications of the orphans, or allow them to pray as their own inclination impels them. These are substantially the facts of the Orphan-house awakening in Elberfeld, as I have seen them myself and heard them from many witnesses.

Behold now how different are the judgments of men! The two classes that have divided mankind from the beginning meet in hostile array around the Orphan-house of Elberfeld. The Cains and the Abels, the Sauls and the Davids, the Judases and the Johns, the foolish and the wise virgins, are totally opposed to each other in their sentiments as well as in their actions; so that now from the peaceful city of Elberfeld two mighty, but contradictory, testimonies go forth through a thousand channels over the length and breadth of the land. The mayor of the city and the civic authorities are full of indignation, saying, "What is this that is come among us? Has the Methodism of England and America verily reached us? Are the winds of fanaticism to be loosed from their stormy caves in the valley of the Wupper? Are we to stand quietly looking on while, to the destruction of all order and decorum, the most fanatical and enthusiastical scenes are being transacted in an institution which is placed under our control? No, it is impossible." In this mood of mind they dismiss the chief director, Mr. Grafe and the house-father, Mr. Klugh, and all the chief teachers from their office. This you will say was bringing politics into religion, and dealing with a high hand in a very solemn religious matter. They could have waited for a time, to see how the matter would end, or they might have taken counsel with the pastors of the children, their natural teachers and guardians; but they did nothing of the kind. They decided, as far as they could, the awful question; "Is this movement in the Orphan-house from God or from Satan?" Henry VIII. never assumed greater authority in England than this. He took it upon him to command the nation how they should worship, and what they should believe; and without pretending to the headship of the Church, as he did, these civic authorities take it upon them to decide the most sacred questions of religion and conscience. They have violated the rights of the people, they have trampled on the ecclesiastical authorities, and extinguished, as far as lay in their power, the praying and psalm-singing among the orphans. It is a grievous violation of the sacred principles of religious liberty, and should be condemned and reprobated by all that detest either ecclesiastical or political tyranny. Henry VIII. burned the Protestants and hanged the Papists for their opinions; the Oxford authorities of former times expelled the Wesleys for reading, praying, and expounding the Scripture in private houses; the dethroned tyrant of Naples imprisoned the Madiai for reading the Word of God; Matamoros lies even now in the dungeons of Spain for the same cause; and to these and all such examples of persecution we must add, with profound reluctance, the civic authorities of Elberfeld. They deprived one man of his honourable office, and other men of their daily bread, because they believed in the doctrines of modern revivals. They would not prevent singing, praying, and prostration among the children; and therefore are they dismissed. And not only are they expelled, but others are brought in, with a military or police officer at their head, to establish among psalm-singers the discipline of the camp! This hard and cruel treatment of the orphans, when their feelings were highly excited, is to me the most detestable and diabolical part of the whole business. There were similar scenes in many parts of Ireland during the year 1859. In Belfast, Derry, and Coleraine, there were many examples of children singing and praying, and men and women falling into convulsions under the power of conviction, but the civil authorities did not interfere. Only think of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland sending officers to Belfast, Londonderry, and Coleraine to put an end to such disorderly excitement among the subjects of Her most gracious Majesty the Queen! Some bishops have encouraged the revival, and they are unfrocked; the rectors that lent their churches to the enthusiastic multitudes are deprived of their livings; the captains and officers of Her Majesty's army who have been leaders in the fanatical movement are deprived of their commissions; and all the aiders and abettors of the revival over whom the Government has any control are subjected to the treatment of culprits or criminals. Would this be tolerated in England? Would it be religious liberty? But this is what the civic authorities of Elberfeld have done, and their decision has been confirmed by the Government of the province. Of course, this case has been taken up by the radical press, and the conduct of the magistrates lauded to the skies. On this subject I shall say no more at present, save that their conduct has been condemned by the two presbyteries of Elberfeld, by the seven pastors more especially connected with the orphans, by the synod of the district, and by all the more serious members of the community.

P.S. I have just received a letter from a dear friend in Elberfeld, in which it is stated that, notwithstanding all the opposition to the awakening, yet, during the last fourteen days, five orphan girls have been brought to a living faith on the Son of God. He hopes also that many of the children of God in England will remember the orphans of Elberfeld in their prayers.

FACULTY OF PROTESTANT THEOLOGY AT VIENNA—THE NEW PROFESSOR—ADDRESS OF DR. LIPSIGUS ON GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS AND PROTESTANTISM.

Dr. R. A. Lipsius is a gentleman of considerable eminence as a scholar, and has been called from Leipsic to fill the chair of Protestant theology at Vienna, at the same time as Dr. Vogel was called from Jena. The address, of which we give the following very brief summary, was delivered on the 229th anniversary of the death of Gustavus-Adolphus, the 6th of November last.

The speaker said it was his honour to celebrate the memory of the man who, 229 years before, gave his life on the battle-field of Lützen for the sake of Evangelical freedom of faith and conscience. To that offering, next to God's grace, we owe the existence of Protestant Christians in Germany, and the loud and clear preaching of the dear Gospel in the German tongue. We cannot commemorate Gustavus-Adolphus in this city without blessing God, who turns not only the hearts of men, but the fate of nations, as He will, and brings to pass what seems impossible to human eyes, when the time and hour is come. In Vienna itself, from which the decree once emanated whereby death and annihilation threatened the faith of the Gospel in all Germany, a company of Christian men are met to-day, to celebrate with joyful hearts the restoration of a free faith. In Vienna, whence Ferdinand II. sent forth his plundering, murdering hosts, to bring back apostates to holy Church, even from the eastern and northern sea; but now Protestant Christians can meet in the same city under the protection of a successor of the same Ferdinand, free, and without fear for the extension of their faith. In Vienna, where the name of the Swedish King who crossed the sea to make war on an emperor of the House of Hapsburg was only used with hate and execration, a union has been formed called after the same enemy and heretic, under the shelter of Hapsburg laws. In Vienna, where the death of Gustavus-Adolphus was celebrated as the happiest thing for the Imperial House and Catholic faith, which alone it tolerated, we celebrate the same death as the sacrifice of our faith's hero and restorer, from whose blood have sprang Austrian freedom of faith and conscience.

The first duty called for by the contemplation of such things, is to exclaim, "Oh, the depth of the riches and of the knowledge of God!" &c. It is wonderful that Gustavus-Adolphus should have appeared upon German soil as the restorer of liberty of faith and conscience, and it seemed impossible that such restoration could take place when the House of Hapsburg was supreme, and when German Protestantism seemed lost beyond recovery. Events which followed the battle near Prague, in 1620, caused the rapid decline of Protestantism in the German States, and in the surrounding countries, so that within ten years from that time Catholicism reigned almost supreme. The circumstances of the period all show how rapid was the decline of the Protestants and the revival of the Papacy. At that very time Gustavus-Adolphus appeared for the defence of the falling cause, and prosecuted his task till his death upon the battle field, in 1632. His mission was for liberty of conscience, and it was not in vain. On this account the Protestants of Austria do well to commemorate his death, and gather encouragement from his example.

SWEDEN.

A SWEDISH PASTOR'S EDUCATIONAL LABOURS—NATURE OF INSTRUCTION IMPARTED IN HIS SEMINARY—DIFFERENT CLASSES OF PUPILS—SPIRITUAL EFFORTS OF ELDER PUPILS—DECREASE OF CLERGYMEN AND DEMAND FOR TEACHERS—GENERAL RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF SWEDEN.

Smaland, one of the central provinces of Sweden, has still large tracts covered with woods. Its hills and lakes, and altogether grand and lovely scenery, give to the people a more serious kind of mind, even as natural men. Here the religious movement is, praised be God! greatly progressing. The well-known family at Hemstad is now somewhat scattered, but continuing their usefulness in different places. One of its members has just begun a boarding-school for young ladies, on Christian principles, eight Swedish miles from Jonkoping, and this is a most blessed field of work. More and more confidence is shown in the schools carried on by Christians, although naturally some enmity is now and then apparent. At Hemstad itself many plans are thus being worked out under Christian influence. At Stjorsked a hospital and school for blind, deaf, and dumb children is about to be erected. But the most promising work of all, at present, is that of Pastor A——, whose seminary for missionaries seems to be under the Divine blessing. On the 1st of September, 1858, the school was begun, and opened with seventeen pupils. The funds were none, and yet the work went on. In 1859 there were forty youths boarded and instructed; about thirty got everything gratis. This last year there have been sixty, and some have now finished their course of studies at the seminary. These youths have been fed almost like the birds, direct from God—inasmuch as the school had not anything to rely on in the way of funds. But God is rich, and through many little tokens of His favour, He has refreshed this portion of His vineyard. The intention, with respect to the school, is to meet an increasing want—that of pious teachers in country parishes. Everywhere there is a thirst for God's Word, and wherever it is faithfully preached it is received by many with saving faith. On this account pious teachers for the young, both male and female, are required. Mr. A—— has felt himself called upon to begin this seminary, and has the whole management of it. The young men receive instruction in the same branches of education as are appointed for the "Folkskole Seminaries" (seminaries for training teachers for national schools); and after two years' study, several of the pupils have gone through the examination at this seminary with good recommendations. Those pupils who have entered the school at a more advanced age, or have less facility in learning, leave after one year to become teachers of younger children, or colporteurs, and are then principally instructed in Scripture history, the Swedish language, writing, arithmetic, &c. Those who stay longer than two years are intended to be sent as teachers to Lapland, or more distant countries as assistants to missionaries, and are therefore taught foreign languages. Thus the school is divided into three different sections, with different aims and studies; but there is also an elementary school, consisting of children from ten to fifteen years of age. If hundreds of youths could be sent out as teachers, they would all get good places, so numerous are the daily requests received from parish schools, private families, gentlemen of property, and missionary societies. For some time Pastor A—— had his school at Glin, but, from various motives, he left that place and opened it in his native province at Christdala, in Smaland. This autumn the establishment is removed to the parish of Stueltanda, in the same province, where he has bought a piece of land, with the intention of building a suitable house, if God should give the means, for his enlarged establishment. I have never seen him, but have heard much of his stirring eloquence, and energetic, earnest nature. He gives his whole life to work for Christ. As he has no pastoral charge at present, although still remaining in our Church, he has got permission to employ his powers in this special purpose for at least six years, when no doubt the permission will be extended. As far as I have seen, it is remarkable how deep the conviction, that if we are believers, we must work for Christ, is rooted among us in Sweden. The laity of every class, both men and women, as soon as their eyes are opened to the danger to which unconverted souls are exposed, put their hands to the plough, and try in a wider or narrower sphere to be useful in the Lord's vineyard. I could tell you of many beautiful and interesting facts of this kind. Pastor A—— has principally in view to take advantage of the great gifts possessed by many young Christians for preaching and teaching, so that they may be made still more useful than hitherto, learning something besides the most important knowledge of all, that of Scripture, and that these disciples, young both as to age and experience, may be under some control when they go out to different parts of the country. Some kind of order is necessary, that the evil one may not take advantage of their ignorance and inexperience, so as to cause them to be a hindrance to the Spirit's work in our country. Much confusion and irregularity might arise by these young laymen following wholly the suggestions of their own minds, saying this or that, going hither and thither, and taking all for the Lord's voice. While yet remaining at the seminary, the elder pupils speak and explain the Bible at fixed times in the teachers' presence, the latter, when necessary, correcting them in their remarks. At the public examination, when some of the pupils are leaving the school, they expound a portion of Scripture, and catechise the younger pupils in the presence of a more numerous auditory of persons, able to judge of their ability. During the time they are at the seminary they are not allowed to speak publicly, but they teach in Sunday-schools for younger children, or visit the sick in the neighbourhood, when they have opportunities of speaking a word in season to the family.

Several times, every week, there are prayer-meetings at the school, when every one whom God has taught to pray may do so aloud. By means of these meetings both teacher and pupils are more and more united in forbearance and love to each other; and the whole welfare of the institution, both temporal and spiritual, is laid before the Lord. It is a remarkable fact, that comparatively few young men amongst the students of Sweden wish to be ordained as clergymen, and therefore several pastors have made application for young men at the seminary to help them in their parishes with the catechising of the children and the visitation of the sick. In general, the better part of the clergy are not so much against the help of laymen as they used to be, always, of course, excepting certain of the clergy in the west of Sweden.

One of our best colporteurs, L——, has spoken in about 100 churches, and from several places. I have even heard of a few gifted and experienced Christian women who have been allowed on some occasions to expound Scripture, though, of course, not in churches or large assemblies. One of our richest landed proprietors in this province, Count Stackelberg, preaches every Sabbath in a large chapel on one of his estates, and into many of the country houses of our nobility has the Word of God found an entrance, and the tenantry are under sound scriptural influence. At the same time, it strikes me that the spirit of infidelity is gaining ground wonderfully, and that it stands forth with more and more audacity. People seem to make their choice now between the religion of Christ and that of man. Is not this one of the tokens that Christ's kingdom is approaching with power? Oh, may many stand fast round the cross as their banner, and if called upon to do so, fight and die for it!

DENMARK.

THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN QUESTION.

We have received a letter in reply to the one we published in our October number, on this vexed question. It was but to be expected that the Prussian view advocated in the last article on the subject would meet with a response; but it is quite impossible for us to perpetuate the controversy, and therefore we shall bring it to an end, so far as we are concerned, by rapidly indicating the contents of the answer before us. Our esteemed correspondent quite justifies us in this course, by his opening admission, that the dispute is mainly a political one, and belongs rather to the secular journals, in which, he says, it ought to be discussed.

He says the question is not affected by the numbers who speak the Danish and German languages respectively. He insists upon the importance of studying the literature which throws light upon the extent of the districts in which Danish and German are spoken. He denies that there is any analogy between Austria and Venetia and Germany and the disputed Schleswig-Holstein territory. Mr. Scheel, or Scheele, he says, is not an authority, and yet may be appealed to by the Danish party. Mr. Valentiner also is not trustworthy, and the same is true of some others who have been mentioned. The Danish Government does not intend to suppress the German language in Schleswig. The Prussian Government, if it dared, would incorporate Schleswig and Holstein. The rebels were not heroes, but deluded men. Politics ought not to be mixed up with religion. The introduction of the Danish alternately with German in the religious services of Angel has not had a deplorable result, and things are in a better state there than before the change. Whatever the proportions of the population in regard to the two languages, the Danish certainly ought to be preached where it is spoken, as well as the German. The Governments in these countries have been accustomed to decide within what limits certain languages should be preached. Spain and Brazil furnish no analogy. In Denmark all children must go to school. The allusion to America also is not in point. Whatever the right of a Government in imposing a language, Germany has claimed it in Bohemia, Silesia, parts of Prussia, Illyria, &c. In England French was at one time imposed by the court, though the English eventually triumphed. The facts quoted by the Danish writer respecting schools were accurately reported; the children were not ignorant of Danish. If this is true of the south, much more is it true of the north. Children ought not to be confirmed, as they have been, in a language which they do not understand. The entry of Provost Otzen into the assembly of the States does not prove him a Dane in sentiment. Mr. Gruntvig's real opinion may be gathered from an article by him, which is forwarded with this letter, but is too long for translation. Gruntvig declares that as religion cannot be forced upon any one, so neither can nationality. As for Mr. Helvig, his opinion has been asked, and his reply is forwarded. He says the language of the people in Angel is nowhere the pure German (Hoch Deutsch), but what is called Platt German (or Platt Deutsch), and they learn Danish as easily as German, if not more so. The statements which have been made about Bishop Martensen and Asmus Bruhn are not quite exact. In conclusion, the writer says that in 1855 the mixed districts had a population of 82,049, of whom 25,000 had even previously both Danish and German services, while 57,000 had German services alone; but many of the 57,000 spoke Danish.

Those who find the preceding indications obscure must refer to the previous correspondence. We have neither space nor inclination for the further discussion of so difficult a question in these pages.

THE OPENINGS AMONGST THE ARABS.

In a former number mention was made of Dr. Gregory Wortabet, who had been enabled by some Christian friends to go as a medical practitioner to Bagdad, for the benefit of the Arabs. It is hoped that by placing medical help and medicines within the reach of the missionaries there, some openings for spiritual good also to the race of Ishmael may be found. Our readers will peruse with deep interest the subjoined letter just received. We understand that some medicines are on their way to Bagdad for Dr. Wortabet's use; and we commend this interesting matter to their good wishes and prayers.

Sulimania, Irak, Province of Bagdad,
October 2, 1861.

My dear Friends,—Since writing individually to several of you, the Turkish Government has appointed me quarantine doctor at this place, which is on the Turco-Persian frontier, and in the Province of Bagdad, a few days distant from that city. I remained in Bagdad nearly two months; and as it is the best part of the year, in which I promised to make it the centre of an experiment, to reach the Arab races of the desert, I now beg to hand you the result of my experience, not by way of a "missionary report"—for to that high office I never laid claim—I simply came to Bagdad as a private practitioner—but as items which I have no doubt will interest those friends who helped me to come to that city.

And, paramount in interest, I will speak of the Arab races, and my intercourse with them. The Arabs may be divided into two classes—viz., the pure, and the impure Arabs. The first are the great wandering tribes of the desert—the Arrazi and the Shammar. These are constantly roaming about. In the winter they occupy the southern portion of the desert, east of the Jordan, and in the summer they prowl about on the banks of the Euphrates. The other Arabs are those who inhabit certain districts, and, living in tents, lead a pastoral life in a circumscribed district. Many of these tribes occupy the plains of Babylonia, the Montafik, the Beni Lam, the Beni Zobaid, the Shammar Toga, the Ahl El Jzair, the Saadon, the J boor, the Albuhamad, and others. With the first—viz., the pure Arabs of the desert—I have had no intercourse whatever. Bagdad is not the proper centre to reach them. They can only be reached in one of two ways. 1st. By awaiting their approach to the north, and then, through the influence of Mr. Skene, to draft oneself among them, and with them make their annual trip round the desert. I think it would be practicable for a physician to do that. As these Arabs are the object of my mission, I hope one day to adopt this plan in reaching them; or 2nd, in locating oneself as a physician in Anah, on the Euphrates, or at Damascus. To the former they come for their annual supply of dates, to the latter they come to sell their stuffs and to purchase their requisites. Bagdad is not therefore a proper centre for these Arabs. Another plan might be adopted with more success, did not the pure Arabs look upon the impure Arabs, or settlers, with the most ineffable contempt. I was thinking whether the one could not be reached through the other. But this plan meets with two serious obstacles. 1st. The settlers, from mere nominal Mohammedans, have become so de facto. They have now become partisans in religion; those south of Bagdad are of the Shiah sect—followers of the unfortunate Ali, who was killed on the plains of Kerbela—and those living north of Bagdad, and at present my neighbours, are of the Sumio, or orthodox sect of Mohammedans. The Wahaber Arabs, who are now again very powerful, are known to be enthusiasts in Mohammedanism, and have even proclaimed themselves the reformers of that creed. So that in my opinion it would be a very serious affair, thus reaching them at all, and still more so in making them pioneers to the pure Arabs. A second obstacle which stands in the way is one to which I have already alluded—viz., the contempt with which the pure Arabs look upon all settlers. They will not deign to intermarry with them, and will accept nothing at their hands. Here is an example. A portion of the Shammar Arabs located on the plains of Irak, or Babylonia. The great tribe were so disgusted, that they disowned them, and now this portion of the Shammar family are called Shammar Toga (toga means a collar, as those seen round the necks of dogs, and in this country is a sign of slavery or bondage), to distinguish them from the proud family from which they have degenerated.

I now come to speak of the second class of Arabs. They too are divided into two classes—viz., those who live in tents and wander about, and those who live in reed houses. Of the latter, I know the Ahl Il Jzan, the Albuhamad, and the Djboor. A Montafik, a Beni Jam, or any of the other settled tribes, will not intermarry with them, and hold them in the same contempt that the great Arrazi has for a Montafik. They are used by their more powerful brethren as tillers of the ground, which even a settled Arab will not deign to do. The merchants of Diarbekir, Mosul, and Bagdad use them also as escort to the rafts on the Tigris. With these races I have had much intercourse in my capacity as physician. They came to me from all parts of the Irak to be treated, but the hurry-scurry of twenty persons crowding around me, all of whom telling me their ailments, and when I was busy in seeing, prescribing, and making up medicines for them, prevented my being able to have a word with them, and those with whom I did speak I found votaries to Mohammedanism. The method I used to adopt in our conversation was this, not to attack Mohammedanism, but to lead them from Mohammed to God, whom the Mohammedans revere as the only being to be worshipped. Sometimes I spoke to them of the great prophets whom Mohammedans, alike with Christians, revere—Moses, David, Jesus, whom they call Eesa, John, &c. But all this amounted, to all human appearances, to nothing.

Such, therefore, is my intercourse with the Arabs. The result of my experience, after nearly a year's experiment, amounts to this: The pure Arabs, who are still simple-minded, might be reached by a physician incorporating himself with them, and becoming in toto a Bedouin like them. Should he not be able to effect such an incorporation, then either Damascus or Anah (Palmyra, if possible, would be better still) should be the centres of his work. Among the impure Arabs the same method should be adopted with them as in the case of reaching city Mohammedans. Schools would be a great auxiliary in reaching this class; but, of course, this I did not attempt, because I neither had the means or the personnelle for such a grand work, which requires more hands than one.

In addition to this experience, of which I hope one day yet to profit, my visit to Bagdad has not been devoid of good. On the 27th April last I opened a dispensary on my own cost and charges, and I closed it on the 28th August. The number of patients, according to the register, seen and treated there amounted to 1,643. As there were many outdoor patients, and whom I continued to see till the very day of my departure, the number increased to above 1,700. Though I had no dispensary prior to the 27th April, still I think I am safe in saying that the number of poor treated since my arrival in Bagdad, in November last, to that period, exceeds the amount seen at the dispensary; and thus the friends who kindly helped me out have the consolation of knowing that for the money they have contributed they have been, under God, a blessing to upwards of 3,000 souls. If any ulterior good has been effected, when the mind of the dying one has been turned from man to Jesus, the latter day will discover it.

Since I came here, I have already seen the Christian priest of the place, and have come to an understanding with him that, if he will open a school wherein the Arabic and the Chaldean be taught, I will pay half the expenses of the school. The rest the natives are to furnish. This is settled, and we are now writing for teachers to Mosul. A few medicines I have remaining, with which I intend opening a dispensary. I have already taken a house, so divided, within and without, that I can make a nice dispensary of the outer portion. Of course, my medicines will soon be exhausted. If my friends feel any interest in the work I have done, and wish to send me the long-promised medicines, I send a list of requisites which my Bagdad experience has taught me as necessary for an Oriental dispensary. The case should be sent via Alexandretta and Aleppo. If sent to Mr. R. R. Rathbone, 24, Water-street, Liverpool, he will forward it to me.

Sulimania is a place of 8,000 or 10,000 inhabitants—Koordish Mohammedans. We have a Christian and a Jewish settlement in the place. On either side of us we have the Sâadon, the Djboor, and the Albuhamad tribes, Arabs, and the Jaaf and the Hama-ward, Koords. So that there is much scope for work; and I intend to enter upon it with that measure of grace which may be imparted to me from on High.

And now, dear friends, I bid you farewell. Many thanks for all your kindness to me.

Yours very sincerely,
GREGORY M. WORTABET, M.D.

TURKISH MISSION FIELD.

Aintab, Syria, Oct. 15, 1861.

To the Rev G. R. Birch, Secretary to the Turkish Mission-Aid Society, London.

My Dear Sir,—I wrote you a private letter a few weeks ago. I wish now, through you, to address our friends in England who have hitherto so nobly aided us in our work; and in doing so, I must lay before you the condition and embarrassment of our mission for want of funds.

You are well aware of the war in America. It has been forced on the North, from whence the support of our Board is mainly derived, and is regarded as a war for principle, for liberty, and constitutional freedom. All the energies of the North are forced into it, and the freeness and abundance with which their money is given of course prevents their contributing to the wants of our Board. In consequence, we are curtailed in our expenses, and must inevitably suspend some of our most important native agency and schools, unless help comes to us from some other sources. In these circumstances, we can only turn our eyes to our English brethren, who, we feel assured, sympathise with America in this moral conflict: and who, we believe, long as much as ourselves for the triumph of freedom, and who desire that the work of the Gospel in foreign lands may not be checked while this problem is being wrought out—which, therefore, emboldens us to present our wants.

With this station are connected five out-stations. Our allowance for the present year is already consumed, and we are, in fact, now carrying on these operations, without knowing whence the money is to come. We have already recalled one helper. Shall we call home the remainder? After having broken up the fallow ground and secured a foothold, and the work is fairly under weigh, shall we abandon these posts, and thus lose all the expenditure of time, money, and labour that have been bestowed upon them? Shall the enemy triumphantly exclaim, "They have begun to build, but are not able to finish. Have no confidence in these people: stay with your own community?" This has already occurred at the abandoned station, and discourages those friendly to the truth. Shall this occur at the remainder of our out-stations? We trust not; and yet we cannot see how it is to be avoided, unless by help from England to sustain these native helpers.

The next portion of our work to be pursued is the education department. We are training up pious natives as teachers, preachers, pastors, and colporteurs. The wants of our field would require us to have some twenty or twenty-five in a course of preparation; but we are compelled to reduce the number to twelve, and not one of these men ought to be dismissed. The expanding nature of our work does not allow it. They are all needed in some capacity, and with all the training we can give them; but unless aid comes, we must dismiss some. I am sure you will not like us to dismiss any, if they can possibly be held on, and it will be a sad and sorrowful day for us when the dire necessity for it shall come.

Our common schools also—of which we have seven, containing over 500 pupils—are destined to suffer; nearly three-fifths are the children of Armenians, and in our schools are receiving a Christian education; and though they are nominally Armenians, there is every reason to believe that they are Protestants. The Bible is their text-book, and the children become early indoctrinated in its great truths. Our Protestant community pay the expense of educating their own children, and we pay for the Armenians. The money expended on these schools we regard as a very profitable outlay. The amount of good accomplished we know is incalculable, and we cannot think of closing them without pain, and sending these poor children back to their former superstition, ignorance, and error.

Our female boarding-school must remain a day-school, for we cannot purchase the building or board the pupils.

Other branches of our work will also suffer; but we have shown enough to satisfy you of the injurious effect of a curtailment in our operations.

The other mission fields of Turkey are also suffering from the same source of embarrassment.

I make these statements, fully persuaded that our English, Irish, and Scotch friends will sympathise with us in our present embarrassments. We are sure they will do what they can; and, while grateful for past aid, our prayer is, that the Lord may bless them in all the liberal things they may devise in this emergency.

On behalf of the Aintab Station,

Yours affectionately,

B. SCHNEIDER.

CHRISTIAN GOVERNMENT IN LEBANON—EDUCATIONAL EFFORTS—BAPTISMS AND ADMISSIONS.

Bhamdun, Mount Lebanon,
November 5, 1861.

The inauguration of a Christian government in Mount Lebanon was an important result of the late insurrection in Syria and of the intervention of Europe. The administration of this government with equity and success is one of the greatest problems in the history of civilization. And all the readers of Evangelical Christendom will take a deep interest in its success and in the tranquillity and evangelization of this goodly Lebanon.

One uniform government now extends over the whole mountain, embraced in six separate districts, of which the first, at the north, has a Greek; the second, third, and sixth, each a Maronite; the fourth, a Greek Catholic; and the fifth, a Druse governor. Each governor has his court, composed of one or two members from the different sects in his district—Maronites, Greek Catholics, Greeks, or Protestants, and Druses, and Metawalies, or Mohammedans, ten or twelve in number, and sixty or more in all. Every member of these courts is special advocate as well as judge of his own community, and equally interested in the maintenance and administration of justice for all parties. And the Pasha has a superior court, likewise composed of chosen men from all the communities and interests in the mountain, for the public government and tranquillity of all the mixed population in Mount Lebanon. The Protestants, three or four hundred in number, are chiefly in the fifth, or Druse district, and in Zahleh. In this district, also, a dozen or twenty of our primary schools have been opened in years past, extending into the border districts over the central part of these sacred mountains. Both our seminaries, at Abeih and Suk-el-Ghurb, are also in the same district. Zahleh and Maalika, containing ten thousand Christians, at the east, greatly need scriptural instruction, and urge the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us." Who will respond, "Lord, here am I, and here are my humble offerings of prayer and money: accept and use them and me for the promised evangelization of Mount Lebanon?"

This mountain needs one hundred schools in the year to come. Each school would cost 20*l.*, or 100 dols. The children are ready, books are provided, and teachers can easily be engaged. But where are the funds to educate these myriads of immortal souls for Christ and eternity? Hundreds of millions of dollars in the United States can be found for fratricidal war, but whence the funds for Christianization and life eternal in the peace and kingdom of God?

During the present year we have baptized seven and admitted seven others for the first time to Christian communion. It is as a handful of corn on the mountains, which shall shake as Lebanon. In January last we anticipated the morning watches during the week for the general concert of daily prayer: and design to anticipate the morning watches to our friends in Europe and America for the year to come, asking God to avert war and restore peace among all nations, and vouchsafe to His chosen families the full blessings of His grace, and the influences of the Holy Spirit, "that they may be made perfect in one." With special thanks for Evangelical Christendom during another year, I remain, for Syria and Palestine, yours in Christian love, * * *

AMERICA.

Albany, New York, Oct. 22, 1861.

Knowing that many of the readers of Evangelical Christendom are deeply interested in the operations of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, I am not content to allow its annual meeting to pass without a brief notice. It was held in the city of Cleveland, Ohio, which is a flourishing place on the southern border of Lake Erie, about one hundred miles west of Buffalo.

Many things conspired to prevent so large and general attendance as in some previous years; still it was good, and the meeting was deeply interesting and profitable throughout. It commenced on Tuesday afternoon, October the 1st., and in the evening of that day the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. R. S. Storrs, D.D., of Brooklyn, New York. His text was 1 Cor. i. 28—"Yea, and things which are not; to bring to nought things that are." This presented a fine opportunity for taking an historical survey of the actual power of the Gospel over Judaism, heathenism, and civil despotism; which the preacher did in a masterly and eloquent manner, and when he applied his theme to the present circumstances of this nation, and predicted the overthrow of slavery as the probable result of the present war, the audience gave a spontaneous and decided expression of approbation.

There were strong and sad apprehensions entertained about two months since respecting the amount of debt which might be reported in consequence of the present national pressure, and the compelled reductions which might be ordered. Those apprehensions have happily not been fulfilled. Through the favour of our God, the debt does not reach 28,000 dols. The receipts for the year were 341,988 dols., the expenditure 369,874 dols. This was felt to be an occasion for special gratitude, and many thanks, on its account, went up to God.

Another blessing which called forth praise is that the operations of the Board for the past year bear a very favourable comparison with those of previous years. The mission in Southern Africa gives promise of a harvest in proportion to the degree and skill of cultivation. Twenty-six new members were added to the ten small churches there last year: and several of the stations were blessed with a revived state of religion. The various missions in Turkey are in an effective state. There are 23 stations; 80 out-stations; 48 missionaries, including three unordained physicians; 56 authorised native preachers, of whom ten are pastors; and 139 other native co-labourers in different capacities, as catechists, teachers, and helpers. Of churches there are 42, containing 1,546 members; of whom 198 were received the past year. 114 schools contain 3,418 pupils, of whom 80 are in three training-schools for preparing pastors and helpers, and 80 are in two female boarding-schools for educating wives for the native ministry. The Rev. Dr. Dwight, who, with Dr. E. Smith, explored the American field, in 1830-31, "is now travelling over the same ground for a re-survey, and is filled with wondering gratitude in view of the changes since that time. Then, from the Mediterranean to the borders of Persia, they nowhere met with any among the people whose religious views and feelings were in unison with their own. Now, missionary stations are scattered over the land, and scarcely a place is entered where at least some one does not greet the visitor with a joyful welcome as a herald of the Gospel. At Marash, in a house of worship erected chiefly by the people, Dr. Dwight saw forty persons admitted to the Church at one time, and preached to a congregation of nearly 1,500 people. Only six years had then passed since the Church was organised; and but twelve years since there was not a Protestant there, and the people were then proverbially ignorant, barbarous, and fanatical."

The Syrian Mission has gained strength by the trials through which that people have lately passed, and the influence of the missionaries for good has been much increased.

The Nestorian Mission has 41 native preachers, and 31 out-stations. "And the reformation there is gradually bringing the true people of God among that people into active fellowship with each other; and reformed churches may be said now virtually to exist in perhaps a score of villages, and several of them with native pastors. The number of these Church members must exceed 300."

The missions in India have been generally blessed with decided tokens of the Divine favour. 131 new members were added last year to the churches of the Mahratta Mission, 6 to those of the Madeira Mission, and like blessings have been enjoyed in the Ceylon Mission. In other respects the indications are very encouraging, and the missionaries have strong hopes of increasing prosperity.

The Sandwich Islands Missions have suffered a great loss in the death of Dr. Armstrong. But the past year has been one of special revival. The additions to the churches have been 1,465, raising the whole present number of Church members to 19,707. Add the deceased Church members from the beginning to the living, and the number is 37,454. More than 21,000 dollars were contributed by the twenty-three churches during the year for the support and propagation of the Gospel.

The China Missions and those among the Indians in this country, are still struggling in their respective fields to gain attention and awaken an interest for good.

The following is the yearly summary of the whole: 20 Central Missions, with 113 stations, and 171 out-stations; 152 missionaries, with 183 male and female American assistants. Native pastors, preachers, and helpers, 633. Total number of labourers, 988. Churches, 161; members, 24,456—1,944 were added last year. Pupils in seminaries, boarding-schools, and free schools, 8,630. Printing establishments, 4; pages printed last year, 33,003,079. This, as will be readily seen, indicates a measure of Divine favour which ought to call forth devout gratitude to God.

The proceedings which followed the presentation of this report were of a varied and deeply-interesting character. They were extended until late on Thursday evening. The members evidently felt that they were gathered for the advancement of the one great and comprehensive object which has constantly engaged the Divine mind, and they were intent on it. It was quite refreshing to see how this absorbed their minds. They felt there was no time for diversion, for unnecessary words, or indirect speeches, however eloquent or otherwise attractive. The missionaries present expressed a spirit of enthusiastic devotion to their work, and their direct, telling words quickened devotion in other hearts.

One said (the Rev. Mr. Lindley, of Africa), "My heart is in Africa," and he declared he knew nothing of self-denial in leaving his native land for Christ. Another said, "We ask only our rations." And another, the Rev. Mr. Marsh, of Mosul, said, referring to his compelled detention here through want of funds, "You have no right to detain us here. You have no right to keep the missionary from his field." And in the course of his address he added that he had given what he could to the cause, and had nothing now to give but a watch which had formerly belonged to his wife, who had given to it her all. This, of all he possessed, was dearest to his heart, and as such he felt he must give it to the cause, unless it should be redeemed by some liberal person, and the avails paid over to the Board. He then laid the watch, which contained a lock of his wife's hair, on the table. Subsequently the watch was redeemed, and the precious memento handed back to Mr. Marsh amid general applause.

The Rev. Dr. Perkins, of the Nestorian Mission, who has lately been travelling in England, gave a brief account of his efforts there in behalf of the Turkish-Aid Society. He spoke of having mingled with six denominations who are interested in its operations; and he expressed the conviction that the English churches are in advance of the American in the work of missions. He also instanced the case of an English lady who had contributed the sum of fifty dollars to American missions, in consequence of her fear that our troubles would diminish our ability to support them; and he added that he had received letters from many Christians in England, saying that they were praying for the success of the North. The Board subsequently adopted, with much cordiality, the following resolution in reference to the co-operation of friends in England:—

Resolved—That the Board would express their deep and grateful sense of the interest taken in an important department of their work by the Turkish Missions-Aid Society in Great Britain. While important aid has thus been afforded us, at a time of unusual solicitude, we are reminded afresh of that bond of brotherhood, which in the great work of the world's salvation binds together, without respect to denominational or geographical distinctions, all the followers of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It was to be expected that in so large a gathering of influential ministers and laymen from different denominations some reference would be distinctly made to our present national difficulties. But while this was not allowed to divert the attention of the assembled multitude from the subject of missions, they unanimously passed the following resolutions, which will show to our distant friends how Christians here regard the present war:—

Resolved—That we sympathise with our national Government in its struggle with rebellion, which threatens its very existence, and imperils the success of the Missionary Board, and we fervently implore the God of nations so to overrule the conflict that the rebellion may be crushed, slavery, its prime cause, removed, and that peace, prosperity, and righteousness may be permanently established throughout the whole land.

Resolved—That we not only thus pray for deliverance from our present national distress, but also that the nation, having been purified in the furnace of affliction, and made meet for the Master's service, shall hereafter render the same devotedness to the cause of Christ and Christian missions as is now put forth for the preservation of our beloved country.

There was present at the meeting one of the original founders of the Board, now eighty years of age. He subsequently said, in reference to the war, that it is working for good, and, through the assistance of God, would result in the increase of religion. He congratulated the Board on the attitude it had taken in the support of the Government in its present righteous struggle. He invoked the blessing of the Almighty on the efforts of the Board, and hoped that this struggle would result in the establishment of a truly Christian commonwealth. Soon after, the services of the occasion closed, and this venerable man pronounced the Benediction.

I cannot close this communication without expressing the conviction that the number of persons who regard slavery as the direct cause of our present war is daily increasing. The conviction is growing among the people that the real question at issue between the North and South is freedom or despotism; and its utterance is daily more bold and urgent. Men who a few months ago would not tolerate this sentiment are now ready to avow it. In consequence, the war is daily taking a stronger hold on the moral feelings of the people. It is regarded as vitally one with truth, freedom, and religion. In most of the annual assemblies of the religious bodies which occur about this season resolutions avowing this sentiment, and expressing confidence in the Government, have been adopted. It is becoming the sentiment of the people. And this is a source of comfort to reflecting minds. It indicates the hand of God, and is a pledge not only of ultimate triumph, but of permanent good. Pray for us, that this land may yet become "a habitation of justice, and a mountain of holiness."

Literary Correspondence.

SANSKRIT AND MISSIONARY WORK IN INDIA.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Sirs,—I do not know whether anything proceeding from so humble a pen, and one so unaccustomed to write in English as mine, will be acceptable to yourself, or be deemed worthy of insertion in so valuable a journal as yours. From that journal, whilst labouring in what some have, I think, unjustly considered a barren field, I have often received much encouragement, instruction, and pleasure. Having, therefore, much respect, and I may add, a sincere love for your journal, I have been the more pained to observe in your August number an article chiming in with sentiments uttered by the lecturer in his "inaugural lecture delivered before the University of Oxford, on April 19, 1861, on the study of Sanskrit in relation to missionary work in India."

Perhaps I may have misunderstood the drift of that article, but to me it appears that it would point to a knowledge of the Sanskrit, with pious scholarship, as the panacea for the evils of missionary work in India. If I be not mistaken in my conclusion, will you allow one who was born in Bengal, and has spent thirty-one years out of a life now verging upon forty in that country, and whose experience of the natives of that country has been gathered from a variety of sources which are inaccessible to most Europeans, whether lay or clerical, to have a word regarding the value of Sanskrit. As a trader and merchant, a servant of Government, a teacher, and lastly, a missionary, I have come into contact with natives of India of every class and condition, and, as a lay preacher and missionary, have been privileged to preach Jesus and Him crucified to the Mohammedan and the Hindoo—the Mollah of the former and the Pandit of the latter sect, to the rich and the poor, the learned and unlearned—in the presence of the inhabitants of the upper and lower provinces of Hindustan.

The providence of God has sometimes placed me in their midst as a pauper, necessitating a life assimilated, with the exception of dress, in everything to that of the poorest native. Placed in such positions—having been brought into contact with such varied phases of native character—it may readily be supposed that, whatever may be the poverty of my attainments in other respects, I must have obtained an acquaintance with the native character rarely possessed by Europeans, and in my opinion totally wanting in the minds of such as set up Sanskrit as the battering ram which shall be applied with success against the formidable battlements of the ancient fortress of Hindooism.

That in India the missionary has to deal with no common country or people—no ordinary religion—is a fact of which Professor Monier Williams is not the original discoverer. This fact every missionary in India may discover after he has resided six months in the country; but whilst I most readily confess that this is true, I cannot agree to the conclusion which is drawn, that the Christian missionary who attempts to have discussions with educated natives without an acquaintance with the Sanskrit language, may be strong in intellect and faith, but resembles a man shod in iron walking upon ice, and that the Sanskrit language "is the one medium of approach to the hearts of the Hindoo, however unlearned, or however disunited by the various circumstances of country, caste, and creed," &c.

I deny that the Sanskrit is the one medium of approach to the hearts of the Hindoos, and I assert, on the contrary, it would tend to shut up the approach to the hearts of the Hindoos. We have in Bengal but two variations of the Bengal language, the Sadhu and the Sadharon Bhashas. Whilst both are originally derived from the Sanskrit, the former may be obtained, and is obtained, by ninety-nine out of every hundred of those who use it without any attempt to master the difficulties of the Sanskrit. The latter is the language of the mass. The millions use it, and those who are acquainted with the former confine themselves strictly to their purer language only when they meet together for the purposes of holding discussions on literary subjects, or wish to parade their attainments before public assemblies.

Even that form of the Bengalee, though far removed from the Sanskrit, is not, and cannot be said to be, a medium of approach to the hearts of the Hindoos. The fault found with most missionaries is not that they had neglected to attain the higher forms of Bengalee, but that they had attempted to learn the Sadhu Bhasha, and to preach in language which the mass of their hearers could not comprehend, save through the medium of a dictionary. The missionary preaching in Sanskrit would, like the barbarian suggested by the apostle Paul, be speaking in an unknown tongue. The Brahmins—the priests of the people—are, in many cases—I am willing to hazard the statement in the great majority of cases—as ignorant of the Sanskrit as are the Mohammedans of the Arabic in which, like parrots, they repeat their prayers. Many of the muntras—you may translate that word as prayers, or charms, which are taught to each Hindoo, male and female—are not understood by the Brahmins who impart them, and so little understood by those who use them as charms, that cases have been discovered where Hindoo women were taught to use as a mantra a number of words which meant nothing more than abuse upon themselves. Sanskrit, if you wish sometimes to put down a cavilling Brahmin, is of use in this way—by your repeating a sentence and asking him to translate it. In most cases, you may make sure of exposing his ignorance, and causing him to be laughed out of your congregation.

Nor do I grant that attainments of Sanskrit will enable a missionary to understand Hindoo mythology a whit better than the works on that subject in his own language. For proof of this assertion, I appeal to the fact, that a few years ago a learned Sanskrit scholar and a person not fully acquainted with even the Sadhu Bhasha, leave alone the Sanskrit, competed for a prize offered for the best essay on Hindoo philosophy. According to your article, the Sanskrit scholar should have gained it, but he did not: the other, though totally unacquainted with Sanskrit, carried off the palm of victory. Where, then, was the benefit of acquaintance with Sanskrit? and where the injury for the want of an acquaintance with it? *

It will not be, Sirs, through language, particularly through the medium of Sanskrit, that the heart of the Hindoo will be approached. Might I mention names of persons living, I could prove to you, dear Sirs, that the missionary most popular with the Hindoos in the metropolis of Bengal, has not been able to attain the language, not even in the Sadharon Bhasha, or colloquial. His common orders to domestic servants require to be interpreted before they can be understood. Yet, Sirs, this man is beloved by the Hindoos who know him. A learned Hindoo well versed in English—a Vedantist, and one whose opinion is of some weight—referring to this missionary and another, who also is totally unacquainted with Sanskrit, said: "If all your missionaries were like those two, Bengal would soon become Christianised."

I could name another missionary totally unacquainted with Sanskrit, but imperfectly acquainted with the Sadhu Bhasha, who obtained from the natives of his station the name of Outia, which you may translate into "Saint," and whose departure is yet, after a period of ten years, deeply lamented. I could tell of another, the sight of whom in one part of his station which he often visited, raised the cry of the "Khoda

* To what does our correspondent here allude? He cannot surely refer to the prize proposed a few years ago for the best statement and refutation in English of the fundamental errors of the Hindu systems of philosophy, which was divided equally between Dr. Ballantyne, the great Sanskritist, and Rev. Joseph Mullens, of the London Missionary Society. If so, we think he wrongs Mr. Mullens, and even his book is decidedly in favour of an acquisition of Sanskrit. See, also, his able paper on "European Missionaries Abroad," in the "Report of the Missionary Conference at Liverpool, held in 1860,"—Evs. Evangelical Christendom.

Wallah is coming!" This term may be translated the "Man of God." He, Sirs, obtained admission into the Zenana, behind the Purdah, felt the pulse and administered medicine to the high-born native women, whose faces the eyes of an European had never before seen. This missionary knew nought of Sanskrit. I could tell you of another who was constituted arbiter of disputes, called in to settle family quarrels, and who, on leaving his station, was accompanied by a crowd of Hindoos and Mohammedans, who wept as those who mourned for their father, and the number of which would have graced the departure of a prince. He knew not Sanskrit, but was well versed in the Sadhu and Sadharon Bhashas. I could tell you of another, whose funeral was attended by more than one weeping Sanskrit-speaking Pandit, and was wept for by not a few of mourning educated Hindoos. He was not acquainted with Sanskrit, and though a fluent speaker, was not perfect in his idiom and pronunciation of the colloquial.

These instances will suffice to show you that they, in their spheres, obtained without Sanskrit a medium of approach to the hearts of the Hindoos. Theirs was "slip slop," as you are pleased to term it, and would have evangelised, if anything human could evangelise, the 200,000,000 of India.

There is another portion, dear Sirs, of that article which it has grieved me to see proceeding from the pen of one I always looked upon as a friend to missionaries. I refer to the following words: "Real Pandits are rare, except in the great seats of learning, and the ignorance of the masses is notorious. This, indeed, we have heard triumphantly alleged," &c. It is to the word "triumphantly" I allude. If, dear Sirs, you have ever seen a missionary triumph over the fact of the ignorance of the masses, I assert that you were imposed upon; that he was no missionary, but a vile impostor; for it is a fact, that wherever a missionary station is established educational efforts are set on foot to the extent of the missionary's ability.

These educational efforts give the lie to your statement, and prove that no class of men lament more deeply the ignorance of the masses.

If the Apostle Paul, with his "slip slop," was not ashamed to preach the Gospel in Rome, we, dear Sirs, are not ashamed, nor fearful either, to do battle with the people whose national character, your champion asserts, is cast in the Sanskrit type. We, notwithstanding our "slip slop," which we assert is better than Sanskrit as a medium of approach to the hearts of the Hindoos, are working, and will go on patiently, until the times of refreshing from on high shall come upon India.

I do not, dear Sirs, look upon anything human as the real hindrance to the evangelization of India. I cannot believe that God would permit those 200,000,000 to go into the horrors of eternal woe because His servants are provided with nothing better than "slip slop." No, dear Sirs, His reasons for delaying the conversion of India are mysterious to those who have been martyrs to the burning sun and deadly climate of India. But whilst I firmly believe that it is the want of an outpouring of the glorious spirit of the Most High that is the real cause, I will, if encouraged by observing the insertion of this unworthy production in the next number of your journal, send you my opinion of what to me appear to be, among others, what must be called hindrances, on the part of missionaries themselves, to the missionary work in India, as also what is wanting to back the missionaries in their work on the part of Christians in England. In the meantime, dear Sir, permit me to subscribe myself,

ONE BORN IN BENGAL.

[It is our rule not to insert anonymous letters, but for once we waive our objection, premising, however, that, should our correspondent write to us again, if he wishes for the insertion of his letters, he must give us his name, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.]

Our correspondent has mistaken several points in our article. We have never altered our views respecting the great importance of missionary work, and we desire sympathise with the difficulties of the men of God who are fighting in the high places of the field. Yet we believe some, we will not say many, men are sent out abroad, who, from want of ability or of mental vigour, though with the love of God in their hearts, would have been more usefully employed at home.

We do not consider the knowledge of Sanskrit as the panacea for India, but we do consider that more, much more, progress would be made in many cases were missionaries more thoroughly grounded in the root languages as well as the vernaculars. Missionaries abroad are seldom able to devote their time to them. But as preparatory to missionary work, all should be grounded in the elements of the vernacular language they may have to acquire abroad, before leaving this country, if possible. And many more missionaries should turn their attention to the so-called "sacred" languages, in order to be fitted to cope with the Pandits and Maulavis of India.

We are glad to perceive that the Church Missionary Society has recognised the importance of Sanskrit studies by the appointment of Rev. W. Hooper (recently Boden Sanskrit scholar at Oxford) as Sanskrit Lecturer at Jay Narain's College, Benares, at the same time leaving much of his time free for direct missionary labour. We trust this is the beginning of an endeavour to make Jay Narain's College a seminary of real learning, and a nursery for a thoroughly educated native pastorate for North India.

It is absurd to talk of preaching in Sanskrit. We might as well talk of preaching in Hebrew or Greek; and yet these languages are of very great, almost vital, importance to clergymen at home, as is Sanskrit in some places in India and Arabic in others.

Our remarks were mainly directed to directors of missionary societies at home, who can, if willing, do much to remedy the defect. But the letter of our correspondent confirms us in the opinion that we are right in pressing this matter on public attention, as our remarks apply to a larger number of persons than we anticipated.

Certainly it is a new thing to us to see a missionary contending that he is a better man for not knowing the "sacred" language of the people, for not being able to expose the ignorance of some, and the arrogance of others. A missionary unable to make himself intelligible to his own servants certainly must be a useful man! The next thing we shall hear recommended is that no missionary should spend his time in acquiring the language of the country, but that preaching through the medium of an interpreter would be just as effective! But how does the missionary our correspondent alludes to preach? If in English, assuredly he is like, as Paul says, to "a barbarian" when preaching to a Bengali-speaking congregation. Even in dealing with Hindus who are able to understand English, the missionary ought to understand their vernacular at least.

We have never accused missionaries of speaking triumphantly of the ignorance of the Hindus, but we have heard the advocates of ignorance at home frequently doing so in order to excuse their own want of exertion.

Our correspondent will perceive that we have omitted one paragraph of his letter. It was on our use of the word "slip slop." We consider preaching through an interpreter, ignorance of the common vernacular (after a reasonable time being allowed for its acquisition), translations made in bad Hindustani, Bengali, &c., to be such. Nothing else was intended.

We leave the matter now open for discussion to any of our correspondents who choose to discuss it, and in conclusion thank the writer of the above letter for his communication.—Eps. Evangelical Christendom.]

Evangelical Alliance.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION.

MORNING SITTING.

The Fifteenth Annual Conference of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance was held at Freemasons' hall, London, on Wednesday, Nov. 20, 1861, and was presided over by Sir Culling Eardley, Bart. The attendance was not so numerous as had been expected. The morning sitting commenced at half-past ten o'clock.

The Chairman read a letter from the Rev. William Arthur, who was to have presided over the devotional exercises, and to have delivered the annual address, stating that he had been unexpectedly called to Brussels, in consequence of the death of a brother in that city. It had, therefore, been arranged that he (Sir Culling) should preside from the opening of the Conference.

The hymn commencing "Come let us join our cheerful songs" was then sung, and the Rev. Samuel Minton read the latter portion of the 4th chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians, beginning at the 17th verse. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. Kerr, Incumbent of Woodstock.

The Rev. T. A. Aston, Incumbent of Trinity Church, Tulse-hill, read the practical resolutions. The reverend gentleman, in proceeding to enforce them, expressed his delight at having been invited to that task, as it gave him an opportunity of expressing his sincere attachment to the principles on which the Evangelical Alliance was founded.

A hymn was then sung, and the Rev. Mr. Pullen, of Deptford, offered prayer.

The Chairman said those who should judge of the Alliance only by the muster this morning would form a very inadequate conception of the work which it was doing, and of the influence it was exerting. He did not pretend to be able to account for the contrast:—

There was a striking contrast between that meeting and two or three things that had occurred during the year. Among these were the numerous gathering at Geneva, and the word of magic which the Alliance, had become, by God's blessing, on the continent. A few months ago the bishops and clergy of Bulgaria, at the other end of Europe, tortured and provoked by the Patriarch of the Greek Church, could think of no better means in order to obtain relief than to apply to a little committee of the Evangelical Alliance at Constantinople. He (the Chairman) had received only a week ago a letter from Hungary, in which the writer expressed a hope that what he was pleased to call the "Great Evangelical Alliance" would take the lead in promoting a good religious movement in Hungary. Since they last met in annual conference, the Government of Sweden had felt it right, owing to the movement initiated by the Alliance, to propose, and the diet of Sweden had adopted, a change in the laws relating to religious freedom in that country. When he considered all these things he was convinced that the smallness of the present attendance was merely accidental. He congratulated the society on the success of the Conference at Geneva. The heterodox Unitarian party, who had been in possession of the Church in that town for a century and a-half, and who some forty years ago expelled everything that was spiritual out of the National Church, feeling that the tide was turning in favour of sound religion, and anticipating that an important impulse would be given to it by the Conference, determined by every means in their power to prevent the success of the assembly; and upon arriving in the town the friends of the Alliance found the walls placarded with bills, calling on the population of Geneva to show their dislike to these "fanatics," who had come across Europe to hold their wild assembly, by one and all abstaining from attending the meetings. He was thankful to say—and he believed it was notorious to most now present—that ten days completely turned round the public sentiment of Geneva. Not one word was said in answer to the placard, and, to the surprise of many, who thought the members of the Conference were a company of wild, ignorant fanatics, they did not utter one unkind expression. The inhabitants heard documents read worthy of a Palmerston or a Cavour; and papers worthy of any statesman in Europe, on the social and religious condition of the continent, were laid before the assembly. Not a word was uttered against any Church, and the instinct of many people told them that the Evangelical Alliance was an embodiment of the principles of the New Testament.

The Chairman then mentioned the subjects which it was proposed to bring before the consideration of the meeting. One was the observance of the Lord's-day on the continent. The paper on that subject, read at Geneva by M. Godet, of Neuchâtel (for some time preceptor to the present Crown Prince of Prussia), had been the means of stirring up feelings throughout Switzerland and Germany.

One of the secretaries then read a short abstract of the annual report.

The financial statement for the year was also submitted to the meeting.

The Rev. T. R. Birks, Rector of Kelshall, moved the adoption of the report. He reviewed at some length the general course of the Alliance since its foundation:—

It was a striking fact, that they were the meeting in the same room in which the soci-

was organised more than fifteen years ago. The results of its operations had not equalled the sanguine hopes of some, nor had they justified the fears and anticipations of others. It might be safely said that the Providence of God had disappointed both. By some it was thought it would regenerate the world at once, as if evils which had grown up gradually, during centuries, in the Church of Christ, arising from the inheritance of historical associations of different kinds, and other causes, could be uprooted in a moment. There were many who said that very great things would result at once, and that from that moment a new era would dawn upon the world, and that the death knell of Sectarianism would be rung from that hour. Although the operations of the association had been blessed, yet, after the lapse of fifteen years, they found distinctions still continuing, and sources of irritation still arising; and they had been taught lessons of deep humility with regard to our common human nature, even in the spiritual Church of Christ, indicating that they had not yet attained the rest and the inheritance which the Lord our God had promised and provided for us. But the exaggerated fears and desponding apprehensions of others had been equally disappointed. Some thought there were sectarian ends in view, and would not give the promoters credit for honesty of purpose and simplicity of aim. He would not say that the course of the Alliance had always been perfect in wisdom. That would be too much to say of any human organization; but as a whole the conduct of the association had been marked not merely by moral uprightness and Christian integrity, but by something of a spiritual discernment, and by a clear perception of the great want of the Christian Church in these days, and by a single aim to meet that want, which was the mitigation of prejudice by personal intercourse, and the promotion of union between the great brotherhood of Christians throughout the world.

He then referred to the union for prayer in the first week of the present year, and remarked that in our own day very great blessings had been seen to result from united prayer to God:—

One of the main features of the last two or three years had been tidings of religious revival in all nations. A diversity of opinion existed with reference to them; but, taking the average impression of thoughtful and intelligent persons, not given to mere enthusiasm, there was a strong conviction that the Spirit of God had been widely and powerfully at work. Let them pray that what was good in those revival movements might be cherished, and that what was bad might be restrained. The continuance of meetings for united prayer was a most important part of the duty of the Alliance.

Alluding to a discussion which had taken place among some members of the Alliance at the beginning of the year, he said that he thought the effect had plainly been to teach those without that the Alliance desired, while duly regardful of Christian love, at the same time to honour Christian truth. He hoped something would be said, during the day, that would show more clearly that the members of the Alliance generally had a sense of the dangers which threatened the Church of Christ on the side of latitudinarian or negative theology. The Pharisee and the Sadducee were the two classes who opposed our Saviour in the days of His flesh; and the true Church had always been exposed to the danger of despotism on the one hand, and of anarchy on the other. Another event of the year, which would naturally fix their attention, was the Geneva Conference. God had made the assembly at Geneva a local blessing; and it was an honour to the Alliance, that there, in one of the chief birthplaces of the Reformation, the blessing should have come back. What were the prospects of the Alliance for the future?

The smallness of the present gathering suggested the recollection that the society was not numerically strong, and that it included only a small proportion of the main body of the Christian army, by which the work must be done. Peculiar caution and wisdom would be needed in the guidance of the Alliance during the coming year. There would probably be a revival of the dispute on Church-rates; and the education question would very likely occupy Parliament very much during the first two months of its sitting. Another circumstance which would render caution necessary was, that next year would be the bicentenary of the separation of 2,000 ministers from the Church of England, and several of the dissenting brethren intended to make a demonstration on the occasion. Much historical discussion, tending to awaken prejudice, would take place; and it would need much wisdom to prevent such discussions from interfering seriously with the measure of union the established and dissenting clergy had already attained. All these circumstances indicated that the Alliance was not sailing altogether in smooth water, where no danger was to be apprehended, and the necessity for united prayer for wisdom to avoid the causes which might detract from the usefulness of the organization.

John Finch, Esq., in seconding the motion, said he hoped the meeting would not be alarmed at the financial balance against the Alliance. It had generally been in that position, and therefore there was no reason to suppose that so bad a state of things would act detrimentally upon its operations.

The motion was unanimously adopted.

The Rev. J. P. Dobson moved—

That this Conference expresses its earnest hope that the request for united prayer, again put forth by the Committee of this branch of the Evangelical Alliance, for the week commencing Sunday, January 5, 1862, may be complied with even more extensively than in previous years, and joined with devout thanksgiving for blessings received in former years.

He said the resolution was one which required no argument or appeal to secure its adoption. Whatever differences might exist on other grounds, he might say, without any presumption, that there was no difference in their estimation of the importance of prayer to God.

The Rev. Mr. Jenkinson, Rector of Battersea, in seconding the resolution, observed that there was nothing pressed upon us so strongly and frequently, in the Word of God, as prayer. He thought it might be said that the spirit of prayer was one of the great signs of the times; it was that from which everything good had emanated, and without which nothing could be expected.

The motion was carried unanimously.

W. H. Watson, Esq., Honorary Secretary of the Sunday-school Union, moved the list of persons to constitute the executive council for the ensuing year. He stated his belief that the placards to which the Chairman had referred had had the effect of increasing the attendance of inhabitants at the Conference of Geneva, and expressed his satisfaction with the practical character of the subjects brought before that assembly at Geneva, and the practical manner in which they were dealt with. For instance, it would be remembered that the Rev. Baptist Noel spoke on the subject of out-door preaching, and before the meeting closed arrangements were made, in accordance with which an out-door service was held on the following Sunday, and from 1,500 to 2,000 working men of the town were present on the occasion.

The Chairman: The first gathering of that kind since the Reformation.

The Rev. Holden Webb, Rector of Essendon, seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

The Conference adjourned, at half-past one, for half-an-hour.

AFTERNOON SITTING.

The proceedings were resumed at two o'clock. Prayer having been offered by the Rev. R. Eckett,

Dr. G. H. Davis, Secretary of the Religious Tract Society, said that no person could have been present at Geneva without being fully convinced of the value of the Evangelical Alliance in its foreign operations. He thought it possible that the British Organization might be made just as useful to England as the General Alliance was to Evangelical Christendom on the Continent; and acting on this feeling, he begged to submit the following resolution:—

That this Conference, composed of, and representing various Evangelical communities, who are, above all things, desirous that Evangelical truth should be preached from every pulpit of the empire and the world, cannot but express its deep regret that the names of influential clergymen should be attached to a volume entitled "Essays and Reviews"—a volume containing opinions which strike at the very foundation of the Christian verity, and of all revealed religion; and this it does for the following among other reasons:—

1. Because the influence of such a volume cannot be confined to the Church to which the writers belong, but must affect all religious organizations both at home and abroad.

2. Because most of those who have contributed to it hold, or have held, their position, with its authority and emoluments, in virtue of having entered into a solemn and public obligation to preach the faith which large portions of the volume are adapted, if not intended, to destroy.

3. Because so marked an opposition between the teaching of the volume and the public subscription of most of the writers is calculated to excite suspicion as to the integrity of clerical subscription and ministerial engagements in general, and thus to do essential injury to the conscience of the nation, and lower the standard of truthfulness throughout the land.

He thought the resolution must commend itself to every person present. They were all Evangelical Christians, desirous that the truth should be taught throughout the world, and they could but grieve that such a volume as the "Essays and Reviews" should be sent forth under such auspices. The influence of the book would most certainly extend to the whole of the Christian field. They were in the habit of complaining of the free thought among the pastors on the continent, but what would be said if this book should go forth without the clearest and most emphatic expression from the Evangelical Alliance as to the light in which it was regarded? There was one ground which he had not seen presented in any public document; but which he thought the Alliance might well take, and which it was most important to impress upon the public mind. The men who had put their names to the "Essays and Reviews" had, in the most solemn manner, pledged themselves to the Church and to the nation that they would sustain those very principles which that volume was calculated to destroy. It was impossible for this to take place without men in general asking what would become of those safeguards to the great principles of the Gospel which they supposed they possessed in the authorised standards of the National and other Churches of this country?

Major-General Alexander, in seconding the resolution, said he quite agreed with all that had been said of the book in question. He believed it was a bad book, and of world-wide malignity. He believed the protest they were sending out on the present occasion would be very beneficial, and he hoped that the opposition to the volume which had been raised in every direction would, under God's blessing, have an effect on the writers. He had heard from the best authority that one of them was very much grieved at the part he had taken—he wished he could separate himself from those with whom he had been connected, and said that he was unaware of the nature of the other essays to which his formed so admirable a preface. It was hard to doubt a man's word, and yet it was hard to believe that if such really were the case, the several parts of the book had been put together so well.

The Rev. Thomas James said he rose for the purpose of calling attention to one phrase in the resolution which he thought to be rather objectionable, that the principles enacted in the volume were calculated, "if not intended," to undermine certain truths. He did not think it became the Evangelical Alliance to employ an expression of that kind. They had no right to say that the writers of the book were not honest and sincere in their sentiments. He thought that whilst the strongest language that could possibly be used should be employed in condemning the book, they should not impute any motives to the men who had written it.

A lengthened conversation then took place, in which the Rev. R. Birks, Major-General Alexander, and the Rev. Dr. Davis took part, and at its close it was decided that the expression complained of should be struck out, and the words, "and tend directly to destroy" substituted. The resolution was then carried unanimously.

The Rev. W. Thornton, in moving the next resolution, said he thought the subject which he had to bring before the Conference was one of great importance, and one on which the testimony of the Alliance was exceedingly valuable. He felt that the Churches of the land, many of whom were represented in the Alliance, had a very strong testimony to bear with regard to the sacredness of the Lord's-day, and he was glad to find that they were all prepared to speak with very certain language with regard to the matter. The resolution he had to propose was the following:—

That the Conference has heard with the greatest satisfaction the communications addressed to the British committee of the Evangelical Alliance from Switzerland and Germany, relative to a combined action in those countries for a better observance of the Lord's-day, and charges the council to maintain an active correspondence with their foreign brethren generally, with the view of creating a sound public opinion, and abating Sabbath desecration.

Benjamin Ranyard, Esq., briefly seconded the motion, which was then carried.

The Chairman said the communications referred to in the resolution were of considerable importance. Some were from Stuttgart, some from Baden, some from German Switzerland, and were all expressive of a great desire for English sympathy in the matter. If a movement on the subject of Sabbath observance on the continent could be arranged, it would be one of the most auspicious events the Conference could hope for.

The Rev. S. Minton said he had been requested to propose the next resolution, which was to the following effect:—

That the Evangelical Alliance being constituted for the promotion of Christian union, deploras the bitterness and alienation too often connected even with unavoidable controversies between Christians, alike engaged in the work of Christ; this Conference therefore instructs the council to prepare an address to all the members of the Alliance, urging upon their prayerful attention the fundamental principles of their union, and the duty of watchfulness over their own spirits, especially in reference to the impending struggle upon Church-rates.

He said they would observe that it was not proposed to lecture the public at large, but the address was only to be presented to the members of the Alliance.

The Rev. Mr. Pullen seconded the resolution, but thought it would be advisable to omit the clause respecting Church-rates.

The Rev. J. Eckett and Professor Hoppus concurred in this opinion.

On the suggestion of the Rev. Mr. Bunting, the latter part of the resolution was omitted, and the words "especially in reference to the ecclesiastical controversies of the time" inserted in its place.

The resolution was then carried.

The Rev. Thomas James moved the following resolution:—

The Conference records its satisfaction at the steps taken at Geneva on behalf of the Christian brethren suffering religious persecution in Spain, and expresses its warm sympathy with Signor Matamoros and his fellow-prisoners, and its obligation to the friends who so kindly visited them in their prisons, at the request of the Geneva Conference. It instructs the council to take such steps as may be expedient in aiding the Geneva committee to procure the liberation of the prisoners, with the fervent hope that, by God's blessing on the prudent and judicious means adopted, their suffering brethren may be speedily set at liberty, and that recent events may be overruled for the furtherance of the Gospel in the Peninsula. At the same time, the Conference would earnestly exhort its brethren when resisting the encroachments on their religious liberties, unhappily, in some cases, by Protestant authorities, civil and ecclesiastical, to maintain invariably a moderate and respectful tone.

C. Tucker, Esq., having seconded the motion, The Chairman stated that Signor Mataros had been visited, at the request of the Geneva Conference, by the Rev. Mr. Dallas, who had a most satisfactory interview. Arrangements were now going on for a deputation to visit Madrid in reference to the matter. An address would be presented to the Cortes by some of its members, and the public press was also prepared to take up the subject. He hoped the measures that would be taken would result in the liberation of the prisoners.

The resolution was unanimously carried.

The Rev. Mr. Jenkinson said no one could have attended the Conference at Geneva without feeling assured that it was a most perfect success; he had great pleasure, therefore, in proposing the following resolution:—

That the Conference cannot close its sitting without expressing to its brethren at Geneva its warm congratulations on the success of the Fourth Conference of Christians of all Nations. It trusts that the session held, the reports read, the spirit manifested, the faithful preaching of the Gospel, both in the churches and in the open air, and, above all, the prayers offered, may issue in large blessings both to the city of Geneva and to Christendom at large. It is impossible on the present occasion to refer at length to all the important topics then discussed, such as the opening of Italy to the Gospel, the theology prevalent in German Switzerland, the afflicting circumstances of our American brethren, the influence of the Anglo-Saxon colonies, the approaching tercentenary of Calvin, and the continued detention at Rome of the boy Mortara. It pledges itself to its Swiss brethren to take every practicable measure to resist the inroads of those latitudinarian views which have been so injurious to Switzerland, and offers its co-operation to its friends in Germany, in celebrating in some worthy manner the tercentenary of Calvin's death in the year 1864.

John Henderson, Esq., seconded the resolution, which was then adopted.

On the motion of Professor Hoppus, seconded by Mr. Fortescue, the following resolution was unanimously carried:—

That the International Exhibition, to be held in London next year, seems to us a providential occasion which we are bound to use for making known the Gospel in the chief languages of Europe, and in every judicious mode, to the foreigners who visit London. The subject is entrusted to the council, with instructions to initiate an independent committee for that purpose.

The Chairman said he believed there were about eighty of their brethren on the Continent who would be prepared to come to London to assist them in this matter. The Council believed there were many movements going on, but that they were all waiting the signal for combination.

On the motion of John Henderson, Esq., seconded by Mr. McArthur, it was unanimously resolved—

That the Conference cannot allow this meeting to pass without adverting to the painful fact that this is the first Annual Conference of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance from which their beloved friend, the Rev. Dr. Steane, has been absent, and that severe affliction has withdrawn him from their councils. They desire to convey to him their Christian sympathy, and to assure him of their affectionate remembrance of his long and faithful services in their cause, and their earnest prayer that his valuable life may be spared, and his important services yet restored to the Evangelical Alliance as well as to the Church at large.

The Rev. Thomas James then offered prayer, and the Conference terminated.

PUBLIC MEETING.

The annual public meeting was held at Freemasons'-hall, on Thursday evening, Nov. 21. The chair was taken at half-past six, by the Hon. Arthur Kinnaid, M.P.

Among those on the platform were Sir Culling Eardley, Bart., the Revs. J. Minton, J. Shedlock, M.A., A. R. C. Dallas, M.A., T. R. Birks, M.A., Octavius Winslow, D.D., J. Waddington, D.D., W. W. Robinson, M.A., F. Curme, and W. Bunting, Signor Ferretti, and others.

A hymn was given out by the Rev. Aubrey Price, and sung by the assembly. Prayer was then offered by the Rev. Dr. Waddington.

The Chairman, having opened the business of the evening in an appropriate speech,

The Rev. T. R. Birks addressed the meeting on "The Importance of the Union of Christians in its Bearing on the Present Aspect of the Times." He pointed out three reasons why, even perhaps more than at the date of the foundation of the Alliance, Christians were bound to cultivate a feeling of mutual brotherly love. The first reason was that which arose from the plain marks of the blessing of God upon the means of grace, and the signs of a peculiar work and presence of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit of God was a spirit of peace and love. Another leading feature of the present times, which furnished a second powerful motive for cultivating union amongst Protestant Christians, was the state of the Papacy in the South of Europe. A third and weighty reason for the cultivation of Christian unity was the prevalence of infidelity in various forms on the Continent of Europe :—

He believed that but comparatively few were aware of the wide spread of infidel departure from the faith on the Continent, and of the prevailing character of the literature both of Germany and France; nor were they aware how deep was the under-current of scepticism, and the almost total rejection of the truth of God, even in the Papal countries of Italy and Spain. He had no doubt that in Italy and Spain nineteen out of twenty, if not ninety-nine out of a hundred, were at this moment actual disbelievers in Christianity itself, as well as in the system of Popery which had obscured its moral lineaments.

The Rev. Octavius Winslow, D.D., briefly noticed some of the objections which he said he was constantly meeting to the Evangelical Alliance.

The Rev. A. R. C. Dallas, M.A., spoke on the subject of religious persecution in Spain, and his recent visit to Matamoros and his fellow-prisoners. He gave an account of the difficulty which he and his companion had in obtaining an interview with the prisoners, in compliance with the wish of the Geneva Conference :—

After much firmness and perseverance, they succeeded, and obtained permission to remain with the prisoners as long as they liked. It was impossible to give the audience an adequate impression of the more than smile which beamed in the countenances of Matamoros and his fellow-prisoners, and of the grasp of their hand, and the look of surprise and rejoicing which they gave when he (Mr. Dallas) told them that he and his friend were Christian ministers deputed by 2,000 persons, assembled at Geneva, to visit them in their bonds for the truth, and to give them a blessing. The letter of the Conference was read to them in their own language, and one of them took notes of the passages of Scripture it contained, for future reference. After a long conversation, Mr. Dallas engaged in prayer; and upon taking leave of them, Matamoros plunged himself upon his bosom and embraced him with more of heart and more of feeling than could be expressed in words. Since that time he had had correspondence with Matamoros, and he received a letter from him the other day in answer to the letter from the Geneva Conference.

In conclusion, the reverend gentleman said he believed the imprisonment of these three men would be the means of effecting an important change in Spain, and that it would also tend very greatly to effect good among the Roman Catholics in Ireland, who had expressed much sympathy for the prisoners in Spain.

Sir Culling Eardley made some remarks on certain results of the Geneva Conference, and the state of Evangelical religion on the continent.

The Doxology was then sung, and the Rev. Mr. Robinson pronounced the Benediction, which closed the meeting.

GLASGOW DIVISION: BREAKFAST MEETING.

The first monthly meeting for the present season of the Glasgow Division of the Evangelical Alliance was held in the large hall of the Religious Institution Rooms, on the first Tuesday morning in November. About 100 ladies and gentlemen sat down to breakfast, a large attendance considering the unfavourable state of the weather. The devotional exercises were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Norman McLeod, Rev. Dr. Henderson, and Rev. William Fraser. John Henderson, Esq., of Park, presided, and, after expressing his pleasure at meeting so many friends of the Alliance, introduced the speakers of the morning—Rev. Dr. Robson, Rev. William Arnot, and the Rev. Alexander M'Ewen. The speakers, taking for granted that their audience were well read in all the published accounts of the Geneva Conference, confined their remarks to interesting personal reminiscences of their visit to the city of Calvin. All agreed in lively recollections of the hospitality extended to all the members of the Alliance, and in their conviction that a stimulus had been given by the Conference to the cause of religion in Geneva. It is impossible in this hasty notice to indicate the fine train of Christian earnestness and catholic sympathy with brethren of other names that pervaded all the addresses. Enough was said in a simple, conversational, after-breakfast way to warm the hearts of all present. The necessity for aid from British Christians to give, if possible, a right direction to the popular movement in Italy was particularly brought out, lest the Italians, in shaking off the bondage of Popery, should only become the slaves of infidelity and scepticism. Let Christians of this country be prepared with money and men to assist those already labouring there to point these wanderers to that freedom wherewith Christ makes all His people free. It is hoped that the meeting may be followed by good fruit in this respect. The chairman intimated that the next meeting will be held on Tuesday, Dec. 10.

PREFACE.

At the end of our sixteenth year of labour, and at the close of the Third Volume of the new and enlarged series of EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM, we have little to say by way of preface, but to thank God for the past, and take courage for the future. Whether the great changes going on around us—in the Church and in the publishing world—may suggest any change or enlargement of our own form and extent, we must leave to time and further experience to decide. Meanwhile, we believe that for such a journal as ours there is a special vocation in the Church of Christ, not fulfilled by any other existing periodical; but which, though with some disadvantages to contend against, we do, however imperfectly, subserve. The combination at which we aim—of specific Continental intelligence regularly, with interesting missionary details occasionally, and a survey of home and foreign progress, as well as reviews and remarks on current religious literature—has its attractions for many. And it has its occasional disadvantages, owing to the form of our publication, and the stringency of foreign postal requirements, at times of great pressure of intelligence from abroad, and of topics of intense interest in religious circles at home. We have humbly striven to reconcile these various interests to our best ability; and though occasionally carpt at by small and hasty criticism, we can appeal to the candour and kindness of our friends and readers, and to a quiet consideration of the volume just concluded; and we can fairly ask, in what other volume for 1862 will be found stored up so much of what can be referred to as world-wide interesting information, from France, Italy, and Germany more especially; as well as solid literary criticism of passing events?

But we must here leave this topic. On our theological horizon, at the close of this year, clouds and darkness seem to foreshadow a coming storm. Flagrant heresy, culminating to infidelity, within the Church, cannot end there. Society and the State have been already experiencing the baneful effects of the presence of this evil spirit, and are threatened with further disorders, most probably to terminate in convulsion. The salt of the earth alone can preserve it. The decomposition of the Church must always produce symptoms of disease in the body politic; and at its height never fails to spawn forth a host of spiritual monsters and reptiles, whose presence is danger as well as alarm. Experienced eyes are observing, with some apprehension, our present symptoms; tracing effects to causes, and prognosticating evil to come. On all sides, we hear of increased audacity of hardened crime, gigantic as well as widely-pervading monetary fraud; domestic immorality in numerous classes; and declining candidature for the ministry of the Church, as well as a suspected extension of youthful demoralisation and depravity. A corrupt, unbelieving, frivolous literature runs pari passu with these evils, whether as cause or effect, or as partly both. But deeper causes must lie beneath the surface. And if a growing morbid sentimentality be leading to a reluctance to punish sin and crime, while sin and crime are seen to increase, may we not say, "'Tis in the Church the leprosy begins?" The doctrines of Universalism have a powerful tendency to diminish the sense of sin, the fear of consequences, the incentives to virtue. The immutable rule of righteousness which the pure and unadulterated Gospel maintains, and the tremendous sanctions of eternal punishment and everlasting felicity, as the sure consequences of our character and conduct in this probative state, cannot be frittered away, diluted, or shrouded out of sight, without peril to souls, corruption in society, and ultimate danger to the State itself. Infidelity in the Church, springing out of debauched consciences—out of consciences debauched by the conflict between real convictions and unreal vows—proceeds to an inevitable and perilous issue. Nor is it doubtful but that the portentous exhibition now in progress in our National Church must at some, perhaps not remote period, terminate in the expulsion of the evil spirit or her own ruin. For it can scarcely be thought that intelligent England will tolerate the existence of an organised system of National Religion, based on perversion of or indifference to the truth which it professes, and corrupting society from the head. Revolutions like that of France, we were told, were not made with rose-water. No; the reeking blood proclaimed, however, a spiritual origin. The Rousseaus, and the Voltaires, and the d'Alemberts; the pathetically-eloquent sentimentalists; the sharp-biting, scoffing sceptics; and the cold, mathematical unbelievers—had laid the foundations of the Temple of Reason deep. History, in letters of fire and blood, has written the consequence; BUT THE CAUSE WAS THE CORRUPTION OF THE CHURCH!

We shall watch and chronicle, therefore, with deep and growing interest, the course of events; not doubting but that we are entering on a period pregnant with consequences of inestimable import to England, and to the Church of Christ throughout the world.

ASSAILANTS AND VINDICATORS OF THE SCRIPTURES.*

THERE is a well-known fable which represents a man who had two wives, one of whom was still young, and the other well stricken in years. She that was old was strongly in favour of the grey hairs which sprinkled her husband's head, and took pleasure in removing those which retained their natural colour. She that was young, on the other hand, was a great enemy to the grey hairs, which it was her delight to extirpate, and bestowed all her admiration upon those which were black. The good man submitted for some time patiently to both, but eventually discovered that between them his wives had nearly made him bald, each by expelling that against which she was prejudiced. Something not much unlike this is suffered by religion at this time. Among its avowed friends, some are in favour of that only which is ancient and venerable, and it is their constant endeavour to remove whatever they consider modern and of yesterday. But others are equally partial to that which is new and recent, and they view with half-disguised contempt the cherished opinions and practices of early days. Popery and Rationalism alike profess to be the friends of Christianity, but both alike labour to deprive it of its glory. Happily, there are those who know well how to defend the truth, and in them, under God, our hope lies. One of the leading forms of attack upon religion is represented by the first of the two volumes named below; and a good example of our faith's defenders is supplied by the second.

Mr. Wilson has been arraigned and convicted by us before of gross violence done to the Scriptures of truth. We regret to say that we must impeach him again, and this time of more flagrant misdemeanours, inasmuch as he not merely repeats in new and exaggerated forms his erroneous opinions, but associates himself with an accomplice whose destructive criticism is of the most offensive character. That any layman calling himself a member of the Church of England should be found to assail the Bible is deplorable enough, but that his assaults should be applauded and imitated by a clergyman, is an indescribable anomaly. Laymen have ably and nobly vindicated the truths of religion against its enemies, and they have won the approval and co-operation of the clergy in their endeavours; but it is happily a rare event for a clergyman and a layman to proclaim open and avowed hostility to the historical truth and doctrinal accuracy of the Holy Scriptures. We believe that Hobbes, Tindal, Toland and Woolston, were all laymen, like Lord Bolingbroke, and it has been seldom, if ever, that a clergyman has been tempted to attack the Bible. In our day the case is otherwise, and we find men in holy orders perverting their talents and denying their vows by associating their endeavours with the enemies of the faith. A strange hallucination seems to have overtaken them, and they imagine that Christianity can be stripped of the supernatural, and by diverse modifications made acceptable to an age of reason. To carry out this idea, recourse is had, above all, to criticism, and by its means it is hoped that what they think objectionable to taste, difficult of conception, and hard to reconcile or explain, will be taken out of the way. The progress of human thought and knowledge, philosophy and science, has, we are assured, been so rapid, that the Bible must either be freed from its encumbrances, or left behind. For our consolation, we remember, that previous experiments of the same kind have been often made, but never with success, and that this much maligned book was never so widely circulated and extensively read and believed as it is now. The sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, is unsheathed and doing terrible execution among the foes of our Lord and Master. At such a time we marvel at the fatuity and treason of those who claim to belong to the sacramental host, and yet volunteer to join the forlorn hope of those who would undermine the fortress of our faith. That they will fail, and miserably fail in their attempt, we have no reason to doubt, but it is well we should be alive to their movements, and to the counteracting influences by which they are foiled and thwarted. On these accounts we have resolved to call particular attention to two works which both emanate from members of the Church of England, but which are as opposed to one another as bane and antidote. It is providentially ordered that when enemies arise within the camp, faithful friends are not far distant.

* A Brief Examination of Prevalent Opinions on the Inspiration of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. By a Lay Member of the Church of England. With an Introduction by HENRY BRISTOW WILSON, B.D., Vicar of Great Staughton, Hunts. London: Longmans.

The Bible and Modern Thought. By the Rev. T. R. BIRKS, M.A., Rector of Kelshall, Herts. London: Religious Tract Society.

The book called an "Examination of Prevalent Opinions on the Inspiration of the Scriptures" first claims our attention. The author, whom we shall call the Layman, scarcely describes his book by its title. The volume is really an endeavour to show that the Pentateuch, the Gospels, and the Epistles, in particular, abound in contradictions, inconsistencies, and historical errors. No effort is made to harmonise or explain the alleged discrepancies, but they are poured out before us with the intimation that they are fatal to any claim to plenary or infallible inspiration, and that we cannot implicitly rely upon the volume which contains them. The Layman takes no notice of the works which have been published by eminent men, and designed to remove difficulties of the very class here set forth. He overlooks true interpretations, and selects false ones; he perplexes that which is plain, he hunts up and down for objections, and everywhere shows himself resolved to ruin the credit of the sacred narrative and its writers. In his introduction Mr. Wilson suggests that scientific investigation has given sight to blind theology, but we fear it has not given sight to blind criticism, for we never met with so much blundering and blindness as is revealed by the lay critic. It may be well, however, to show the line of his argument. The subjects of his five chapters are these: 1. An Examination of the Arguments urged in Defence of the Infallibility of the Holy Scriptures; 2. Argument against the Infallibility of the Gospels, from their mutual discrepancies on various points, and from other considerations; 3. Reasons for questioning the absolute and universal inspiration of the Apostolical Epistles; 4. Reasons for concluding that the author of the Pentateuch was not infallibly inspired; 5. Doctrinal consequences which may be expected to result from the admission of a fallible element in the Scriptures.

In his first chapter, the Layman can discover no a priori argument for the infallibility of the Bible; so that we must not assume that if God gives us a revelation, He will at the same time ensure a faithful and accurate record of it. He does not find that the writers of either the Gospels or the Epistles lay claim to infallibility—by which he means perfect accuracy. The power of working miracles is no pledge of such infallibility; neither does 2 Tim. iii. 16 prove it; nor finally, do Christ's declarations in the New Testament prove the infallibility of the Old. In the first place, with reference to this last point, it is affirmed that some of our Lord's statements imply the imperfection of the Old Testament; secondly, He only shared the common view, as when He called David the author of the 110th Psalm; and then, lastly, we may not have our Lord's exact words.

In the second chapter we have a long series of passages of every kind from the Gospels designed to show that differences of position and of expression constitute an insuperable objection to their perfect accuracy; in fact, that most of them are irreconcilable. On this theory, doubtless, the four Gospels ought to coincide in all respects, so far as they refer to the same events; but other, and abler critics, have found in these very differences an argument for the good faith, sincerity, and independence of the four Evangelists. Some of the alleged discrepancies have no existence except in the Layman's fancy, and the rest have been disposed of again and again.

In the third chapter the Apostolical Epistles are assailed, and the author displays an amount of daring impertinence and unbelieving misrepresentation which is appalling. He declares that the Apostles expected the second advent of Christ in their own age, and gives a catalogue of texts which seem to him to prove it. We never saw such imbecile criticism as we have here. The cause must be bad indeed which is dependent upon such subterfuges. It is in vain to reason with a man who is so determined to put a false construction upon everything. However, in a similar spirit he proceeds to discover a multitude of places in the Epistles where the reasoning is illogical and inconclusive, as well in arguments as in Old Testament quotations. The doctrinal discrepancies of the Epistles occupy its closing section.

In the fourth chapter the Pentateuch falls under the Layman's strictures. Various circumstances are appealed to to prove that Moses could not have been its author. The old story about the documents of which it is made up, is repeated, to prove that it is not an original composition, but a compilation long after Moses. Lastly, the discrepancies and improbable narratives of the Pentateuch invalidate its claim to infallible authority. And thus, by the repetition and amplification of the stale objections which have been made by infidels, deists, and rationalists, a "Lay Member of the Church of England" seeks to overthrow the credit of the Mosaic record. There is neither the effort nor the disposition to find in it any trace of beauty, truth, or divinity, but an unrelenting and undeviating purpose to show that it is unworthy of our faith.

The last chapter is occupied with inferences and quotations, with which we shall not trouble ourselves, since we can draw inferences for ourselves, and can easily exhibit a far more noble array of authorities in favour of the inspiration, authority, genuineness, and credibility of the Scriptures. Happily, our faith stands not in the wisdom of men. That sure Word has a self-evidencing power which no oppositions of science, falsely so called, can weaken, still less destroy.

We take leave of the Layman with the fervent aspiration, that by Divine grace he may be so changed as hereafter to build again the faith which he has laboured to destroy; and we return to Mr. Wilson, whose introduction naturally claims our attention after the treatise to which it is prefixed. The reverend gentleman—for so we must term him—hopes the Layman's work will not be without influence, and has many good words in its favour, none for its rebuke. He thinks that these "searching examinations" can give no reasonable offence, and do not run into wild speculations or hypotheses. He supposes the book will either modify the opinions of those who have "imbibed the notion" of the infallibility of the Scriptures in all their parts, or at least induce a charitable regard for the opinions of others, who have too much to say to be put down or put aside as incompetent, hasty, or unchristian. In any case, the book must be examined upon its merits, and various important consequences will follow, both in regard to the clergy and the laity. He truly says that these questions are "infinitely more momentous than disputes concerning rubrics, or black or white vestments, or even concerning sacraments and successions." They are more momentous, and therefore men should be very careful how they handle them, lest it be found that they are profanely meddling with the ark of the Lord. We say nothing about the supernatural influence attributed to an episcopally-ordained clergy, but by what right does Mr. Wilson rail at preaching the necessity of a sensible conversion in order to salvation? If the Bible is true, men must be converted, and the change must be supernatural, and its effects must be felt. To deny this is to deny the experience of millions of Christians, and the work of the Holy Spirit in changing the hearts and lives of men. No wonder that Mr. Wilson suggests that the Bible gives a false account of the fall of man in the Old Testament, and false inferences from it in the New. No wonder that he thinks the Bible gives false views of the Divine Being, not unlike those in Homer to which pagan Plato objected. No wonder that he declaims against a superstitious reverence for the letter of the Bible. No wonder even that he throws out the dark infidel suggestions contained in these two sentences: "As God is believed to have acted in history, so will it be expected He will act in the individual. If He manifests Himself by interference in nature, and by signs and wonders in history, He will doubtless operate by supernatural conversion of the corrupt heart in His dominion of grace." He is speaking of false notions of the Deity, and of the effects they produce; but these false notions are those of God's Word, and therefore in attacking them he is denying it. Of course he knows better than the Bible, and prefers his "growing conviction of law, order," etc., to those "many scriptural narratives, which, from being left unexplained, had led to a conception of the power of God as chiefly manifested in overruling and superseding the course of nature." We venture to flatly contradict the assertion that the Scriptures lead to any such conception; and affirm that they exhibit Him as the Creator, and manifesting His eternal power and Godhead in His works, and as ruling in the changes of the seasons and of the times; upholding all things by the Word of His power, and the like. They do show Him as performing special acts, and for great and wise purposes interfering with the regular order, but never say that His power is chiefly manifested in such exceptional acts.

Mr. Wilson may cavil and argue as long as he is disposed over the meaning of certain Church documents, but common sense will never receive his conclusions, opposed as they are to all fair and candid principles of interpretation. The rules which he lays down would open the door to every possible form of opinion, and deprive the books to which they are applied of all definite meaning. But since our concern is at present with the Bible, we shall no further interfere in this matter, and others resembling it. According to George Herbert, "the chief and top of" the parson's "knowledge consists in the Book of books, the storehouse and magazine of life and comfort, the Holy Scriptures. There he sucks and lives." Of the four means he uses for understanding the Scriptures, one is "a diligent collation of Scripture with Scripture. For all truth being consonant to itself, and all being penned by one and the selfsame Spirit, it cannot be but that an industrious and judicious comparing of place with place must be a singular help to the right understanding of the Scriptures." Thus far the divine Herbert, who would be confounded to learn that this very principle of comparison is only fitted to bring out inconsistencies and things incredible. A few days after the publication of this volume Mr. Wilson had to say in his place before his flock at Great Staughton the collect. commencing, "Blessed Lord, who has caused all Holy Scriptures to be written for our learning." Every Sunday he has to declare that God "pardoneth and absolveth all them that unfeignedly believe His Holy Gospel." And during the very time that these pages are written the lessons from the New Testament contain some of the most explicit declarations respecting the inspiration of those very Scriptures which Mr. Wilson profanely calls "a natural product in the spiritual domain," appealing to the very prayer above quoted to show that he is right. "Our own Church," he says, "instead of 'Blessed Lord, who hast given all Holy Scriptures by inspiration,' teaches us to say, 'who hast caused all Holy Scriptures to be written.'" What arrant quibbling! Henceforth Locke's dying declaration, so oft quoted, must fall to the ground—viz., that the Bible "has God for its Author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter." The judicious Hooker must in future be called injudicious, for he says in the 5th book of his Ecclesiastical Polity that "Moses and the Prophets, Christ and His Apostles, were in their times all preachers of God's truth; some by word, some by writing, some by both; this they did partly as faithful witnesses, making mere relation what God Himself had revealed unto them, and partly as careful expounders, teachers, persuaders, thereof," &c. Even the Papist will have an advantage over us, for while he denies the perfection of Scripture, he can appeal to tradition and authority; but when our Bible is degraded or dismembered, we have nothing left but that reason which these men so glorify, but which others have so warned us against. Yet, as Sir Richard Baker says, "these mighty pretenders have no truer ground to go upon than other men: they plead for right reason, but they mean their own; in the meantime, they take from us our surest guide, and religion suffers by their contentions about it." The endeavour to subjugate revelation to reason is an old one, and hence Sir Roger L'Estrange says: "Our controversies about religion have brought at last even religion itself into controversy. The schoolmen have spun the thread too fine, and made Christianity look liker a course of philosophy than a system of faith and supernatural revelation; so that the spirit of it co-operates into niceties and exercises of the brain; and the contention is not for truth, but victory."

We do not expect opinions like these to have much influence with the school to which Mr. Wilson belongs. There is little hope of a man who can speak so freely of "the scientific defects of the Scriptures," of "prodigies contradictory both to scientific knowledge and to ordinary experience," and of accepting "the moral standard of the writers of all Biblical histories as if it were perfect, as if it were the same throughout," as "most pernicious." He speaks of the literary and historical contradictions of the Bible, objects to various miracles and prophecies, and talks of the "physical, the psychological, the moral, the theological contradictions of which we are sensible in the narratives themselves." The expressions, "Thus saith the Lord," or "The word of the Lord," &c., were probably "customary formulas," even in the case of true prophets. The Jews, in the conquest of Canaan, "were, in reality, only working out ultimate providential designs by the play of their own passions," and, of course, merely "imagined they had express Divine command to expel the nations of Canaan." There are passages in which he thinks "tradition has done dishonour both to God Himself and possibly to His servants." But we refrain from further garnishing our pages with language so utterly opposed to that reverence and faith which we have always cherished, and so strongly resembling the reproaches of infidels and secularists.

Let us, then, proceed to remark, that the defence of the truth is certain, and its triumph sure. To their own satisfaction some may destroy the Divine authority and credit of the Old and New Testaments, but there is within our reach a body of evidences in their favour so strong, that unbelief cannot hope to prevail. Mr. Wilson and others can repeat the old story about clerical defenders of the Bible acting from interested motives, in an official capacity, and because they are paid for it. It is all very well when men are defeated to object to their conquerors; it would be strange if they did not. But the great point is the victory of right over wrong; and whether it be gained by volunteers or the regular forces, it is none the less victory. Of course it is to be expected that they who are set for the defence of the Gospel should be foremost in the time of peril; and equally to be expected that they should have advantages which the undisciplined and amateurs commonly have not. Nothing but conscious weakness, an apprehension of failure, or absurd prejudice, can prompt these glorifications of the irregulars at the expense of the regulars in theological polemics. If the clergy are not to speak on these great questions, who have a right to speak? If they are not qualified to express an opinion upon the true character of the Scripture documents, who are qualified? Of course there are exceptions on both sides, but we must not allow artful controversialists to throw dust in our eyes, and to persuade us that laymen alone can fairly and honestly and properly carry on this conflict.

Mr. Birks is one of the clergy, and, in spite of the ridiculous prejudice just referred to and favoured by Mr. Wilson, takes his position among the defenders of the faith. We have no reason to be ashamed of him. There is a candour, simplicity, truthfulness and courtesy in his manner, which entirely disarms suspicion that he is merely writing professionally, and because his "craft is in danger." Nothing of the kind; he writes like a scholar, a gentleman, and a Christian. He takes up one after another of the great points in dispute; and while he demolishes the strongholds of his adversaries, he establishes the truth and divinity of the Holy Scriptures. There is a remarkable contrast between Mr. Birks and Mr. Wilson in the matter of clearness and directness. The former has nothing to deny or to disguise; while the latter is driven to convey his meaning, very often, in dark hints, ambiguous expressions, and amid a mass of verbiage. The former takes high ground in speaking of the nature and need of Divine revelation, while the latter ventures to say that "it would be difficult to prove" that we can "know more of the Absolute and Infinite One by supernatural revelation than by natural inlet." The former teaches that man needs and can have the aid of the Holy Spirit to enlighten him; while the latter so reasons as to ignore and exclude it. Mr. Wilson and the Layman treat the Bible everywhere as the book of man; while Mr. Birks continually regards it as the book of God. He truly shows that the great question is whether Christianity is human or Divine? But he does not leave us without an answer, still less with the dark insinuations of unbelief. He appeals to the book, and demonstrates that just as the child of God has the witness in himself, so the Word of God has the witness in itself. He cannot, of course, view the authority of the Lord Jesus and His Apostles as inferior to his own, which the other writers do, for they demand that the Bible as a whole shall be subject to the approval or disapproval of each man for himself. In his chapter on miracles Mr. Birks answers the too famous essay of Baden Powell, whose rehabilitation of the threadbare arguments of Hume is once more disposed of, while the whole subject is placed in a satisfactory light. Another point is the historical truth of the Scriptures, which is examined with fairness, learning, and judgment. Not only miracles, but prophecies, are shown to be a reality, and the genuineness of some of the prophetic writings is confirmed. Mr. Birks treats of Inspiration at considerable length, and we regard this as, for thoughtful readers, one of the most useful portions of the volume. His statement of the true principles of Biblical interpretation is judicious and instructive, and deserves the very thoughtful consideration of the Scripture student. A chapter on alleged discrepancies of the Bible reminds us at every step of the volume above described. Nothing can be more straightforward and intelligible than Mr. Birks' statement of the case, and we feel sure that all who will calmly read it will admit that it is well calculated to remove the tendency to such unreasonable doubts and cavillings as abound in the other volume. The advocate of revelation is most reasonable, while the opponents of revelation are far otherwise. So also in the chapter on the Bible and modern science, we have been most gratified with the broad and wise discussion of the subject here exhibited. How any men in their senses, to say nothing of Christians, can reject the facts and considerations brought forward, we do not understand. Mr. Birks has more than made it plain that believing critics are not arguing either against facts or common sense, but that they take into account all the circumstances of the case, and have the highest probabilities in their favour. We are much pleased with this portion of the work, and recommend it to careful study. The concluding chapters, on the Bible and natural conscience, the historical and doctrinal unity of the Scriptures, and on Christianity as a progressive scheme, are all excellent. Throughout the work the author wisely takes high ground, and yet displays his moderation and good sense, by avoiding speculative and extreme views. The faith once delivered to the saints is what he has endeavoured to defend, and he has done it nobly and well. It cannot be that a faith which is capable of such defence is effete and ready to perish, or has anything to fear from such assaults as that of Mr. Wilson and his lay friend. Blessed be God, we have a more sure word of prophecy, and one which comes from Him who cannot lie. Our faith rests not on the sandy foundations of tradition, ignorance, and superstition, nor on the ground of mere human learning, science, and reason, but it rests upon a rock. Bitterly, then, as we lament the spectacle of a clergyman uniting with a layman in seeking to overthrow the authority and credit of the Scriptures, we rejoice to know that the Word of the Lord shall endure for ever.

THE WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

In our number for August last we published a circular addressed to Christians everywhere, asking them to set apart for special prayer the week commencing January 5, 1862. By this time that appeal has reached the most distant parts of the earth, and has been translated and published in divers tongues. We have no doubt of the result which will follow, and confidently expect that the Church of the living God will plead earnestly with Him for the objects recommended. The beloved Apostle saw in the visions of the Apocalypse, "And lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood near the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands, and they cry with a loud voice, saying, The salvation of our God to him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb." We shall see no such great sight, but our imagination will depict the sacramental host of God's elect, scattered throughout all lands, prostrate before the mercy-seat, and crying aloud unto Him that sitteth thereon for blessings to fall upon the wide, wide world. Let us hastily recal to our memories the suggestions made in the original circular. It was recommended that the great theme of preaching on the first Sunday of the New Year should be the Holy Ghost, and that the special object of prayer should be for a blessing upon the services to follow. On Monday, humiliation and confession will be accompanied by praise and thanksgiving. On Tuesday, supplication will be specially made for Britain, and on Wednesday for foreign objects. Thursday will be set apart for petitions for the Church and its ministers. Friday for the spread and triumph of the Word of God; and Saturday, for the better observance of the Lord's-day. The whole series will be concluded on Sunday, the 12th, by special sermons on the signs, dangers, and duties of the times. It is not needful for us to urge upon our friends as far as possible compliance with the foregoing order, that all may not only feel they are of one mind, but are holding as it were a simultaneous prayer-meeting throughout the world. There is something singularly appropriate and encouraging in the recognition of the Holy Ghost so prominently at a time when infidelity and mere Rationalism are denying His blessed influences, as well as His Divine personality. With reference to the other topics of prayer, meditation, or discourse, there can be but one opinion, that they are urgent, important, and well-chosen. We do not think the list complete, and, indeed, it could not anticipate circumstances which have since arisen. The additions we suggest are, in particular, three—First, that besides the special thanksgiving for recent religious awakenings, on Monday, January 6th, there should be general thanksgiving for personal, domestic, and national blessings, as well temporal as spiritual. Secondly, we would add to the objects indicated for home, on the 7th, prayer for the Queen and Royal Family, in view of the painful and mysterious bereavement which has occurred by an inscrutable Providence. Thirdly, on Wednesday, in addition to the prayer for general peace, and specially for peace in the American States, we recommend that earnest supplication should be offered for the establishment and perpetuity of pacific relations between Great Britain and the Northern States. At the same time, the interests of continental nations might be properly represented at the Throne of Grace.

The Evangelical Alliance issues a second or renewed invitation to special and united prayer, and that document will be found in our present number. With its spirit and intention we heartily concur. It truly suggests the great need of humility. The great prevalence of self-seeking, and other dangerous dispositions, which interfere with mutual confidence, love, and co-operation, is greatly to be deplored, and an evil which calls for renewed vigilance and prayerfulness in the Church of God. The evil in question is injurious, not only to those who exemplify it, but to others, and the worldliness and selfishness of believers is the great stumbling-block to the worldly, the thing which weakens the hands and heart of the workers in Christ's vineyard.

Other matters for devout and earnest faithful consideration are, the fitness and desirableness of the agencies now in operation in the Church, and how they can be improved; whether there is a due proportion observed between prayer and effort; whether our faith in the inspired Word is accompanied by an intelligent conception of the need, nature, and reality of the direct influence of the Holy Spirit; whether there is in our creed a want of harmony and the presence of onesidedness, which arises from partial apprehensions of the truth, or a prejudice in favour of particular doctrines. Especially would we urge our brethren to reflect very prayerfully upon the best means for counteracting those unbelieving and unscriptural principles which are at this time taught so openly both in this country and upon the Continent—in France, Holland, Switzerland, &c. America has already been alluded to. Italy must not be lost sight of—as at this time presenting a spectacle second to none in interest and importance. We must go on praying and labouring for Italy, till we can repeat the apostolic greeting yet more fully—"They of Italy salute you." O, may He, who has all hearts in His hand, pour out abundantly upon His Church the spirit of grace and supplication and true wisdom, that the ensuing week may be fraught with glorious and blessed results!

THE LATE DR. BUNTING.

THE memory of the late revered Dr. Bunting is agreeably revived by the publication of a collection of his sermons.* It cannot be expected that these sermons, even under the skilful editorship of the Rev. W. L. Thornton, will convey to those who never knew the preacher when in the height of his power as a pulpit orator any adequate impression of his excellence; neither is it our present intention to dwell on them any further than as they present some traces of character long familiar to the religious world. For although Dr. Bunting was regarded as the most eminent and influential man in the Wesleyan Conference, and singularly devoted to the interests of his own Church, he seemed scarcely less absorbed in the cause of catholic charity when he appeared in the character of a founder and honorary secretary of the Evangelical Alliance. Indeed, his position in relation to his own Conference rendered his attachment to the Alliance so much the more valuable. It was not the adherence of a sentimental unionist, seeking beyond his proper circle attentions which he could not gain within it, but the devotion of a leading spirit, bent on consecrating well-earned influence to the promotion of that unity for which the Saviour prayed.

With Dr. Jabez Bunting this catholicity was a matter of established principle. It had distinguished him when a very young man, and appeared everywhere, but nowhere more conspicuously than in his preaching, of which the printed sermons contain abundant evidence. In the year 1813 the Wesleyan Missionary Society was first fully organised, and he was one of the few who launched out beyond the limits of ecclesiastical precedent in the formation of a general committee, and in the holding of public missionary meetings. A few weeks after the first meeting in Leeds he preached for the new society in Halifax, and on that occasion pronounced a kind of manifesto of the liberal policy on which he and his colleagues were proceeding. He rejoiced that some were hearty in the missionary cause, which, in those days, even good men too often regarded with mistrust, and treated with something worse than indifference. He reminded his hearers that various Christian denominations had employed a portion of their resources and labours in endeavouring to enlarge the boundaries of the Church, and to carry the battles of the Lord into the territories of His enemies. The Church of England, he said, had her Societies for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and for Missions to Africa and the East. The Calvinistic brethren of various denominations had their London Missionary Society, whose enterprises God had very greatly honoured. The Baptists had an East Indian Mission, in which some venerable men, of whom the world was not worthy, and whose illustrious names would be repeated with ecstasy when those of their infidel calumniators should be forgotten, were labouring with distinguished fidelity and zeal. The patient and self-denying Moravians had establishments in various heathen nations, among whom they were shining as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life. And urging on his audience these examples, he modestly reminded them that the Methodists, too, being debtors to the savage and the civilised, to the wise and to the unwise, had already done something for Christ and His cause abroad, as well as much at home.

* Sermons by Jabez Bunting, D.D. Vol. I. Mason.

Years afterwards he became one of the general secretaries of the society, and brethren of his who sustained similar offices in relation to other societies yet survive to testify that his recognition of their labours never ceased to be equally explicit and cordial, and that he never sought to push his missionaries over their own boundaries into the territories occupied by theirs, nor ever encouraged them in any procedure which might seem to be at variance with the professions of equity and mutual consideration which it is often so easy—not to say convenient—to lavish from the pulpit and the platform, yet so difficult to carry into practice. And it is gratifying to believe that the same principle has hitherto actuated the directors of most of our great missionary societies who act in concert with each other in the superintendence of recently-planted churches throughout the world.

It is not necessary, however, to dwell at greater length on this feature in the character of Dr. Bunting, as reflected in the volume before us. It is well known that his influence in Wesleyan Methodism was nearly dominant so long as he had strength left to take part in the direction of affairs. Looking back on the time when he was in the full vigour of his early manhood, and when there was no large number of his peers competent to encounter him in debate, or to vie with him in action, we perceive that the denomination of which he became so brilliant an ornament abounded in those defects which are incident to all infant communities. The common mind of Methodism, much like the common mind of England in general, had not attained to any high degree of culture, and a lack of intellectual culture did undoubtedly detract from the usefulness of zealous, and otherwise excellent people, especially in the humbler classes of society. Then, even more than now, there was prevalent in some districts of the country a boisterous irreverence in Divine worship, which provoked the contempt of the ungodly, the disgust of sober-minded persons, and the grief and shame of many Wesleyans, both ministers and laymen. Yet they knew not how to stem the torrent of sanctimonious profanity. John Wesley would have expelled scores of such religious rioters with one stroke of his pen; but after Wesley no one had arisen to wield the like authority, and few possessed the moral courage necessary to brave the accusation of crushing a revival of religion by putting to silence those mock revivalists. In truth, there was no revival in such excesses, but only death to all godly principle. Bunting, however, could be master; he never courted popularity, but how fearlessly he would stand in the breach when God's honour was imperilled, many of his survivors know, and how plainly he would speak may be inferred from one example. At the opening of St. Philip's Chapel, in Bristol, and on several similar occasions, he delivered an exquisitely-written and most scriptural sermon on the words of the Psalmist: "God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of them that are about him!" Such occasions were most suitable for plain dealing on this subject, and thus he delivered himself:—

"Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools; for they consider not that they do evil. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God, for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few." The reverential style of expression which I am now recommending is grievously violated by many; particularly by such as do not hesitate to apply to God or to Christ, in their prayers and praises, those amorous and luscious appellatives, those epithets, expressive of the fondness of human passion, which, it has been well said, "must revolt a man who feels that he cannot meet the same being at once on terms of adoration and of caressing equality." We Methodists are without excuse if we do not guard against this species of presumption, after the convincing testimony which Mr. Wesley has borne against it in his beautiful sermon, "On knowing Christ after the flesh"—a sermon which every one of us should read and study, before taking any active part in conducting either our social or our public worship—that reverential solemnity which should characterise our prayers and our hymns should also be maintained in the composition of those melodies in which the high praises of God are celebrated. "Religious harmony," says Jeremy Collier, quoted by Bishop Horne, "must be moving, but noble withal—grave, solemn, and seraphic—fit for a martyr to play, and an angel to hear." How contrary to this are the light and fantastic movements of some modern tunes—more suitable for the ballroom or the theatre than to those holy places and holy subjects with which they have been profanely associated! Under pretence of promoting Christian cheerfulness and zeal, they have excited a spirit of levity more akin to the mirth of fools than to the calm and chastened joy of saints. This error, I confidently hope, will be studiously avoided by those to whose lot it will fall to conduct the devotional harmony of this place.

Many such faithful exhortations as this contributed to raise the standard of devotional sentiment among the Wesleyans, whom, however, we do not by any means mark as needing them above all others; but, on the contrary, regret to observe that there are congregations of every name to whom they are but too applicable; and indeed it is to be feared that the evil complained of many years ago by Dr. Bunting has much increased of late, and by prevalence is grown familiar. But if the ministrations of the Word of God are clear and practical—if men possessing clear views of Divine truth and of human obligations will set forth those views, and will enforce on the myriads who assemble in our congregations the performance of duty as well as the acknowledgment of truth—the worship of God will be performed more intelligently, and the devotion of the Church of Christ will deepen, just as the standard of public teaching rises higher. The perusal of sermons like these of Dr. Bunting cannot but tend to raise the standard. They are not all of equal merit, simply because it was not the intention of the preacher to elaborate them all with equal care. For special occasions he prepared such discourses as he would not desire to deliver in the ordinary course, when much was to be left to the impulse of the moment, much to be supplied or substituted as the very different character of his numerous congregations might render necessary. And often were the extemporaneous outpourings of his full heart more effectual than the "great sermons," which, however admirable when read, cannot possibly convey to any reader the stirring energy which breathed in every utterance of this impassioned, overpowering, yet most self-possessed preacher, whose praise lives in all the churches, and whose memory it still is our delight to honour.

A CAUTION.—Excitement that does not proceed from the influence of truth on the heart, and lead towards the obedience of truth in the life, is the fever of a diseased soul, and not the evidence of increasing life. To stimulate this, is as much to hinder grace as if you should attempt to make a dying man well by filling him with alcohol. The fever may look and act exceedingly like healthy religion; but it will either mount at last to wild derangement, or pass off, and leave the subjects more perfectly prostrate and helpless than ever. I conceive that clear conceptions of the nature and genuine means of real, spiritual excitement, as distinguished from every counterfeit, are much needed, in order that revivals may be protected against the weakness of the flesh, and the forgeries of Satan.—Bishop Macilvaine.

THE CHINESE CLASSICS.*

A VERY handsome volume, the proposed precursor of several others, by a laborious missionary of the London Missionary Society, calls for an especial notice in the pages of Evangelical Christendom. Differences of opinion amongst religious people, as to the proper qualifications of missionaries, and as to the propriety or expediency of their attention to literary labours, are notorious. These differences, in some cases, go to the root of the matter; being not mere questions of degree or of detail, but questions of principle. Perverting the true intent of the Apostle Paul's contemptuous estimate of the boasted wisdom of this world, some good women, and some good men too, of our times, appear often to disparage or to doubt the value of native intellectual gifts, or acquired mental accomplishments and powers, in those who, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, are advancing the kingdom of the Redeemer upon earth. Learned forms of infidelity and heresy are indeed not uncommon in our day; and Rationalistic speculators, no doubt, are seen often to possess considerable powers of mind, as well as much perverted learning. (A stupid, dull, and unlearned heretic would certainly not be a very formidable operator.) But it approaches the borders of humiliation to be obliged to argue that drivelling is not therefore the only safeguard against intellectual pride, nor unlettered ignorance the best antidote to perverted erudition. Victorious Grace may surely be allowed her triumphs over the noblest intellects and the vastest acquirements. Combined mental power, extensive learning, humble piety, and glowing zeal, present a trophy surely not much less intrinsically glorious, than when mean sentiments and narrow comprehensions are just redeemed from utter worthlessness and vulgarity by the power and presence of true religion. Let it not be imagined that we are indulging in mere uncontroverted truisms, or fighting shadows, in these remarks. The circles are neither few nor uninfluential in which a vigorous logic, or high linguistic attainments, by religious men, clergymen, or missionaries, are regarded with something of suspicion, mingled with dislike and dread. There is a grand mistake, and some peril afloat, in this respect. Theology ought to be the queen of sciences; and her court cannot dispense with true philosophy, literature, and languages, her proper handmaidens. Nor would the permitted monopoly of learning by heretical or sceptical men be the most promising phenomenon as regards a pure Gospel for the unlearned and poor themselves. But, at all events, whatever may be urged in favour of a learned clergy, missionaries, it is often said, have no leisure, or ought to have no leisure, for scientific pursuits. And, therefore, scientific acquirements are, pro tanto, needless for them, and a waste. We are glad to perceive that in several influential quarters grovelling notions of this kind are fast getting discountenanced. The great missionary societies are not likely to follow the "sensation" examples of certain cliques, or to be always agape for quasi miracles and visible fulfilments of sorely misunderstood prophecies. The less they do so the better it will be for themselves and for the Gospel cause. A missionary ought to be the highest style of man or minister. Gifts as well as graces, of the first order, ought to be coveted earnestly for those who lead the van of the spiritual host on earth. Christianity is the true regenerator of the whole individual man, and of the entire race socially also. And missionaries ought to be the pioneers and promoters of science, hand in hand with the Gospel, throughout the world. In fact, they have been so. And we believe it would be found, on close inquiry, that the most efficient labourers in the purely spiritual field have been, on the whole, or on the average of numbers, those who also have done most to shed a brilliant lustre upon the missionary character and name in the fields of natural and scientific inquiries and studies.

Of Dr. Legge, whose book we are about to notice, we know nothing except what we learn from its contents. The volume before us is a creditable testimonial to his industry and talents, and reflects honour upon the society by whom he is employed. We do not, however, gather from the statements of this book that it has been produced at the cost of sacrificing other and higher duties and labours. Far from it. He himself modestly states that "he hopes he can say that it did not divert him from the usual active labours of a missionary in preaching and teaching; but it did not allow him to rest satisfied in any operations of the time then being." And again: "His directly missionary labours are the chief business of his life, and require, of course, his chief attention." It is not necessary, therefore, either to exalt unduly the value of scientific labour, or to depreciate that of simple and direct evangelization, in order that we may justify the devotion of leisure times to the honourable labours of which we have the specimen fruit before us. Dr. Legge arrived in the East, as a missionary, towards the end of 1839, and was stationed at Malacca for between three and four years. Before leaving England he had enjoyed the benefit of a few months' instruction in Chinese from the late Professor Kidd, at the University of London, and was able, in the beginning of 1840, to commence the study of the first of the works in the present publication. The view of his duties which then suggested itself to his mind so very strikingly agrees with the opinions which we have advanced in this journal (though not without opposition), that we must quote his words. Dr. Legge says: "It seemed to him then—and the experience of one-and-twenty years gives its sanction to the correctness of the judgment—that he should not be able to consider himself qualified for the duties of his position until he had thoroughly mastered the classical books of the Chinese, and had investigated for himself the whole field of thought through which the sages of China had ranged, and in which were to be found the foundations of the moral, social, and political life of the people." With these views he proceeded with his laborious engagements, not without interruptions and difficulties. And after sixteen years of diligent study, he proposed, in the absence of any similar undertaking by experienced Chinese scholars, to attempt the publication himself of such a work as he felt to be a great desideratum. The funds, however, were still wanting for such an expensive publication; but were not to be wanting long. A casual mention of the project to the Rev. Josiah Cox, of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, caused the matter to be made known to the late Mr. Joseph Jardine, who sent for the author, and very generously undertook to bear the expenses of carrying the work through the press. "I know," said Mr. Jardine, "I know the liberality of the merchants in China, and that many of them would readily give their help to such an undertaking; but you need not have the trouble of canvassing the community. If you are prepared for the toil of the publication, I will bear the expense of it. We make our money in China, and we should be glad to assist in whatever promises to be of benefit to it." These nobly-liberal sentiments and conduct of the British merchant, who is now no more, deserve to be recorded and to be imitated. To him we and China are indebted for the excellent volume before us, and for the hope that, if God will, it may be followed by at least six others, as indicated in the preface to the work. The second volume is also now in the press, or may, indeed, have even been published in Hong-Kong before the present date, as announced in the preface also.

The books now recognised in China as of highest authority are comprehended, we are told, under the denominations of "The Five King" and "The Four Shoo." The term King signifies the warp threads of a web, and their adjustment. "It is used to denote what is regular, and insures regularity. And with reference to books, indicates their authority on the subjects of which they treat." Though somewhat similar, therefore, to the later use of the Latin Textus, it seems to mean more. The term Shoo simply means writings or books. "The Five King" are the five Canonical works containing the truth upon the highest subjects, from the sages of China, and which should be received as law by all generations. More particularly these are: 1. The Yih, or the "Book of Changes." 2. The Shoo, or "Book of History." 3. The She, or "Book of Poetry." 4. The Le Ke, or "Record of Rites." 5. The Ch'un T'ew, or "Spring and Autumn," a chronicle of events from 721 to 480 B.C. The authorship, or compilation of all these works, is loosely attributed to Confucius, but it is only the last which can be rightly described as of his own making, some of the others being merely compiled by him, and part being clearly by later hands. The four Shoo is an abbreviation for "The Books of the Four Philosophers," and consist of, first, the Lun Yu, or "Digested Conversations," being occupied chiefly with the sayings of Confucius, who is the philosopher to whom it belongs. This book appears in Dr. Legge's work under the title of "Confucian Analects." The second Shoo is the Ta Hse, or "Great Learning," now commonly attributed to Tsang Sin (a disciple of the sage), who is the philosopher of this book. The third is the Chung Fung, or "Doctrine of the Mean," ascribed to K'ung Keih, the grandson of Confucius. The fourth contains the works of Mencius.

The authority of the Chinese classics is discussed (from historical materials) by our author in an interesting chapter of his prolegomena; and the inquiry conducts us to the conclusion that the materials from which they, as they have come down to us, were compiled and edited in the two centuries preceding our Christian era were genuine remains, going back to a still more remote period. Accordingly, we have in these books what the great sage of China and his disciples gave to their country more than 2,000 years ago! The literary history of the works themselves, though a subject of much interest, and well handled, we need not notice further than by referring our readers to the prolegomena. The works now published are the "Confucian Analects," the "Great Learning," and the "Doctrine of the Mean," all of which, and more especially the last, are ably reviewed by Dr. Legge. We are introduced therein to a system of moral philosophy, the foundation of which is laid on the bubble of self-sufficing human nature, and the superstructure a proud and empty dream of human perfectibility. The patent facts which demonstrate the true condition of our race are ignored; and, as must always be the case where the truth of the fall and corruption of man's nature is either unknown or unacknowledged, the results are preposterous. Man's apotheosis of himself is the natural conclusion, "I am a god; yea, I sit in the seat of God." What Dr. Legge calls "these gorgeous, but unsubstantial, pictures of sagely perfection," have, as he observes, no doubt contributed to nourish the pride of the Chinese; and the system is antagonistic to Christianity. "By-and-bye, when Christianity has prevailed in China, men will refer to it as a striking proof how their fathers, by their wisdom, knew neither God nor themselves." Remarkable enough it is that, what a total ignorance of revealed truth led to in China ages ago, a total denial of revealed truth has led, and is leading, to in Europe in our own times. But whatever may be the excuse of the Chinese, our times are without excuse.

Meanwhile, it is exceedingly interesting to follow the workings of the human mind, as exhibited in these Chinese books, secluded as the writers were, and deprived of all help from revelation, or even from the wisdom of other nations. Confucius, or Kung Foo-tsze (which means "The Master" Kung) the descendant of a long line of sages, is the chief character delineated. Whatever materials be derived from antiquity, he seems to have remoulded and stamped upon them a new image and superscription. A statesman as well as a philosopher, a reformer in politics and religion, he was, no doubt, a light in the darkness, though, after all, a feeble one. Instructive indeed is his life, and in nothing perhaps more so than in the fact that all his disappointments in the application of his principles seem never to have led him to the verge of any suspicion that there was error or fallacy in these principles, or to a gleam of the great truth of the corruption of man's nature, and its departure from original righteousness. "His end was not unimpressive, but it was melancholy. He sank behind a cloud. Disappointed hopes made his soul bitter. The great ones of the empire had not received his teachings. No wife nor child was by him to do the kindly offices of affection for him. Nor were the expectations of another life present with him, as he passed through the dark valley. He uttered no prayer, and he betrayed no apprehensions. Deep treasured in his own heart may have been the thought that he had endeavoured to serve his generation by the will of God, but he gave no sign." The third section of Dr. Legge's prolegomena on the Life of Confucius, his influence and opinions, and his immediate disciples, bring together a mass of readable information in a limited space, such as cannot, we believe, be found elsewhere. And, after a perusal of the whole, we think it is impossible not to concur with the Doctor's opinion, who says: "Somehow he is less a sage to me after I have seen him at his table, in his undress, in his bed, and in his carriage." And again: "I hope I have not done him injustice; but, after a long study of his character and opinions, I am unable to regard him as a great man. He was not before his age, though he was above the mass of the officers and scholars of his time.

He threw no new light on any of the questions which have a world-wide interest. He gave no impulse to religion. He had no sympathy with progress. His influence has been wonderful, but it will henceforth wane. My opinion is, that the faith of the natives in him will speedily and extensively pass away." Of course, if the Sun of Righteousness shall rise upon the Chinese, the dim twilight or darkness of nature will soon fade. And that in the most important aspects the best light of Confucius was but darkness, is evident from the melancholy that breaks out on many occasions from the depths of his feelings. We have a piece of poetry by him, which runs thus:—

Through the valley howls the blast,
Drizzling rain falls thick and fast;
Homeward goes the youthful bride
O'er the wild, crowds by her side.
How is it, O azure Heaven,
From my home I thus am driven,
Through the land my way to trace,
With no certain dwelling-place?
Dark, dark the minds of men!
Worth in vain comes to their ken;
Hastens on my term of years,
Old age desolate appears.

The truth is, that life and immortality being brought to light only by the Gospel, that precious revelation alone can give solid joy and hope to the human heart. But while viewing Confucius and his disciples and their philosophy in the light of our higher and happier dispensation, these are our conclusions; there is still much worthy of our attention in the writings now unlocked for us by Dr. Legge. Though the deeper problems of humanity be left unsolved, and, indeed, untouched, there are views and moral maxims of sound common sense, and often of a shrewd originality, which will repay our study. It is also something to be disabused of certain erroneous or exaggerated fancies as to the real attainments of Confucius, which have ere now been assiduously circulated in desired disparagement of the unapproached morality of the New Testament. Even with reference to what is called the golden rule of the Saviour, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you," which, it has been strongly stated, was enunciated by Confucius four centuries before Christ, something of abatement from that assertion is necessary. Curiously enough, Confucius only gives the precept in the negative form. He only says, do nothing to others which you would not have done to you. Our Lord's injunction is in the positive form. The rule of Confucius forbids injury. The rule of Jesus enjoins doing good. Dr. Legge well remarks, also, that so far as the point of priority is concerned, Christ adds, "This is the law and the prophets." The maxim was to be found substantially in the earlier revelations of God. And while Confucius had regard only to social relations, the superior worth of the maxim of our Lord is pre-eminently seen in the extent of its application to men universally, as children and subjects of our God and Father in heaven.

Like the heathen sages of Greece and Rome, Confucius never attained the standard of Christian benevolence, though he perhaps fully equalled any of these ancients. To recompense kindness with kindness, and injury with justice, was going pretty far in the right direction. But he denied the propriety of recompensing injury with kindness; and in some places he distinctly advocates the savage law of revenge. It may, however, be perhaps disputable whether some of his sayings on this score be not capable of more favourable explanation. His system, comprising "The Cultivation of the Person," "The Regulation of the Family," and "The Government of the State," is an essentially political and non-religious system. The moral and intellectual elements of personal character and conduct are all regarded as means to an end, and are subordinated to the government of the state, which is the climax of the whole matter. The government he taught was a despotism; to be wielded, indeed, with intelligence and benevolence, but still a despotism. Antecedent to "The Cultivation of the Person," he speaks of "The Investigation of Things," "The Completion of Knowledge," "The Sincerity of the Thoughts," and "The Rectification of the Heart or Mind." In our way of viewing man and his high destiny, these are more important affairs than even the regulation of the family, or the government of the state. But without discussing this question, and coming to the matter itself, we are disappointed to learn that "here the Chinese moralist fails us"—viz., as to how the thoughts are to be made sincere, or the heart to be rectified. It is but just to add that Dr. Legge is of opinion that on this important branch of the subject we have only imperfect fragments of the philosopher's plan. Making all due allowance, nevertheless, it is plain that too much stress is laid upon the necessary sequence of virtue after intelligence, and upon the omnipotence of the force of example. What ought to be, and what might be, and what would be, were there no deranging influence, is one thing. But the truth and reality of things, where there is such a deranging influence as SIN, is another. Let us now look at a few of these sayings:—

Is he not a man of virtue who feels no discomposure, though men may take no note of him?

The superior man lends his attention to what is radical, that being established, all practical courses naturally grow up. Filial piety, and fraternal submission! are they not the root of all benevolent actions?

If a man withdraw his mind from the love of beauty, and applies it as sincerely to the love of the virtuous; if in serving his parents he can exert his utmost strength; if in serving his prince he can devote his life; if in his intercourse with his friends his words are sincere—although men say that he has not learned, I will certainly say that he has.

These maxims exemplify our previous remarks, and these are samples of an innumerable quantity of similar sayings. Some others are of a more general character. For instance:—

The accomplished scholar is not an utensil.

The superior man acts before he speaks, and afterwards speaks according to his actions.

The superior man is catholic, and no partizan. The mean man is partizan, and not catholic.

Learning without thought is labour lost; and thought without learning is perilous.

The study of strange doctrines is perilous indeed.

To see what is right, and not to do it, is a want of courage.

The superior man wishes to be slow in his words and earnest in his conduct.

Virtue is not left to stand alone; he who practises it will have neighbours.

The superior man is affable, but not adulatory; the mean man is adulatory, but not affable.

The scholar who cherishes the love of comfort is not fit to be deemed a scholar. A scholar whose mind is set on truth, and who is ashamed of bad food and clothes, is not fit to be discoursed with.]

If a man take no thought about what is distant, he will find sorrow near at hand.

The following maxims breathe a higher spirit :—

The superior man is modest in his speech, but exceeds in his actions.

The mind of the superior man is conversant with righteousness; the mind of the mean man is conversant with gain.

The superior man in everything considers righteousness to be essential. He performs it according to the rules of propriety. He brings it forth in humility. He completes it with sincerity. This is indeed a superior man.

Let every man consider virtue as what devolves on himself. He may not yield the performance of it even to his teacher.

The master said, " With coarse rice to eat, with water to drink, and my bended arm for a pillow, I have still joy in the midst of these things. Riches and honours acquired by unrighteousness are to me as a floating cloud."

The foregoing specimens must suffice, and may give some, though an imperfect notion, of the style and scope of these writings. The Confucian philosophy is very much sui generis. Sometimes it reminds us of Marcus Antoninus; and sometimes it resembles the moral parts of the Hitopadesa, but it has little of the fine poetical element, and still less of the religious element, of the Sanskrit books. And compared with Moses and the Prophets, with Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Psalms, and the Law, it is poverty indeed. Even the clear and certain discovery of these facts will be no mean result of Dr. Legge's splendid publication. To know the full strength and weakness of the system to be attacked, of the particular phase of sinful human nature to be addressed, is no useless acquirement. At bottom, indeed, error, like truth, is everywhere the same in essence. Without the certainty of judgment to come, and the well-founded hope of immortality and bliss, no sufficient motives exist for the highest activity, no adequate principle or force for the patient endurance of temptation and suffering in this mortal state, can be supplied. Without the Divine atonement and the mediation of the Son of God, intelligently perceived and truly rested upon, no satisfactory relief from the sting of sin, no solid peace with conscience and with God, can be attained. Without a personal God, and intellectual and affectionate communion with Him, joy proper and adequate to man's capacity for bliss must be unknown for ever. Yes! communion with God is the true and only method of making the superior man here, and of perfecting him hereafter. Confucius, aiming at this end, could just attain to the precept to "cultivate the friendship of the good;" and the Hitopadesa more poetically say, "As on the eastern mountain a thing is illuminated by the contiguity of the sun, so by association with the good the outcast even is enlightened." But the transformation of outcast man into the likeness of God, from glory to glory, through intercourse with God Himself in Christ by the Spirit, and the purifying power of the hope to see God as he is, and to be like Him, belongs to the Gospel only. Be it ours ever to magnify those Holy Scriptures, which alone reveal and communicate truths, motives, principles, and powers, suited to the need, and adequate to the destiny of fallen, but immortal man, child of dust, but heir of glory. The fool who, seeking Juno, embraced only a cloud, indulged at least a lofty desire. But the fools of our day are grovelling, as well as foolish, who present us a Pantheistic mist, instead of the glorious God, who hath shined out of Zion, perfection of beauty.

BLACK BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY.*

THE Bicentenary year of 1662 has arrived, and before the month of August next we shall, doubtless, have repeated opportunities of discussing the interesting topics connected with the ecclesiastical history of that month two hundred years ago in England. Ninety years before that date, viz. in 1572, the same Saint's-day had become memorable by the horrible massacre of Protestants in Paris. And if it were deemed not advisable to consign to oblivion that atrocious and execrable event, for which Pope and Cardinals in jubilant thanksgivings insulted the Majesty of Heaven, and blasphemed the name of the Prince of Peace, it were at least to be desired that Protestants had not distracted attention from that unique spectacle, so well calculated to unite them together, by giving a new notoriety to the same festival in connexion with an act which has cloven the Church in England asunder. Popery could have desired nothing better, or played her game more skilfully.

In what spirit Churchmen and Dissenters respectively are about to utilise the present recurrence of the epoch during the current year, remains to be seen. As the friends of union amongst Protestants we would wish to be not hopeless, but we dare not be sanguine. An excellent man has supplied us with a few thoughts in a paper which we subjoin. Will his aspirations be realised? Will his suggestions meet response?

We see it stated, on one hand, that Dissenters have begun the war. Even in Evangelical Church journals leaning favourably to the Nonconformists, we see more stress laid upon the enmity of the Liberation Society than upon any favourable features, if any are to be found, amongst the Evangelical Dissenters at present, in relation to this topic. A small Church party, with Lord Ebury at its head, makes gentle war upon the Act of Uniformity, and hopes to do something with that singular piece of Christianity during this session of Parliament. But the body of Evangelical clergy and laity in the Church do not show much sympathy as yet with that effort. And a biweekly Church journal, buckling on its armour for battle, sounds the trumpet by no means uncertainly, and rallies Churchmen in defence of the deed of St. Bartholomew's-day of 1662, "calculated to do much good in the fair statement of its history."

From these and other similar symptoms, it is, we fear, to be prognosticated that if we speak of peace, others are even now preparing themselves for battle. Dissenters merging differences and rallying forces for an attack on the State Established Church, and Churchmen also merging differences and rallying forces for the defence of what is attacked, if not for ulterior proceedings.

Meantime, if we hope to do good, it will be necessary to rise above partisan tactics and also above Utopian dreams, and to look facts and principles fairly in the face. It has been stated, with some plausibility, that not the modern Dissenter, but the modern Evangelical Churchman, is the lineal and true spiritual and ecclesiastical inheritor of the Puritans who became Non-conformists in 1662. It may be well, therefore, questioned whether remodeling the Act of Uniformity would now recall to the Church any considerable body of Dissenters; while, at the same time, it might not improbably forestall new secessions which are supposed to be not unlikely. Modern Dissenters have added to their principles one which was unknown to Puritans and to Nonconformists. They repudiate the union of Church and State. In the life of Alleine Mr. Stanford states this principle calmly and gently, but still decisively, as "one legitimate conclusion to which they had not reached." He says that "modern Dissenters have added to the theoretic basis of Dissent adopted by their ancestors the principle that every Church should in matters of religion renounce State patronage and be free from State control. This they regard as only a further development of scriptural Puritanism."

This being "a principle" with Dissenters, although all unbrotherly hostility to the Church of England be at the same time disclaimed, we are apprehensive rather lest the year on which we are entering shall tend more to strife than to unity and love. May it not be so. And may all who hold that the things in which we agree are of infinitely more importance than those in which we differ, be on the alert to throw oil upon the waters of controversy, while ready to say, Let Truth Prevail.

THE YEAR OF OUR LORD ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND SIXTY-TWO.

Whether the present dispensation be hastening to its close, and how nigh the end may be, is known to God alone. But to man it is given to forecast the future. Man is charged to study the signs of the times, to watch for Christ's second coming, and to hasten that glorious appearing by prayer and by perseverance in the work of the Lord. For no part of that work is a Christian more responsible, than for whatsoever tends to win others to be Christians. And nothing is more conducive to this end, as all will admit, than for it to be seen by the world, that the disciples of Jesus dwell together as brethren, aiming to be of one mind as far as possible, and in any case being always of one heart.

During eighteen centuries the light of the Gospel has been shining in the midst of our sinful race, especially leading every one who is brought under its influence to make it known and valued far and wide. During eighteen centuries it has been guaranteed to man, by a surety no other than God manifest in the flesh, that sin shall no more have dominion over him, if he resist in reliance on help provided by his Saviour; that death shall not in the end triumph over him, if in his life he has become one with Christ; that, through the counsels of eternal wisdom, the claims of eternal justice have been satisfied by the self-sacrifice of eternal love; that there is, for the true penitent, forgiveness, free and inexhaustible, through the atoning death of Jesus; that, for the sincere believer in that Saviour, there are secured reconciliation, peace, cleansing of the conscience, and renewal of the heart and life—even for one that was wholly sunk in sin to be as thoroughly changed in the affections of the heart as though he were begotten anew, were born again, and were naturalised—made all one as native in a new society, the Kingdom of Heaven, the communion of saints, the fellowship of the Holy Ghost. Such are the glad tidings of great joy announced once for all to all people, and approved to be true, not only by the deaths of martyrs, but also by the lives of saints. Such is the religion of Jesus Christ, as promulgated in the maturity of man's history on earth, accepted as undeniably from Heaven by the most intelligent of nations and of men and respected as of Divine obligation by Christians innumerable, tenacious of the honourable name, whose lives, at variance with its principles, would incline them, if they could, to impeach its authority.

And now, in the middle of the nineteenth century, where are we? and how much has been achieved in the progress of the Redeemer's kingdom upon earth? What proportion of the human race—how many of the teeming millions of Adam's children—are living as new creatures in Christ Jesus, preferring in everything good to evil—holy and heavenly-minded? We have churches, eastern and western, Greek and Latin, Popish and Protestant. And in each of these there are subdivisions, sections, sects, diverse in doctrine, in discipline, in ritual, and in moral principles and practices. But with all these organised communities in existence and at work, most of them comprising a multitude of ministers, men devoted to the business of teaching and preaching, and thereby building up their Master's Church, many of them backed by all the power of the State, some richly endowed, some preferring to rely on voluntary support; with all these Churches, of whatsoever name and form, comprehending, as they do, the most able and influential of the race of men now living, how numerous are the nations still abiding in entire ignorance of the Gospel, or in wilful rejection of it! Can we that are Christians help asking ourselves, with some deep sense of sorrow and of shame, Whose is the fault?

Our own realms are perhaps as highly privileged, compared with no small part of Christendom, as Christendom is compared with heathendom. So much the more weighty is our responsibility, in the matter of making our light to shine on the benighted portions of our race. Whatever may be their future lot, whatever the measure by which it will be measured to them hereafter, it seems past question that all those who have free access to an open Bible and to a Gospel ministry, must be tried by the high standard of the Gospel. Or if it be held, that even within these realms there are multitudes as little responsible for their ignorance as the dwellers in Central Africa, it must be admitted that this is not generally the case, and that most of us enjoy Christian privileges, which it would not be easy to match elsewhere. Or, to confine our views to readers of periodicals such as this, to address those only whose eyes peruse this very page, it may be safely averred that for each one of these there can be no alternative, but to be hereafter eminent as a saint in glory, or lost as an inexcusable reprobate. And further, it may be indisputably asserted, that one sure criterion by which to forecast the issue of that dread alternative is the influence, whether purposed or unconscious, exerted by each such professing Christian, in winning others to the faith, or in deterring them from it. Let it now be recollected that no one point in the demeanour of Christians is so winning with the worldly as for brethren to dwell together in unity, and the way is open for enforcing the conclusion, that all those who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity, and would hopefully look for His appearing, are under the most urgent and constraining motives to make it manifest to all beholders that they do truly and cordially love each other.

In this year of our Lord 1862 there is to be a gathering from all nations to the capital of these realms. And amongst those who come to view the products of art and industry, not a few will scan with observant eyes the working of our religious institutions; about to report the result of their observations in all quarters of the earth. In this same year 1862, on the return of August 24, two centuries will have been completed since the Act of Uniformity came into operation; an epoch of deep and painful interest in our religious history; an act which, at the time, served far and wide many of the best Christians in the land, and which has largely helped to keep their descendants at variance from that day to the present hour. How then shall the disciples of the Lord Jesus, now living in the land, after the lapse of two centuries, best celebrate the recurrence of a day pregnant with such distressing associations? In the presence of our own observant countrymen, some infidel, many sceptical, and very many disobedient to the faith, far from living in the light and in the love of it—in the presence of a select company from all races of mankind, the intelligent and influential from amongst Jews, Turks, heretics, and heathen—together with Papists ever glorying over divisions amongst Protestants—how shall we elect to commemorate the bi-centenary of that which is called by many Black Bartholomew's-day? Shall we—as there is ground to fear that some would fain induce us—shall we rake up the ashes of antiquated animosities, in search of fresh ingredients of bitterness, to add to existing elements of scandalous division? Or shall we not rather resolve beforehand to unite in giving proof of sincere contrition for wrongs done by our fathers on both sides, and in cementing peace and brotherly communion for ourselves and our children after us? "See how true Christians love one another." Shall not our conduct be adapted to draw reflections such as this from worldly and wise beholders? Or shall the leading members of religious communities—the communities themselves concurring—show themselves before an assembled world in the attitude of unflinching controversialists, occupied in fomenting an undying feud, by commemorating, with especial rites and ceremonies, wrongs suffered at the hands of each other's progenitors hundreds of years ago?

Never had the Church of England such an opportunity as that which this year presents of expressing regret for the past, by repealing or amending the objectionable clauses in the Act of Uniformity. On no day could a liberal amendment of that act, involving a judicious adaptation of the formularies of the Church to the wants of the present generation, come into effect with half so good a grace, or so great a probability of conciliating opponents, as on August 24, 1862. Nor have Dissenters and Dissenting communities ever had a call more urgent to exercise Christian forbearance, by concurring in any well-devised measure for blotting out from the statute-book old occasions of offence; and, by joining with those from whom they differ, to bury in mutual oblivion wrongs which, however unjustifiable, were surely not on either side unprovoked. The fact is that persecution, for conscience' sake, was generally held to be a duty long after the dawn of the Reformation; and was practised without scruple, or suspicion of its sinfulness, by both the parties in that suicidal strife which tore asunder the Protestant body in this country from two to three centuries ago. In these our days we need to prove that the Reformation is more than half achieved by the exercise of forgiveness and of mutual forbearance between those whom persecution first severed from each other, by giving each other credit for conscientiousness whereinsoever still we differ, by dwelling rather on the fundamental verities on which we are agreed, and by walking together, if not in formal amity, yet in unaffected harmony in the furtherance of the Lord's work, for the Lord's own sake, for the sake of our dear Christian brethren of whatsoever name, and for the sake of souls yet waiting to be gathered out of the world, to become jewels in the crown of their Redeemer.

Does this proposal sound Utopian? Then charity must be Utopian also. Is it past hope, that there are amongst us scores, hundreds, thousands, of Christian men, who are ready to confess frankly wrongs lying at their door, and to tender graciously the best restitution in their power; far more ready to do thus than to retaliate the charge, by dwelling on wrongs which their progenitors endured in a previous generation? Is it altogether out of the bounds of possibility, that other scores, hundreds, thousands of men, no less Christian-minded, will be found willing to accept amends thus tendered, in the like spirit of meekness and of love? If this be impossible, then may it well be asked, concerning the present age, if the Son of God were this year to come to judgment, would He find love on the earth? Would He find Christian love in Christendom? If, when the nations of the earth are assembled in these realms, if He too were to visit Britain, would He find brotherly love prevailing amongst those who here profess devotion to His service? Undoubtedly, the truth of His Gospel is diligently studied and sincerely loved by many in our land. And nowhere more than within our borders is the reality of faith signally proved by self-sacrifice and by zeal in doing good. Sad that, in this very earnestness of ours, the enemy of souls should find the means of stirring up those controversies whose bitterness avails at once to scandalise the worldly and to estrange from each other the devout. Let us watch more carefully and pray more earnestly against this our most grievous default. Let us be aware that our wars and fightings about religion, and about things pertaining thereto, tell against its progress far more than we can ever do for its advancement by all our services and societies, our preachings, and our books. Henceforth—beginning this very year, even to-day, whilst it is called to-day—let us be as much in earnest in loving one another as we are in loving the truth. Let us be no less zealous for charity in practice than we are for soundness in doctrine. And whatsoever be our predilections in behalf of our own creeds, articles, confessions, ministries, and other ecclesiastical arrangements, let us, beyond all comparison, be more concerned for the edifying of the whole body of Christ, by the mutual communication of love, amongst the members one with another, and forth from each of them severally, and from all conjointly, unto all—of every name, clime, and country—who are by any means brought within their influence.

FRANCE.

—, France, Dec., 1861.

HEAVY EXPENSES OF THE FRENCH OCCUPATION OF ROME.

The Roman question continues to be one of the principal topics of discussion by the press and at the bar of public opinion. It is certain that the status quo cannot much longer be maintained; the position is false and difficult as it respects the whole world. The Italians demand, with perfect justice, their geographical and moral capital; they find, too, that the French Government, by persisting in refusing them access to Rome, is making them pay very dearly for the services it has rendered them. The majority of the population of the Pontifical States, on their part, aspire more and more to be emancipated from the yoke of the priests, and seize every fitting occasion to manifest their desire to belong to the kingdom of Victor-Emmanuel. Add to this that Napoleon III. has received, in return for his extreme complaisance towards the Holy See, only the ingratitude of Pius IX., the outrageous insults of the bishops, who compare the Emperor to Pontius Pilate, and the conspiracies of the Jesuitical faction, who labour incessantly to deprive him of his crown. Is this a state of things that can last?

Moreover, the majority of the French, even in the ranks of the Conservatives, declare themselves with increasing energy against the prolongation of the stay of our troops at Rome. The Constitutionnel, the most accredited organ of the Cabinet, has recently published a document which has produced upon the public mind a strong impression; this is a calculation of the expenses occasioned by the French occupation during twelve years. The total, independently of the expenses of the expedition for bringing back the Pope from Gaeta, amounts to 168 millions of francs! Certainly this is no trifle, especially for a nation which has been compelled to negotiate numerous loans. When our financial position is encumbered by such heavy debts, is it proper (so to speak) to throw money out of window, without obtaining any other result than the discontent and ill-will of the parties the most opposed to each other? Besides, the temporal power of the Papacy has received its mortal wound, which no human effort can heal. What is the use of prolonging the death-struggle? Can France expend some hundreds of millions more, and obtain nothing but the satisfaction of more thoroughly proving the incurable decrepitude of clerical tyranny? Would it not be more economical and more wise immediately to renounce this humiliating experience? This is the true expression of the national feeling on the Roman question. So much the worse for the Papacy, if, by its faults and its abuses, it be incapable of maintaining its civil sovereignty without the aid of foreign bayonets! Every man reaps according to that which he hath sown.

ANOTHER ABDUCTION OF A YOUNG JEWISH GIRL.

There have been in our country, during the last few weeks, several judicial prosecutions, which have shown, under an aspect anything than favourable, the maxims and the acts of a portion of the clergy. I will not speak of the severe condemnations pronounced upon the Brethren of the Christian Doctrine, and other agents of the Roman priesthood, for the crime of attempts upon chastity. These details are too offensive. But how is it that the priests manifest so little attention and discernment in the choice of those to whom they confide the education of children? If they accept wretches who respect no law, human or divine, are they not responsible for so doing? No doubt a few isolated cases would prove nothing; but when scandalous facts like these reappear so frequently in the ecclesiastical establishments, the public conscience has the right, and is bound by duty, to demand an account of them from the heads of the Romish clergy. Another cause has been heard before the tribunal of Riom, a small city situated in the mountains of Auvergne. The case was analogous to that of the young Mortara, or of Elizabeth Blum. A young girl named Eliza Meyer, a Jewess by birth, had been placed in a convent of nuns, in order to receive an education conformable to her sex and age. These nuns, however, thought proper to carry off this young person from her parents, and to conceal her, sometimes in one monastery, sometimes in another, under the pretence that she had joined the Roman Church. The interference of the magistrates was found needful to terminate this odious act of abduction.

Two things especially have revolted upright people in the details of this affair. First, the ruses, subterfuges, lies, and various disguises to which the tools of the clergy did not fear to resort, in order to execute their design. In truth, the maxim that the end justifies the means is always in great repute amongst the devotees of Popery! Eliza Meyer was encouraged to write to her parents letters full of prodigious falsehoods; she assumed, in succession, various masculine dresses—being disguised as a merchant, a shepherd, &c.—in order to elude the vigilance of justice. In the judicial pleadings, the witnesses and the accused invented and gave utterance to gross impositions, without experiencing the slightest shame or the least scruple of conscience. Is it, then, this sort of morality which Popery teaches its adepts? What! it is lawful to deceive, to lie, even in a court of justice, and after having taken an oath, when the honour of the Romish Church is involved! Is it not evident that such rules of conduct must increase the number of unbelievers, by overwhelming religious things with contempt?

My second remark concerns the depositions of some priests, specially of a certain Abbé Ramière. This ecclesiastic naively declared that he did not consider himself bound to obey the civil law which prohibits carrying off children from their parents. "If the parents are in error," said he, in substance, "our duty is to guide their children into a better way, and neither family ties or the letter of the law shall deter us." This, at least, is frank, and I prefer the sincerity of the Abbé Ramière to the reservations and falsehoods of the other witnesses.

Only let us observe what are the relative positions of the Papal Church and of the State. That which legal institutions prohibit, the priests esteem it obligatory to do, and vice versé. This is an intestine and permanent conflict, which, sooner or later, will provoke great disruptions. There are here two opposing authorities, two contradictory systems of morals, two hostile communities amongst the same people! Such a divorce is, perhaps, the most grave fact which exists in Romanist countries.

THE TRIAL OF THE "WHITE MONK."

We come to another trial—that of the White Monk—which took place before the tribunal of Poitiers. This singular appellation of the "White Monk" has been given by the people generally to a certain Abbé Darras, who, in his own convent, is called Louis de Gonzague. This personage wears, in fact, a long robe of white wool, and this eccentric costume has struck the imagination of the multitude. What are the causes which have brought the "White Monk" before the magistracy of Poitiers? The affair is very complicated; I will therefore give you only a brief summary. The Papists of France are now possessed with a mania for reviving all the ancient monastic orders. Some individuals, more zealous than prudent, had thus conceived the idea of resuscitating the order of Premontres, founded in the twelfth century by a certain St. Norbert. They immediately purchased a house, with some acres of land, and about fifty men, of all ages, took up their abode here, in order to practise the fastings and macerations prescribed by the rule of their blessed founder. Unhappily, these modern Premontres did not beforehand inquire whether they should have the means of living. They could not pay the price of their house. They would literally die of hunger, and their vow of abstinence did not exactly oblige them to eat nothing at all! What must they do in this dire extremity? The Superior of the Premontres, named Father Edmond, sent the Abbé Darras, alias Brother Louis Gonzague, alias the "White Monk," to make collections from diocese to diocese. This collector is a curious personage: he has an impassioned speech, is vehement in gesture, and possesses a zeal which no barrier can arrest. After having made pathetic appeals from the pulpits, he would seat himself before a table at the door of the churches, and solicit contributions from all who went out, promising that their names should be inscribed upon tablets of marble, and that perpetual masses should be celebrated for the salvation of their souls. He also established a lottery, with a view of obtaining more money for the purse of his devotees, and visited all the houses, demanding the gold coin of the rich and the pence of the poor. All this, however, was not enough for his devouring activity. He undertook to found a convent for female Premontrés, or Norbertines; and to this end, addressed himself clandestinely to young girls of from sixteen to twenty years old, assuring them that nothing would be more agreeable to God and to the Holy Father the Pope than to revive the congregation of the Norbertines in the nineteenth century, and in the midst of France!

This little business went on well enough. The "White Monk" had collected more than 30,000*fr.*, and several young girls were beginning to express a very ardent desire to take the veil and assume the robe of the Norbertines. But complaints were made in different quarters: parents accused the Abbé Darras of having practised secret manoeuvres and employed improper acts of inveigling in the bosom of their families; the commissaries of police reproached him for begging, whereas mendicancy is prohibited by law. Other offences were laid to his charge. It would seem that in private conversations his language was too familiar, and that his accounts were not very exact; in brief, judicial authority interposed.

The inquiry before the magistrates disclosed a multitude of particulars very far from edifying. Letters written secretly by the "White Monk" to young girls were read by the judge and the procureur-imperial. They contained the most passionate expressions, the most ardent language. In general, the modes of expression of the Abbé Darras could not have been employed even by young worldly people. When the magistrate interrogated the "White Monk" respecting this want of delicacy and of decency, the latter replied that he had just been reading the mystic treatises of St. Bonaventura, of St. Francis, &c., and that he had naturally, without bad intention, reproduced the ideas and the language of these pious doctors! This reply did not satisfy either the tribunal or the public. The "White Monk" was sentenced to imprisonment and a fine. Will the newly-revived Premontrés appreciate this warning? and will they resolve to labour honestly to earn their own bread? I doubt it.

INSULTING CONDUCT OF SOME BISHOPS TOWARDS THE GOVERNMENT.

I mentioned in my last letter that the Minister of Public Instruction had addressed to M. Plantier, Bishop of Nismes, a letter, in which he requested him better to observe the rules of moderation and of charity (p. 691). The fiery prelate has not received this reprimand of the statesman in a spirit of humility. On the contrary, he has written to the Minister in the most arrogant terms, telling him that he cites his Excellency before the tribunal of public opinion, the tribunal of history, and the tribunal of God. Does M. Plantier, then, believe, in all sincerity, that these three tribunals will endorse his own rash and insulting judgments? In the first place, public opinion is almost unanimous in declaring that the Bishop of Nismes, in his diatribes, has been wanting in all the duties which are prescribed by wisdom and integrity. Secondly, history will most probably make no mention of this obscure personage, or of his quarrels. Lastly, it is not for M. Plantier to bring in the holy name of God, or to decide what would be His supreme judgment in this personal affair. The priests ought, at least, to respect the majesty of the Lord.

This is not all. The fanatical devotees of Nismes arranged for a triumphal entry of their bishop into that city on his return from a tour in his diocese. This is one method of braving the authority of the civil power. One vicar-general addressed to M. Plantier a pompous oration, full of invectives against the heads of the Government. It even seems that the bishop ascended the pulpit of the cathedral, and, in the presence of the multitude, compared the Minister of Public Instruction, by a very transparent allusion, to the viper which bit the hand of St. Paul at Malta (Acts xxviii. 3—5)!! Such are the amenities of the French episcopate towards the depositaries of public authority. It would be easy to specify other insults of the same kind in the letters, pamphlets, and sermons of the bishops.

Whose is the fault? I believe that the Government itself is partly responsible for what is now taking place. It has too much flattered the high dignitaries of the Romish Church, it has too generally recommended to the civil and military functionaries to be very complaisant towards them, and to give way to them under all circumstances. Inflated with pride by all this homage, the clerical body is persuaded that it has the right constantly to exercise the same preponderating power in political affairs as on questions of doctrine, and now it seems to it hard that it should have to encounter energetic adversaries. But if Louis Napoleon and his counsellors proceed with firmness in the path of resistance, the priests will be taught to confine themselves to their own proper province, and all will go on better.

DEATH OF FATHER LACORDAIRE.

You will remember that I referred, some time since, to the reception of Father Lacordaire at the French Academy (p. 125). This celebrated Dominican was not destined to enjoy such honours long. He died in the early part of December, at Sorens, a small town in the south of France, aged only fifty-nine. His loss will be acutely felt in the Romish Church of our country, for, notwithstanding his eccentricities and his defects, he was the most renowned preacher of that communion.

Father Lacordaire was born in 1802, near Dijon, in Burgundy; at first studied jurisprudence, and practised the calling of a barrister. All at once, from historical and social reasons, rather than from the cravings of the heart and conscience, he entered a Popish seminary, and commenced theological studies. His conversion was never very solid. At the revolution of 1830 he came under the influence of the illustrious Abbé de Lamennais, the only man of genius which the clergy of France have produced in our century. M. de Lamennais then preached the most democratic opinions; he advised the priests to renounce the pay of the State, and to associate themselves with the masses for the defence and development of every kind of liberty. These opinions were condemned by Pope Gregory XVI., who, in a celebrated encyclical letter, declared that liberty of worship and liberty of the press were things both absurd and impious, which could never excite too much horror! M. de Lamennais dared to resist the injunctions of the Sovereign Pontiff, but M. Lacordaire submitted to them. He abandoned his former master, and commenced delivering sermons or Conferences in the pulpit of Notre Dame, at Paris. His success was great. The young orator had an expressive physiognomy and a pathetic tone of voice; he employed pompous figures—his address was always fervid, sometimes forcible, and characterised by impetuous movements, by which his hearers were carried away. He had resolutely abandoned the ancient style of preaching; his method was free from all scholastic forms. Young people, ladies in high life, professors of the university, and magistrates, assembled in crowds beneath his pulpit. The doctrines of the preacher were not always orthodox, according either to the Gospel or to the Papal traditions. The serious portions of the hearers, and the old bishops, bent down their heads with some displeasure; but renown and popular fashion excused and protected everything. M. Lacordaire renewed his conferences during several successive years, and constantly produced the same enthusiasm.

In 1840 he conceived the idea of re-establishing in France the order of the Dominicans, or Preaching Brethren. He easily obtained the approbation of the Pope, and the orator soon appeared in his monastic costume, which stimulated the curiosity of the Parisians. Nevertheless, either because his superficial oratory was exhausted, or because the French were agitated by other objects, Father Lacordaire ceased, under his Dominican's frock, to excite the same impressions. He had the good sense to comprehend that the hour of his triumphs had passed, and preached but rarely.

At the revolution of 1848 he was chosen by the people of Paris as a member of the Constituent Assembly. This was to him a check. The political tribune was not adapted either to his description of talent or his habits. He was not accustomed to contend, face to face, with antagonists not less eloquent than himself. At the end of a few weeks he sent in his resignation as a representative of the people, and thenceforward passed a great part of his time at Soreze. Father Lacordaire wrote several works; his "Conferences" were taken down by shorthand writers, and printed. But posterity will forget his literary productions. Neither the sentiment, the logic, nor the style of this preacher were worthy of attention. The emotions of the moment are passed, and everything is at an end. Nevertheless, the French Roman Catholic Church has not a single orator who deserves to be compared with him. What a falling off! and what poverty!

EVANGELIZATION IN THE NORTH OF FRANCE.

You know the name of the Protestant Central Society of Evangelization, which has its head-quarters in the capital. The committee have auxiliary sections in the South, the North, and the West. Its object is twofold: first, to send pastors to our scattered co-religionists, and to provide them with the means of edification; next, to establish new congregations of converted Romanists.

The section of the North has recently published its annual report. This document is full of delightful facts. It is true that the administrative power, too docile to the suggestions of the Jesuitical party, has, in some places, put in force vigorous measures against proselytes to the Evangelical faith. Protestant schools have been prohibited, without any valid reason, at Grougis, at Crèvecœur, &c., and the teachers are compelled to go from house to house to instruct the children. It is equally true that the celebration of public worship in the chapels has awakened much opposition. But these vexations, thanks to God, do not stop the work of evangelization. The number of converts in certain localities has almost doubled. The report shows that the congregation of Fresnoy-le-Grand, which had been exposed to so many annoyances and persecutions, is continuing its progressive career. The same is true at Maubeuge, Chalons, Dunkirk, Boulogne, and in all the stations of Northern France. This is precious encouragement for us. Let us be faithful, let us be zealous, and our labour will not be in vain in the Lord.

CIRCULAR OF THE LIBERAL PROTESTANT UNION.

We are approaching the time for the ecclesiastical elections. In the month of January next all French Protestants, aged thirty, and having been admitted into the Church by the act of first communion, will be called to vote on occasion of the nomination of half of the members of our consistories or presbyterial councils. There is here a kind of universal suffrage applied to the government of our religious community. A longer trial is necessary to decide whether this new system will bear good or evil fruits.

In all these cases the struggle will be very sharp, particularly at Paris. The Liberal Protestant Union, the rationalistic spirit of which I have previously explained to your readers (p. 427), neglects no means of combating the orthodox majority of the Parisian consistory, and of substituting for them the partisans of the Neological theology. It has distributed a circular, in which the great words toleration, liberty, and individual right, are not forgotten. This phraseology produces considerable effect upon persons who are ignorant, or strangers to the Christian life. The Committee of the Union pretends even that it is Conservative, whilst it is attacking all the holy doctrines of our fathers! The orthodox party are not asleep; they are visiting families, and addressing serious appeals to the consciences of the Protestants. Let us hope that the victory will once more declare itself for orthodoxy. X. X. X.

Frankfort, Dec. 14, 1861.

GENERAL ELECTION IN PRUSSIA—RELIGIOUS ASPECT OF THE STATE OF PARTIES IN THAT COUNTRY.

The general elections, which have just given to Prussia a new Chamber of Deputies, constitute a grave political event. As such, this does not seem to belong to the sphere of our communications for Christendom. But it has a religious aspect, which includes serious consequences, and may teach weighty lessons, and it is from this point of view that we purpose to say something respecting it.

Every one is acquainted with the politico-religious party known under the name of Feudal, and which exerted so great an influence under the late reign. The accession of the actual sovereign, the complete change of ministry, had already inflicted on this party a severe blow. Nevertheless, it was still dominant in the Upper Chamber (Herrenhaus), where a great number of nobles who were its chief adepts had seats, and where it had for its able leader Dr. Stahl, whom death has this year removed. In the Chamber of Deputies it was represented by a number of members sufficiently large vigilantly to maintain there its own principles. All this is now only matter of history. The recent elections, the most liberal that have taken place in Prussia, have caused all the adherents of this party to lose their seats, in spite of all their efforts to preserve them. Even some Ministers of the Crown, in the number of whom is M. von Bethmann Hollweg, have not been re-elected. These last, however, will doubtless be returned in the supplementary elections.

We may, in some respects, sincerely regret this result, without sharing the views of the fallen party; for that party includes men of high character and true piety, who will henceforth be deprived of all influence over the public affairs of their country. But this result proves to demonstration that the system of absolutism, which that party has laboured to impose both upon the State and the Church, has no root in the nation. The Prussian people have thoroughly repudiated it. That people have seriously pronounced for the constitutional régime in politics, and for religious liberty. We may be glad or sorry for this, but the fact itself is patent. It is needless, however, to say that the party which has fallen on the field of electoral conflict is afflicting itself on this ground. To judge of that party by its journals, it sees, in its own defeat, danger to the monarchy, and the triumph of impiety. Is this judgment just? Is it indeed from hatred of religion that the Prussian people have placed in the urn such an imposing majority of liberal votes? We have a far better opinion of that people, in its aggregate. What it hates is not religion, but despotism imposed in the name of religion. And if even we must allow that several are animated by an irreligious spirit (which, alas! it is not possible to doubt), what must we thence conclude? That it is highly dangerous to make a religion of one's politics, and a political system of one's religion. By so doing we identify the Gospel with our worldly interests, and mix it up with party passions. It is a fact that in Germany the people have come to persuade themselves that no one can be a Christian in the scriptural sense without being a partizan of political and religious absolutism! And how should it be otherwise, when the parties to which we refer regard all men truly liberal as the enemies of religion? Fatal confusion, which has done more mischief to Christianity than all the systems of unbelief! Oh! if the sincere Christians of the party which the nation, in so striking a manner, has just disavowed, could but comprehend their error! If they could but learn that believing piety does not command and impose itself, but is a free sentiment—a spontaneous conviction of the conscience and the heart! Unhappy is he who makes his religion hated because of his politics!

MODIFICATION OF THE STATE CHURCH IN BADEN.

There are yet two other countries of Germany in which popular sentiments hav triumphed over the erroneous views that we are here combating.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden the issue of the General Synod, the opening of which I announced to you in quoting the speech of the Grand Duke, has been such as might have been foreseen. An ecclesiastical constitution, which is very far from being a model, but which gives to the parishes and to the whole Church a legal participation in its own government, and particularly so in the election of the pastors—has been discussed and adopted by the Synod, and subsequently sanctioned by the reigning Prince. The latter still remains as he was before this change, summus episcopus (the chief bishop) of the Church of his country—a dangerous principle, having no foundation either in Scripture, or in the Protestant confessions of faith—a principle first reduced to practice in the unhappy times in which princes were the protectors of the Reformation against the fury of Rome—since which period it has become established as if it were a right! The Grand Duke of Baden, however, has formally separated the government of the Church from his own government of the State, in such sort, that the religious affairs are less deplorably confounded with the political. We shall no longer see at Baden, for example, that enormity which is so often witnessed in Germany, a Roman Catholic Minister of Worship acting as the chief official of the Protestant Church! Well, these changes having taken place in the Church of Baden, we every day hear religious men—and especially the most orthodox pastors—bemoaning themselves, as if everything were lost. To hear them, their Church is on the verge of ruin. And why? Because the people of the Church have some share in the government of the Church! Oh! certainly it would seem that your ecclesiastical system must be very bad, since, instead of having amongst your own members friends, you suspect them as enemies! Again we ask, and why? Because you can no longer lean so heavily on the carnal arm of the State for the maintenance of your principles, your faith, and your Church. Understand it well, this is to betray real unbelief. No, from the moment that such a power becomes needful to you, you no longer believe in the sole power of the Word of God—of the Spirit of God, and of the Gospel of His grace. Behold in these the means which everywhere triumphed over the world in the apostolic age, and which are still the only means that convert souls, and bring them captive to the feet of Jesus Christ.

ANTI-ECCLESIASTICAL AGITATION IN THE PALATINATE.

The same phenomenon is seen in Rhenish Bavaria (the Palatinate), in which, for two or three years, an extraordinary agitation has prevailed amongst the populations. On what subject? About a new hymn-book, adopted by two consecutive Synods, which was to be introduced into the churches and the schools, but the majority of the parishes would not have it. The new collection is very good, the old one, which it should have replaced, is very bad—thoroughly impregnated with Rationalism. Are these populations, then, in the mass, Antichristian? There is, no doubt, amongst them, and especially amongst the leaders who rule them, much of Antichristianity. But let us understand it: the book which it has been sought to impose upon them, without their consent, has been merely the pretext for commencing a struggle against an ecclesiastical authority which takes its stand upon the authority of the State. Now the most ignorant amongst the people know and feel that if the State may justly require from them taxes or military service, it has not the right to coerce their consciences, even through the medium of a consistory sitting at Spire.

However, the agitation and the conflict went on increasing—meetings of eight or ten thousand men assembled to deliberate—to petition against the ecclesiastical authority. And to whom? To the King of Bavaria, a Catholic prince, who is not the less (on that account) the supreme bishop of the Protestant Church of his own States. The result has been, that the Government has been compelled to acknowledge the justice of the popular demands, in opposition to the authorised ecclesiastical bodies; and that excellent men, like Dr. Ebrard, have had to quit their places—to deprive the Church of their services—because their position had become false and intolerable. This is surely deplorable; but it is the natural consequence of false ecclesiastical principles, and of institutions based on such principles. Let the Protestant Church of Germany only return to the practice of the Saviour's command, "Render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's," and it will enter upon a new and happier era.

HOLLAND.

LIFELESS CONDITION OF DUTCH ORTHODOXY—HETERODOXY: MIRACLES DENIED IN THE PULPIT—PRIZE ESSAY ON THE SINLESSNESS OF OUR LORD.

Amsterdam, Dec. 13, 1861.

Many thanks for the copy of Evangelical Christendom which I have received for the past two years. . . . Often opposed and discouraged in the faithful discharge of ministerial duty, and struggling to make both ends meet, with an altogether insufficient salary, such tokens of Christian sympathy are peculiarly cheering and welcome.

There is no change of any consequence in the religious aspect of Holland. To me the orthodoxy seems cold as the air of a clear December night, and must itself be regenerated before it can have any power to counteract the prevailing Rationalism. The most baneful heterodoxy is rampant, undermining everything which forms the foundation of Christian faith. Many of the Dutch Reformed and Walloon ministers in Holland propagate the infidel views of Colani, Renan, Baur, Heinrich Lang, and others, in a form even more offensive than they. In a recent number of the Amsterdam Herald there was a sketch given of a sermon by the Rev. Busken Huët, minister of the French Church at Haarlem, which is not overdrawn. It described the sermon in something like the following terms: "The minister mounts the pulpit. He prays, not for himself, but for the people, who do not stand so high as he. He reads the words of Luke vii. 11—16, for the Church laws require, as yet, that the ministers take a text out of the Bible. The sermon is begun, and the orator paints a family picture. There sits a father with lofty forehead. At his left side sits the mistress of the house with the two daughters, and on the right the eldest son, a young man of twenty-four years. The father reads with a clear voice the raising of the widow of Nain's son. The women listen with reverence, and in their simplicity believe that the miracle has really happened. The son is silent, but the shrugging of his shoulders shows that he despises the strange story. The father alone has understood it rightly, and how? The miracle has not happened in a natural manner. Even though miracles were possible, it would be incomprehensible why Jesus should have raised up the dead son for a woman who was unknown to Him. Besides, the young man would have had to die again at some later time, and occasion grief anew. 'Or do ye believe,' asked he, sarcastically laughing, 'that the young man still lives and walks about in the midst of us? No, the legend means that Jesus had compassion for a widow, and spake to her in such a friendly manner, that she was comforted as much as if He had raised her son, and the legend writer has represented the occurrence as if the young man had been actually raised.'" The divinity of Christ—the miracles—the resurrection—the Bible—are all denied in the writings and sermons of many Dutch and French ministers.

In the meeting of the 'Teylers' Godgeleerd Genootschap, on the 8th of November, it was agreed to propose the following questions as the subjects for a prize essay to be finished within two years:—

1. Can the perfect sinlessness of Jesus be maintained against the historical and philosophical views of the latest time?

2. Is the acknowledgment of that sinlessness consistent with the hypothesis that the person of Jesus came from humanity in the natural manner?

3. What is the importance of the result of this examination to our age?

The work of F. Peçaut, "Le Christ et la Conscience," Paris, 1859, is that which is specially referred to by these questions, but that work is an exponent of one phase of the clerical belief (infidelity?) of Holland.

ITALY.

Florence, Dec. 17, 1861.

EDUCATION AND THE CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

Educational efforts in Italy begin to attract equal attention with schemes for evangelization. When the peninsula was thrown so unexpectedly open to the Gospel two years ago, it was natural that the colporteur should be immediately sent to scatter the seed of the Word over the virgin soil, and the evangelist encouraged to declare the strange message of salvation by grace wherever he could gather a knot of listeners.

Notwithstanding the low place in the scale of common learning which the Italian populations have long occupied, Tuscany and Lombardy, with all their refinements, being only one degree above Naples and the Papal States, which last were the disgrace of Christendom, and notwithstanding the vile calumnies of all that was free and holy which passed current for truth among a priest-ridden people, a sale of Bibles and religious books has taken place which has surprised the Christian world, and a willingness to hear the Gospel has been displayed quite remarkable in a land where the Bible has been so long a contraband article, and the slightest taint of heresy has entailed a felon's doom. Although the first run upon these prohibited books is now past, from an official paper before me I find that ten colporteurs in the service of the Scottish National Bible Society have sold all over the land during the last eleven months close upon 3,500 Bibles and Testaments, and 50,000 religious books. Now that every highland and lowland spot is being visited by the wayfaring Bibleman, and preachers are rising up in all the large cities and in many a rustic hamlet to teach a more excellent way of faith and morals, and great interest has been awakened in the young and rising generation, the friends of Italy may readily be excused in such a crisis for aiding "work done" in preference to "preparation for work;" but I rejoice, now that civil and religious liberty has been placed on a secure basis, that a greater readiness is shown, amid the many difficulties and the small apparent fruit, to aid in training up the boys and girls of Italy in scriptural knowledge, who shall soon be the Christian men and women in the Evangelical Churches, in preparing maps and school-books for their use, and in rearing able teachers for the common schools of the country.

EDUCATIONAL EFFORTS OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PEOPLE.

The Italian Government is making most indefatigable and praiseworthy exertions in the educational department. The lycæums and universities have been stocked with talented professors, and every effort is being put forth to improve the primary and secondary schools of the kingdom. The lamented Cavour found that though his measures met with a ready acceptance among the intelligent members of the large communities, the new laws were too often treated as a "dead letter" by the untutored country folk and the masses of ignorant townspeople, who were so easily led by bigoted and illiberal priests. He therefore inaugurated a policy with regard to schools which has been adopted by the present Premier, and supported by all the leaders of the people.

"I believe," said an eloquent speaker in Parliament the other day, "that brigandage will be rooted out, not by the Minister of the Interior, but by the Ministers of Public Instruction, of Public Works, and of Commerce and Agriculture."

So much is this the creed of the people, that it has passed into a proverb and become a rule of action. In Naples, various decrees have been published, whose effect has been to remove the heavy yoke of priestly management in scholastic affairs. The King in person presided at the opening of infant and ragged schools, and an excellent beginning has been made in the way of elevating a demoralised and superstitious race. In the little island of Ischia, which lies in the Bay of Naples, an Englishman has been appointed inspector, or rather institutor of schools, for none of any value previously existed, and by his own account the young "savages" under instruction are very grateful to him for his labour of love. On the eastern shores of Italy, throughout the Marches, the convents and nunneries have been emptied of their useless occupants by the authorities, and employed not only to house the military, but also to serve as places of public instruction. In Tuscany, where education has always been to a certain extent free, and which owes so much to Abbé Lambruschini, the David Stow of Italy, training colleges for teachers have been set on foot; schools in which the teaching is made preparatory to professional pursuits, high or humble, have been opened; and evening schools, for gratuitous instruction in the ordinary branches, are all the rage. For these latter the municipality provides the means, and several of the teachers are officers and tradesmen who have volunteered their services for the common good, for a longer or shorter period. The same noble spirit has prompted various large towns of Italy, Milan and Florence taking the lead, to send twenty workmen each—the flower of their artisans in the various trades, for sobriety, capacity, and good character—to the 1862 Exhibition, all their expenses being paid, in the hope that they will bring back such information as shall tell on the skill and industry of their native land. Nor should I omit to mention one of the most powerful educational forces in this as in our own country—the cheap postal system. The twopenny postage is now extended throughout Italy, and I doubt not we shall soon enjoy the happy idea of Rowland Hill, a penny post. In respect to papers of all kinds, printed or written, Italy is already in advance of England, so that the workman receives his newspaper or magazine, in whatever corner of the country he may inhabit, for one centesimo, or the tenth of a penny.

CHRISTIAN EFFORT IN THE CAUSE OF EDUCATION.

The Christians of Italy do not lag behind in the race. From the Alps to Naples Evangelical schools are increasing in number, efficiency, and usefulness. The educational institutes of La Tour, the capital town of the Waldensian Valleys, are well attended. They owe much to the large-hearted liberality of General Beckwith, who, long ere the gates of Italy were thrown open, infused life into the mountain parish schools, not, as he always remarked, for the Vaudois themselves, but for poor Italy in the future through them. The college has, according to last year's report, 57 pupils, the normal school 35, the orphanage 40, and the establishment in which young women of the better class receive a superior education 55. Both Genoa and Turin possess flourishing Waldensian schools. Mrs. de Sanctis has under her care five Bible schools in Milan, Genoa, and Turin, at which about 300 children attend, and soon an additional school will be begun in Genoa, and several new ones commenced at Biella and other stations. "Most of the children in attendance," writes Mrs. de Sanctis, "belong to parents who are still in Popish darkness, and many instances occur in which they carry the blessed tidings of the Gospel into their families and induce the parents to attend the Sunday-school and prayer-meeting."

In Florence, the Evangelical schools for boys and girls, established full two years ago, under the superintendence of an unsectarian committee, still continue. As described in Evangelical Christendom of May last, they have encountered every obstacle and survived every danger, and though not so numerously attended as some others, the quality of the education given is excellent. Last spring another school was opened by Signor Ferretti, of London, and, under the care of able male and female teachers, about eighty children are being trained in Gospel principles. Very soon classes will be opened in the handsome schoolhouse lately erected alongside of the Waldensian church in Leghorn, and Pisa will also be provided for in due time. At Naples, Mr. Cresi has forty girls in his infant-school. They are taught sewing, washing, ironing, reading, writing, arithmetic, &c., and receive religious instruction from Mr. Cresi. The Countess Steinbock gives her whole time to it, and teaches the girls music herself. On the other side of the court into which the school-room looks live some priests, who never open their windows without crossing themselves, to keep off the demon of Protestantism, I suppose. They are doing what they can to prevent parents sending their children. The proprietors have already refused to relet the apartment in which the school is held, and great difficulty will be experienced in finding another. . . . All of these schools are supported by voluntary contributions, in addition to the school-fees, which are very trifling. May the Lord add to their number, and give His rich blessing upon one and all of them!

ITALIAN LADIES' PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY.

As so many inquiries are being made with regard to the "Italian Ladies' Philanthropic Society for the Education of Southern Italy," I may as well say that my information concerning the proposed schools is not very satisfactory. The mere fact that Garibaldi's name is attached to the prospectus, as president of the scheme, argues nothing; for every one knows that the good warrior of Caprera has not the courage to say "No," especially when the applicants are ladies, and have such a laudable object in view as the "education of Southern Italy." I am credibly informed, among other things, that the Bible is not to have a place in these schools, and that, when opened, they will be under the direction of Sisters of Charity.

I would have our enthusiastic friends at home to pause until a committee of names is published, which shall be a guarantee for discretion and Evangelical doctrine in the management of these proposed schools for Naples and neighbourhood.

A NEW SCHOOL BOOK.

Maps and school apparatus generally are very dear in Italy, while no such thing exists as a good series of reading books. A beginning, however, will shortly be made in the publication, at the expense of the American Tract Society, of an illustrated primer, drawn up by an Italian scholar. All the "Ave Marias" have been replaced by Scripture stories and religious poetry, while the whole range of useful elementary knowledge is popularly and pictorially explained, so that the work cannot fail to be a favourite in other than Bible schools, and to form the first, we trust, of a long and valuable series.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

In connexion with the recent meeting of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, steps are being taken to promote the better observance of the Sabbath in Italy. It seems a hopeless task, but the effort is all the more needed, because the Church of Rome esteems the Lord's-day of less value than ordinances and Saints'-days, of human appointment. By translations and original works the light of Scripture truth and the facts of history will be brought to bear on the mind of the people, and, if possible, of the rulers. It is sad that continental Christians generally, and many brethren in this land, hold such loose views on this important question. Among English-speaking residents and travellers there is a great deal of careless and uncalled-for desecration of the Sabbath. The Presbytery of the North of Italy, in view of these things, has issued an address to the congregations within its bounds, and invited the various ministers to call the attention of their people to the subject by preaching upon it on an early day.

GAVAZZI PREACHING IN FLORENCE.

Signor Gavazzi is still in Florence. On Sabbaths he preaches the Gospel, and on week evenings addresses crowded audiences, in his usual eloquent strain, on the errors of the Papacy, and its deadly enmity to civil liberty. His expositions of Scripture, exhibiting such advance upon former years, have been hailed with pleasure and greatly prized by those who regard him as a mighty instrument in the hand of God for effecting good in Italy. He has displayed uncommon courage, at a time when Passaglia, Liverani, and their followers are in the ascendant, in accepting so far as they go the views of these influential priests, with regard to the abolition of the temporal power of the Pope, and yet clearly exposing the fallacy of stopping at that point, as they have done, and the impossibility of any reform within the Church itself which shall be satisfactory to the wishes of the people and consistent with the welfare of a free Italy. There is some talk of a prosecution for speaking against the religion of the State. Signor Gavazzi stays in Florence until the ladies of Ireland supply him, according to kind promise, with a printing press for Naples.

NEW THEOLOGICAL WORK BY REV. DR. DE SANCTIS.

A theological work, from the pen of Dr. de Sanctis, is shortly to be published here, in the form of a weekly dialogue. It will probably extend over two or three years, and will form a complete course of religious instruction. Subscriptions for the first six months are now being taken at all the Evangelical depôts. The price is 2s. 2d. for Italy and 4s. 4d. for England; so that I hope many at home, acquainted with the Italian language, will become abonnés. From the popularity of the author's name and writings, and the energetic measures taken to circulate this important serial, a very large impression will be required. After a few preliminary conversations on a change of religion, the perusal of the Scriptures, the writer proceeds—on the basis of the creed of Pope Pius IV.—to discuss, in order, all the points in dispute between the Church of Rome and the Bible. While this treatise, on which the fame of its author will much depend, takes its place among similar works of controversial divinity, the dialogue form will impart a freshness and novelty in the treatment of the various topics.

THE "BUONA NOVELLA" AND THE PROTESTANT PRESS.

The Buona Novella, which has for ten years past been the organ of Italian Evangelical Christianity, will shortly be transferred to Florence, and edited by a Tuscan lawyer of ability. It will continue, as before, to treat the questions of the hour from the Christian point of view, and to supply able expositions of Scripture, and the latest news of the Churches in Italy. To Signor Meille, the Waldensian pastor at Turin, the Church of Christ is under great obligations, for having so long undertaken the responsibility of this valuable journal, amid many other laborious occupations.

The Claudian printing press at Turin, which has for years past, under the direction of the Waldenses, sent out so many valuable books and tracts, will next month be set up here in the Casa Salvati. Not only is Florence more central for the extensive evangelistic operations going on, but, as the literary capital of Italy, it affords greater facilities for printing efforts. For the purpose of executing more speedily the orders for Italian Bibles and Testaments, which have been given both by the British and Foreign Bible Society and the American Bible Society, it is proposed to purchase a new roller press for the establishment. I know of no object which has a stronger claim upon the liberality of wealthy and intelligent Christians than this. 200*l.* will cover the expense of a modern machine, with the most recent improvements and great working capabilities.

HOSPITALS AND CEMETERIES.

The question of hospitals and cemeteries for the Evangelicals has lately been raised. Two years ago the want of these institutions was severely felt, for our hearts were constantly pained by the recital of dastardly actions on the part of the priests, who knew well how to improve the opportunity, when the dying and dead who had renounced their authority necessarily fell into their hands. A great improvement has recently taken place, and yet cases of cruelty and neglect are occasionally reported. The Government has provided a cemetery at Trespiano, such a distant and inconvenient spot, that advantage cannot be taken of the offer, so that our dead must either be interred in the expensive Swiss cemetery, or carried by night to the church of San Caterina, and left there for the priests to bury. I should hope that the "Teaching Sisters" sent to Florence eighteen months ago by Dr. Fliedner, of Kaiserwerth, to open an Evangelical training school; have met with so much success, as to lead the venerable director of that establishment to send us shortly a few "Sisters for the Sick," to commence a small Protestant hospital.

SWEDEN.

AMELIORATIONS IN ECCLESIASTICAL LAWS — IMPROVEMENTS IN RELIGIOUS AND GENERAL SOCIETY — CURIOUS EXAMPLE OF THEOLOGICAL DEBATE AMONG THE WORKING CLASS — BENEFICIAL INFLUENCE OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Winalaf, Christianstad, Sweden,
Nov. 17, 1861.

I regularly receive a copy of Evangelical Christendom, for which I am extremely obliged. I think it right that you should hear from me at least once yearly, with some information from this secluded corner of Christendom. We are now beginning to see much more of the effects of the religious revival which, during a period of above ten years, has largely manifested itself in this country, where it is steadily progressing. The ecclesiastical, or rather ceremonial rules of High Churchism, the regulations of the State Church, or "Ice Palace," as Dr. Krummacher called it, are gradually undergoing a change; for example: 1. Instead of having the same texts on the same Sundays, regularly repeated year after year, three different series of such texts have now been recommended, so that the same text will not recur until the fourth year. But why not have confidence in the ministers, and leave it to them to select their own texts—those passages on which they prefer preaching, because they feel an inward prompting so to do? 2. The people are now permitted to apply for the communion to any minister they may choose, and are not, as formerly, confined to the clergy of the parish in which they happen to live. It is not clearly understood whether the communion, according to the new law, can be administered in private houses, like baptism, or only in the churches. Christenings, in all parts of Sweden, are not restricted to the churches, but may be performed in private dwellings; the latter are often preferred in the winter. Several ministers, however, administer the communion also in private houses, when desired. The rigid sacramental law, to which I alluded at the Paris meeting, is still in force, and inflicts heavy penalties upon any layman who ventures to administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Any man or woman, however, in this country is allowed to perform a christening, in case of emergency. 3. Several rectors have lately been deprived of their cures; for instance: one for denying the divinity of Christ, another for unchristian conduct. A salutary impression has apparently been made on the hearts of many of our public teachers. 4. The larger livings are divided. There are ministers who still have the spiritual charge of from 12,000 to 16,000 souls. The want of ministers is beginning to be greatly felt in several parts of the country. A vigorous religious life is showing itself in our county of Lund, and from the peasant class many eminent preachers, to their credit, have arisen. Hence the want above-mentioned is not so pressing here.

It is, however, not only by new laws that ecclesiastical matters in our country are affected. The changes in private institutions and social arrangements conduce likewise to this end. 1. In several counties the ministers have agreed to meet regularly amongst themselves to discuss spiritual matters. Such meetings, during late years, have had considerable influence on the public mind. The dislike towards laymen as preachers has greatly diminished. 2. The educational training of the ministers has now, in many places, a decidedly moral,

Christian, and elevating tendency. 3. Old churches are being restored and rebuilt. 4. A large number of ministers in the county of Lund have formed an association, the object of which is to prevent swearing or taking God's name in vain—sins which in this country are of older date, and more general, perhaps, than in any other. 5. The Sabbath is more generally kept, and new tract societies have arisen. In our county we have now three or four such societies working towards one common end. 6. In many places meetings are held by laymen for the purpose of discussing spiritual things; and the depth of thought of which the working classes give proof is truly wonderful. As an illustration, I will mention the following question, debated at one of their meetings. Supposing any one in this land, having recently, with the heart, returned to God, and become a true believer, were to say, "Last year, when I became a Christian," &c., would such a mode of expression be correct? Were you not a Christian before last year? were you not a heathen previously? Psalm cxlvii. 19, 20, seems to answer this question. Is faith an inward proof to man of Christianity, or is it only a proof before God? Are not the Word and the sacraments the inward proof to man? (Rom. ii. 28.) Did you not become a Christian when you were baptized? The objections are: Has water the power of making men Christians? It is only significant of the truth that they can become Christians. Then, again, is not the baptism principally of the Holy Spirit? Does not the Holy Spirit virtually constitute the water at the baptism? (Matt. iii. 11.) How else could it be said of little children, being by nature born sinful, that the kingdom of heaven is theirs? Or is a miracle wrought when the minister performs the baptism? To this the following answer is given: It is a notion inherited from Popery, if any one imagines that the Holy Spirit does not commence christening a child until the priest has baptized it with water. According to the Bible, the Holy Spirit came upon John the Baptist, even before he was born (Luke i. 15), and every child of a Christian community has promise of the Holy Spirit (Acts ii. 39), for "else were your children unclean, but now are they holy." (1 Cor. vii. 14.) If, therefore, man ventures to baptize a child with water, according to the command of our Saviour, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. xxviii. 19), he ought to do so for the same reason as St. Peter did, when he baptized Cornelius. "Can any one," said he, "forbid water, that these should be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" (Acts x. 47.) You therefore (the argument continues) became a Christian by baptism, consisting of the double baptism of water and of the Spirit. You were born again, and had you died, you would, consequently, have died in a state of salvation. But if afterwards you had forfeited the grace of your new birth, you would not then have lost all life (the new man is not less tenacious of life than the old, and he makes his presence felt in a painful manner). You are still a Christian—a brother—even if you be excluded from the brotherhood—and it is a duty to exhort you as a brother, even if your life be worse than that of a heathen, according to the apostolic injunction, "Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." (2 Thess. iii. 15.)

Discussions like these are in our days heard at the meetings of the working classes, and are carried on in a brotherly spirit, without bitterness—quite in the spirit of the Evangelical Alliance—the spirit of Christ Himself. Truth is sought for in love. It is wonderful how much the rules of the Alliance have done, and are still doing, for the maintenance of peace and brotherly feeling at these meetings.

In Christian love, yours,

CARL BERGMAN.

INDIA.

A NEW MISSIONARY PERIODICAL—PERNICIOUS EXAMPLE OF EUROPEANS AND OTHERS—MISSIONARY EFFORT.

Free Church Mission,
Nagpore, Oct. 21, 1861.

I have much pleasure in sending you a copy of the first number of the News of the Churches in India, printed in Kamptee. It is to be hoped that there are a few of God's people at every European station in this great heathen land; and some here think that it might do us all good, by way of stirring up to greater faith, prayer, perseverance, and sympathy in our efforts to serve our common Lord and Master, if we were to enter, at stated times, into a brotherly correspondence. As yet we have only made a beginning, but I fondly trust that the future numbers which I may be able to send you will show that the Lord is fulfilling our desire, and making our way prosperous. Much here remains to be done amongst the European and East Indian communities. In Sitabuldee, which is the civil station, and ten miles from Kamptee, spiritual religion is at a very low ebb indeed. The officers, with some few exceptions, give sad evidence of living without the fear of God in their hearts; and their European and East Indian subordinates, for the most part, follow their pernicious example. The Sabbath is not much respected among them, and public worship, except by a very few, is almost totally given up. The low and loathsome practice of swearing prevails among some of them, and altogether we have to deplore the want of a living and earnest Christianity in the station. Besides their daily labour among the heathen, the missionaries, for the benefit of residents in the station, hold a religious service every Sabbath evening, a prayer-meeting every Wednesday evening, and a missionary prayer-meeting on the evening of the first Monday of each month. In addition to these labours, they frequently visit the people in their own houses, distribute religious books and tracts, and try to induce the people to think of the things that belong to their peace. They labour and pray in faith, but they strongly feel that the indifferent and ungodly lives of Europeans and East Indians are terrible hindrances to them in seeking to win over the heathen to Christ. At present there is no chaplain stationed at Sitabuldee, but I am sorry to say that matters were no better during the incumbency of the one who was lately here, but who left for another station several months ago. Pious, earnest, and Evangelical chaplains are much needed, both here and at Kamptee. I may at some other time write you about our mission work at Nagpore, but for the present accept my very warm thanks for Evangelical Christianity, the matter and spirit of which I greatly appreciate, month by month, as it reaches me.

[The periodical referred to above is a modest affair, consisting of a small folio page and a-half of print. The information given relates chiefly to the opportunities for united exercises of devotion, and to the state of religion at different military stations. We subjoin a specimen:]

RELIGIOUS MEETINGS AT SECUNDERABAD.

There are at present in this cantonment five meetings—a monthly missionary meeting, weekly Sunday meeting, weekly meeting at the Bible dépôt, weekly meeting in the lines of the 19th Native Infantry, and last, but by no means least, a daily meeting at Trimulgherry (the European Infantry cantonment).

[Details of the several meetings are then given. We quote the description of that held daily:]

The Trimulgherry meeting is held every evening in a building known as the Protestant Prayer House, erected a few years since for the special use of all Christian soldiers in this part of the cantonment. It is literally founded on a rock, and literally too its light shines out in the darkness, and is seen from afar—emblems we will hope of the characters and calling of those who frequent it.

Here may be found, every evening, from twenty to thirty British soldiers gathered together to pray for an outpouring of the Spirit upon themselves and upon their officers and comrades. Officers attend occasionally, but usually the meeting is conducted by the men themselves. It is simply a prayer-meeting, and during the hour to which it is limited there are usually six prayers, joined with singing and the reading of passages of Scripture. The Christian soldier prays here continually that his officer may be his leader, not only in the field of battle, but also in the warfare of his soul.

Trimulgherry is, indeed, the centre of our little Christian circle, and its house of prayer has been truly designated as the "door of hope" for Secunderabad.

NORTHERN AFRICA.

CLOSING OF THE BIBLE AND BOOK DEPÔT AT ORAN—STATISTICS OF ITS OPERATIONS—AN EXPLANATION.

Oran, Algeria, Nov. 26, 1861.

My last report, relative to the Scripture and Book Depôt in this city, appeared in Evangelical Christendom for July. Shortly after despatching that communication I found myself called upon to renew the contract of the shop for another year. Having been disappointed in my expectations of assistance from parties on whom the work has the greatest claims for support, I felt that I could not maintain the Depôt open much longer. It was accordingly closed in the middle of June.

But, though the Depôt has been shut up, the work proceeds satisfactorily, as the following figures will show. Its existence had made it generally known that I possess and can furnish the sacred Scriptures and religious works in various languages, and people apply to me for them. There is, however, this material difference, that now I find it necessary to give a greater proportion gratis, particularly of religious publications. People more readily pay for the Scriptures than for any other books; so that, while as many Scriptures are disposed of now as when the Depôt was open, fewer books are sold. Except in a pecuniary point of view, this is very gratifying. It is a proof that the existence of the Depôt has excited an extensive desire to possess and read the Scriptures.

	Gratis.	Sold.	Gratis.	Sold.
April to Sept.	57	314	9	120
Oct. to March	24	441	40	513
April to Sept.	71	393	271	328
Totals	152	1148	320	961
Adding		152		329
Total of Vols...		1300		1291
Total Realized by Sales ...	£108 2s. 2½d.

Average per month: 72 Scriptures, 71 books, 22 tracts, exclusive of a large number of tracts distributed gratis, of which it has been impracticable to keep an exact account. The total proceeds of sales was 103½ 2s. The amount thus realised during the last six months is very nearly equal to that of the previous year. This arises from the pleasing circumstance that the Scriptures sold lately were entire Bibles, and mostly in two languages, while the books were likewise of greater value than those disposed of previously.

I shall not dwell on the labour it has cost me to attain these results; results that will be considered as highly satisfactory by every one acquainted with the character of the mixed population of this city. To have been instrumental in prevailing on so many to purchase and possess the Word of Life and sound evangelical books, is ample compensation for whatever labour and fatigue I may have endured. And I attach great importance to the opportunities which this work affords me of proclaiming the glad tidings of salvation to many of all classes, whom, otherwise, I might not be able to reach.

I continue to hold the requisite authorisation, not only to protect me in pursuing the work, but with hopes that ere long I shall be supplied with means for re-establishing the Depôt and extending operations into the interior of this province.

The expenditure, exclusive of expenses on the books arrived, which are paid from the proceeds of their sale, and after deducting the sum realised by the sale of the fixtures and furniture of the Depôt, amounted at the end of Sept. to 189½ 13s. 3d. This is at the rate of 7½ 15s. 2d. per month. The income from all sources, inclusive of 7½ 5s. received through Evangelical Christendom, was 187½ 5s., leaving 2½ 8s. 3d.

excess of expenditure over income. To this small sum have to be added 10*l*. 19*s*. 5*d*. of books purchased, and of which 442 remain on hand. I feel persuaded an enterprise of this nature could not be carried on in these parts for the same period, either by a depôt or the employment of colporteurs, with greater economy and equally satisfactory results.

Reserving other particulars for a future letter, I remain, dear Sirs,

Yours very sincerely,

A. BRUNEL.

P.S.—The Rev. B. Weiss, missionary at Algiers, in his letter in Evangelical Christendom for July, charges me with a mistake, in stating that the Depôt established by me in Oran was the first in Algeria. I apprehend the supposed error lies in the use made of that term. I do not call depôt a store where books are kept. If I did, I had one here as early as 1849. Nor do I call depôt a shop where stationery, and all kinds of publications, as well as Bibles and religious books, are sold. I knew that Mr. Weiss had opened a shop of this sort at Algiers. I call depôt that where only Bibles and the publications of the various religious book and tract societies are offered for sale. Did I deem it consistent with my position and sacred calling to make the Depôt in Oran such as it is at Algiers, I believe it would be self-supporting; but I have always thought that, as a missionary, I must have nothing whatever to do with transactions of a mercantile nature. The missionary, much more than ministers at home, should, in my conception, abstain from everything that might lead people to think that he loves to acquire and accumulate riches. However groundless the supposition may be, it is most damaging to his character and prospects of usefulness, especially to those who labour among God's ancient people.

Literary Correspondence.

SANSKRIT AND MISSIONARY WORK.

As the writer of the letter given below has given us his real name and address in confidence, which we shall not abuse, and we see is in reality a missionary under a highly-valued society, we have determined to let him speak for himself in reply to our remarks. We wish to deal kindly with him, and yet we cannot but say that we feel as if our readers will scarcely think we ought to have published this document. We speak in love when we call attention to the want of fitness for their work exhibited by some missionaries. It is all very well to say "God has no need of your learning," but the reply is worth being borne in mind, "God has as little need of your ignorance." Our correspondent tells us in his letter several things which we knew very well before. We need not remark further on his letter. It speaks for itself. But we would protest against the principle advocated by our correspondent in adducing the old story of the poor woman who mistook the meaning of "metaphysics"—namely, that it is the duty of the preacher to preach down to the lowest intellectual level of his audience, and to ignore all that rises above that level, instead of endeavouring to elevate their intellectual condition. Whether such a principle savours more of humility or of laziness may be a question. The more charitable construction will assuredly not be put upon it by all judges, even among those who most earnestly desire the spread of the Gospel.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Dear Sirs,—Ignorant of the fact that your rules did not permit the insertion of anonymous letters, I took the liberty of addressing you under the signature of "One Born in Bengal."

Whilst thanking you for the courtesy manifested in your waiving "for once" your objection, you will allow me to apologise for having placed you in a position which led you to depart from that rule.

Not being ashamed of the opinions on the subject, which a practical experience of some years has led me to entertain, I should have put my name to the article I sent you but for the reason mentioned hereafter.

Had I been accustomed to write for the press, I might also have been aware of the fact, which has only this day been brought to my notice, that it was usual to forward a card of address, and I should most certainly not have transgressed in this matter.

Premising thus far, you will bear with me for a moment, in order that I may furnish you with that which to me appears sufficient reason for concealing my name.

I always prefer to base my arguments upon facts with which I may have become personally acquainted, and do not like, as a general rule, to meddle with theories which cannot be established by facts.

Feeling that my signature might give a clue to my connexion, and thus set on foot inquiries regarding the persons connected with the facts mentioned, and which inquiries might again have turned a discussion of principles into one of personalities, I feel justified in assuming a disguise.

Your foot-note, regarding the obtaining of a prize, shows me still more forcibly the justice of the conclusion arrived at above. You there charge me with doing wrong to a party whom I did not for one moment wish to injure; and, by the mention of the names of parties engaged in that contest, you make it a personal matter.

It would not now be right to ask for the insertion of a second anonymous article, and therefore I do not request you to insert this letter; yet, as your remarks may put a construction on words which I never designed them to bear, will you favour me by giving a statement of your own in your next number, based on the following part of this letter?

The use of the words, "is the one medium of approach to the heart of the Hindoo," was understood by me to refer to preaching, or discussions in general, in Bengal. The words, "however unlearned," &c., further confirmed me in that opinion; but I was not singular in this conclusion. Had I found myself alone in this interpretation, I should have yielded to the better judgment of others. Whilst, therefore, I accept your explanation, I yet feel that the words referred to will, without special pleading, bear that construction.

Again, I think you have mistaken the whole tenor of my letter. I do not combat any proposition to prepare the missionary before he starts for his field of labour. I would give him every facility for the attainment of the vernacular of that particular portion of the Lord's vineyard to which he might desire to devote his energies, and I would also wish the candidate for missionary work to begin with that endeavour at the first commencement of his college course; but I make a distinction in the use of the word vernacular. In it I do not include the Sanskrit.

Before and after retiring from secular employment I have heard objections raised to the class of words employed by certain preachers, and as to their written works, that the language was too high. The mass of their hearers and readers could not understand it. It was like the word metaphysics used in the pulpit of a poor village congregation, where a good old woman made it out to be that Christ was her "meat and physic too." A fair knowledge of Sanskrit would, dear Sirs, in my humble opinion, lead nine out of ten of missionary brethren to shoot above the mark, as good John Bunyan has it.

The mass of the inhabitants of India is truly enveloped in the mists and shadows of ignorance. A knowledge of Sanskrit has been discouraged by the announcement of a curse upon any sect below that of the Brahmin which should attempt to read any other of the sacred works than those allowed by the priests. No Roman priest has encouraged ignorance more assiduously than the Brahmin. Whilst I lament it deeply, still I feel the necessity of eschewing a language which might be understood by one out of, I think I may safely say, a thousand only of those with whom we have to deal, and for these reasons I have made statements which may have warranted you, though I do not consider that you are justified, in the expression, "Certainly it is a new thing to see a missionary contending that he is a better man for not knowing the sacred language of the people."

With regard to the words, "a missionary unable to make himself intelligible to his servants certainly must be a useful man," I must beg the favour of your correcting any b impression your words might convey, by stating that there are departments of missionary labour in which such a man may be not only "useful," but truly valuable. I do not say that an acquaintance with the colloquial might not make him more valuable, but I simply state that, without the use of an interpreter, using only his mother tongue, his services have been most valuable; and that I think I could prove that the majority of those who, within the last fifteen years, have joined the society with which he is connected, attribute their conversion, under God, to his instructions and affectionate dealings with them, conveyed through the medium of English. And I feel assured that, if comparisons were made, he would stand first in the class of those who had led most out of the errors of Hindooism during his period of labour and in his missionary circle.

You may not, perhaps, be aware that English has been largely cultivated in the metropolis of Bengal, and that the rising generation of the middle classes there are accustomed to speak much in English. Amongst such you will allow that, notwithstanding his ignorance of the vernacular, there is no anomaly in the fact stated with regard to the individual referred to.

As I do not wish to appear (for the reason given) in other than the signature adopted, allow me to beg you, by giving a statement which will correct any wrong impression your words might convey, to absolve me from the design to wrong or injure those whom I love and esteem.

Indignance at the use of certain phrases, such as "rose-water," "slip-slop," "Sanskrit the one medium of approach to the heart of the Hindoo," all of which I conceived to refer to the language used by those who are bearing the heat and the burden of the day, lead me, much as I hate all controversy, save that upon points vital to the welfare of the soul, to take up my pen in defence of my brethren.

That a knowledge of Sanskrit has its value I do not deny, but that it is as valuable to the missionary as Sanskritists wish us to believe, is I conceive erroneous. Next to Chinese it is probably the most difficult of acquirement, and in one respect even more so, as it is not a spoken language. To this, however, in the abstract, I do not allude, for I may safely assume that every successful Bengali speaker, had he turned his attention to the subject, might have obtained your coveted acquisition. But when we consider the brevity of missionary life, the danger of acquiring a vocabulary in the use of which he will assuredly preach above the comprehension of his hearers, and the well known facility of speech which some of our non-Sanskrit preachers have obtained in India, I think we may safely leave Sanskrit to those whose mental inclinations will naturally direct them to so fascinating a study, and to a channel which they may consider as "the one" that will so certainly conduct them into the "ocean" of Hindoo love.

Grieving that any personal allusion has arisen out of my humble endeavours to defend my brethren, I remain, dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,

ONE BORN IN BENGAL.

Literature.

Christ, the Light of the World: Biblical Studies on the First Ten Chapters of St. John's Gospel. By RUDOLPH BESSER, D.D. Translated from the German, by M. G. HUXTABLE. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 1861.

WE are indebted to the enterprise of the Messrs. Clark for most of the English translations of Evangelical theological works brought out in Germany—and we generally read the works published by that firm with great interest.

The work which is now before us is full of a sweet Evangelical spirit. It is not critical, nor intended to be so. It does not clear up the difficulties that are to be met with in the portion of Scripture it treats of, but it cannot but be read with pleasure by a devotional soul. The translation is smooth, rarely rugged, and in very many passages we might almost fancy we were reading a book originally written in English. The language is attractive—we give an instance from the beginning of the book :—

The old Fathers have been wont to compare St. John to an eagle, and the comparison is just; in profound meditation upon the truths of our redemption, he mounts up on the wings of devotion, even to the very loftiest heights of these blessed mysteries. In fact, with that loving gaze fixed upwards upon the Light of Life, his own eye has become light—the sun has made it sun-like. The beauteous lightness of peace is diffused upon him. If, on the one hand, the sun never mirrors his glorious face in the sea amid the storm, on the other hand, it is likewise true that in the blessed repose of such a soul as St. John's the face of heaven's sun is mirrored back in clear and faithful reflection.

But there are serious drawbacks to be made with respect to Dr. Besser's book. He is a strict Lutheran, and his comments are disfigured with a tone of high sacramentalism in many places. He holds, indeed, and enforces very often, the cardinal doctrine that salvation is by faith alone in a crucified Saviour. He is clear on the atonement. But the doctrine of consubstantiation very plainly appears in his comments on the sixth chapter, and the doctrine of baptismal regeneration is distinctly stated in his comments on the third. We are glad to find the Lord Jesus exalted while such doctrines, which we hold to take away from His glory and the glory of the Holy Spirit, are held. The translator has affixed no note of warning to the passage which treats of baptismal regeneration, whether from a desire to execute the translation impartially, or from a leaning to the views of the author, we know not. But he has affixed to Dr. Besser's comments on the sixth chapter a note explanatory of Lutheran views, and therefore we see no reason why the precaution should not have been taken with respect to the passage that treats of baptism, unless the translation coincides with Dr. Besser's views.

To those who are established in the faith we commend the perusal of this book, from which they will derive much profit and pleasure, but we trust it will not be placed in the hands of those who are predisposed to Tractarian views, as such are too likely, from the morbid sentimentalism of their nature, to reject the gold and preserve the dross, to cast away the wheat and eat the chaff.

Nichol's Series of Standard Divines. Puritan Period. Vols. I—III. The Works of THOMAS GOODWIN, D.D., with Preface by JOHN C. MILLER, D.D., and Memoir by ROBERT HALLEY, D.D.—The Works of THOMAS ADAMS, with Memoir by JOSEPH ANGUS, D.D. Vol. I. Edinburgh: James Nichol.

THESE handsome volumes are the first of a series which it is intended shall comprise some of the weightiest works of the greatest Puritan writers. Six similar volumes are to be delivered annually to the gentlemen who prudently invest a yearly subscription of one guinea. During the first five years the issues are to consist of works by J. Goodwin, R. Sibbes, S. Charnock, and T. Adams. During a second lustrum, or like period of five years, the issues are to consist of works by Manton, Reynolds, Brooks, and Clarkson. The editorial department is in excellent hands, and will therefore be ably conducted. Memoirs will be supplied by eminent writers, and, altogether, everything is promised which is likely to make the undertaking a great success. We are aware that there has been less attention paid to the Puritan divines of late years than formerly; but it is very much to be regretted. Under a somewhat rough and quaint exterior, many of these writings embody gems of sanctified thought of priceless value. A return to a more general appreciation of this noble department of our literature is most earnestly to be desired on every account. Laity and clergy alike will do well to avail themselves of the opportunity now presented to them of securing a collection of the best works of the best authors. Many of the original treatises are scarce, and consequently very expensive. To many, also, their antiquated form and garb is an objection. But now, for a mere trifle, all who choose may obtain these works in an attractive and even elegant dress. Six volumes in octavo for a guinea, and containing something like four thousand pages, is indeed a marvel of cheapness. We hope, therefore, that all whom interest or curiosity prompts will hasten to give their names as subscribers. The three volumes of Goodwin, besides a mass of matter by himself, contain two memoirs, one by his son, and one by Dr. Halley. That by Dr. Halley is able and searching, and throws light upon the history of the times, as well as upon the character of Dr. Goodwin, who died in 1679. We cannot enumerate the various contents of these volumes, but they are all indicative of the profound talent and spiritual insight of their author. The volume of Adams contains sermons on texts from the Old Testament, and shows him to have been an admirable expounder of Holy Writ. In conclusion, we remark that there was great need, in these days of superficial divinity, to recur to the writings of a period rich above all others in deep and spiritual investigations of sound truth, in full and scriptural expositions of Christian doctrine, and in living and true representations of Christian experience. It is therefore with real pleasure that we take the present opportunity of strongly urging all who can to secure possession of these valuable works.

Textual Criticism of the New Testament for English Bible Students; being a comparison of the Authorised Version with Critical Texts and Uncial MSS. By C. E. STUART. S. Bagster and Sons.

MR. STUART has compiled a useful little manual, the value of which will be understood by intelligent readers if they will carefully peruse his introduction. The author follows Dr. Tregelles in his leading principles with regard to the age and importance of Greek manuscripts in uncial or capital letters. About these and other matters, he gives tolerably correct information in the introduction to which we have referred. The body of the book contains a list of those passages in the Authorised Version which differ from some of the uncial manuscripts, and from some of the critical editions. We wish he had left these latter out, or had more plainly stated that they are, after all, only expressive of the opinions of certain modern scholars as to the balance of evidence. It is, of course, very well to know which readings are preferred by Griesbach, Scholz, Lachmann, Alford, Tischendorf and Tregelles; but it will be seen at a glance that they do not always agree, and in any case they are not authorities except in a modified sense. We would much rather that instead of these Mr. Stuart had given us the readings of the ancient versions he mentions. As it is, we are much obliged to him for the pains he has taken to show how far the uncials agree or differ in regard to particular readings. In reference to the Alexandrian manuscript, he says it contains all the New Testament but 2 Cor. iv. 13, xii. 6, which is an error, because it commences at Matthew, xxv. 6, and also wants John vi. 50 to viii. 52; yet he says this MS. omitted John vii. 53 to viii. 12—a circumstance which is probable, but cannot be proved. In 1 Tim. iii. 16 also he says the same MS. reads "who" for "God," but this too is contradicted by some, as by Mr. Scrivener, and is very doubtful.

A Key to the Emblems of Solomon's Song: with a Translation. By the Rev. A. MOODY STUART. James Nisbet and Co.

IN his preface, Mr. Stuart intimates that this translation is a reprint from his own exposition of the Song of Solomon. He tells us that although less close to the original in some parts than our Authorised Version, every third line will, on an average, be found nearer to the Hebrew. As far as we can judge of the author's aim, it has been to make a translation more in harmony with modern ideas of refinement, delicacy, &c. It is needless to say, that there is not much room for such things. When the original was written, men's notions were more simple, and their language more natural and undisguised than at present. Besides which, in every language there is a constant movement going on by which words are elevated or depressed in rank, and become more or less polite. Now, litera scripta manet, and we cannot alter the written word; there it is, and we must take it as it is, or resort to paraphrases like Mr. Stuart. If along with the paraphrase we have a literal version, well and good; we can judge for ourselves if we will. We will admit that Mr. Stuart's version looks pretty, but we do not regard it as very exact. As for his "Key to the Emblems," we cannot accept it as a fair specimen of Biblical interpretation. It is with positive regret that we see such vague, conjectural, unsupported, and inconsistent explanations as many of these are, put forth as the mind of the Spirit. The writer's ideas are conducive to piety; but, as a rule, they are, we think, not the ideas of the Song of Solomon. The publishers have got up this little volume very elegantly.

Hymns of Faith and Hope. Second Series. By HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. Nisbet and Co.

OUR readers already know Dr. Bonar as a poet; if they do not, the loss is theirs, and they had better at once make their acquaintance with him in that character. There is a freshness and vigour, an earnestness and a piety in these compositions, which is very gratifying. The language is not high-flown, fanciful, and strained, and yet it is highly poetical. Indeed, whether we regard the choice of subjects, their treatment, or the spirit of the book, we are greatly pleased with it. The author's intellect and imagination, equally with his command of language, are laid under tribute, and serve him for the setting forth of Scripture truth and Christian experience. Some of the pieces are very beautiful, and, on the whole, we have much pleasure in recommending the volume to our readers. The following we give for its brevity and quaintness:—

"REDEEM THE TIME.

Death worketh,
Let me work too;
Death undoeth,
Let me do.

Busy as death my work I ply,
Till I rest in the rest of eternity.

Time worketh,
Let me work too;
Time undoeth,
Let me do.

Busy as time my work I ply,
Till I rest in the rest of eternity.

Sin worketh,
Let me work too;
Sin undoeth,
Let me do.

Busy as sin my work I ply,
Till I rest in the rest of eternity."

The Perpetual Obligation of the Sabbath; with some Considerations on the Subject, not Generally Noticed, and an Answer to the Objections of Dean Alford and Dr. Hessey. By the Rev. EDWARD BILEY, M.A. Seeleys.

THIS pamphlet contains some good points, and its decided tendency will be apparent from the title-page. But we are not aware that there is any remarkable novelty in the views advanced, and we are glad it is so, for in our judgment new arguments for the Sabbath and new views upon the Sabbath question are usually to be suspected. There are some rather novel opinions and explanations, but they weigh far less with us than the older and better known.

Mr. Biley makes some pretensions to critical ability, but we are not particularly struck with many of its exhibitions, for to us they appear rather strained and one-sided. We do not believe that the fourth commandment is so worded as not to distinguish the Jewish Sabbath from the Christian. To us it is like the prophecies, which have a double fulfilment—a nearer and a more remote one: it was addressed to the Jewish Church, but it is none the less a law for us. With these reserves, we have pleasure in commending Mr. Biley's pamphlet as very excellent.

Select Works of the Rev. Robert Robinson, of Cambridge. Edited, with Memoir, by the Rev. WM. ROBINSON. Heaton and Son.

THIS is the second volume of what is called the "Bunyan Library," which is, we believe, a selection from eminent Baptist writers. Robert Robinson appears to have been a highly-gifted and, in many respects, an estimable man; his writings display great vigour and earnestness; but he was evidently inclined to be violent in the expression of [his opinions; and yet a man who, from a Pædobaptist, became a patron of adult baptism by sprinkling, passed from this to common Baptist principles, and ended as a Socinian. We may question the propriety of comprising this volume in the "Bunyan Library," because of the great changes—the phases of faith and practice through which Robinson passed. Still, the volume is a very interesting one as a whole, and is well edited and got up.

Ministerial Recollections. With Preface by the Rev. ANNE W. BROWN, M.A. Wertheim, Macintosh, and Hunt.

A VOLUME of striking records drawn from the experience of various clergymen, and originally published in the Churchman's Penny Magazine. Some of these narratives are very solemn and impressive, and, taken as a whole, they are calculated to produce the most beneficial results. Ministers have many opportunities of observing the evil consequences of sin and unbelief, and of the blessed effects of the grace of God in the conversion of sinners. We feel assured that the writers of these papers have accurately described the events they record, and that the book which has thus been produced will be a valuable and useful addition to congregational or school libraries.

The Leisure Hour: 1861.—The Sunday at Home: 1861. Religious Tract Society.

THE mass of instructive and pleasant reading contained in a volume of the Leisure Hour would scarcely be imagined by those who ma happen occasionally to glance over a single number. To tens of thousands its pages are as the face of a familiar friend, but it deserves, from its adaptation to the popular mind, a yet wider circulation. Its conductors have evidently a keen eye for all that is passing around them; upon current topics which come within its range the pen and the pencil are brought into combined action precisely at the proper moment, so that their results are scarcely less certain of inspection by those into whose hands they come than—taking another class of readers—is a morning newspaper upon the breakfast-table. Tales of substantial merit form a leading feature of the Leisure Hour, and natural history, biography, travels, and a host of miscellaneous subjects, are included within its pages. The scope of the Sunday at Home is, in one sense, more limited, but its success is at least equal to that of the companion work. Many persons, especially the young, to whom a commentary is unattractive or inaccessible, may here find what may prove as useful to them as the contents of ponderous tomes of exegetical divinity have done to others. The topics discussed, under a variety of aspects, are drawn more largely from the Scriptures than from any other source; but missions, travels, poetry, current religious intelligence, and other matters, also find a place in the Sunday at Home. The wood engravings in both periodicals are well executed.

The Cottager in Town and Country. 1861.
Religious Tract Society.

THIS cheap and well-conducted periodical is calculated to be of great use among the class for which it is intended. It is on a broad Evangelical basis, and free from all denominational bias. The contents are very diversified, and fitted to convey valuable instruction on religious, moral, and miscellaneous subjects. It is printed in a large type, and admirably illustrated.

Footsteps of the Reformers in Foreign Lands.
Religious Tract Society.

THIS volume consists of a series of historical sketches of the most illustrious Reformers, introduced by lively descriptions of the places which, in connexion with their presence and achievements, have acquired widespread celebrity. We have thus some eight or ten brief and attractive pieces of a historico-biographical kind, with delineations of varied foreign scenery, John Huss at Prague, Zwingle at Zurich, and Martin Luther at Wittenburg, are among the men and the places brought beneath our notice. The work is tolerably well written, beautifully illustrated, and got up generally in a style which will commend it to the taste of those who contemplate, at this season, making presents, from which the recipient shall derive permanent benefit as well as immediate pleasure.

A Manual of Private and Domestic Prayer. with Meditations for Every Day in the Week:
selected from the works of the Rev. JOHN INETT, D.D., by the Rev. HENRY GRYLLE,
A.M. Tresidder.

MR. GRYLLE does not give the title of the work from which this is an extract. The only publication bearing the name of Dr. Inett with which we are acquainted is an English Church history, in continuation of Bishop Stillingfleet, and published in 1704—1710. It appears, however, that he wrote more, and we are much obliged to the editor of this little volume for the interesting selections he has favoured us with. The prayers and meditations alike breathe a spirit of real, deep, and fervent piety, and may therefore be perused with edification. They will suggest suitable topics for reflection and supplication.

Mighty through God. Some Account of the Extraordinary Labours of Mr. George Müller (of Bristol), as Founder and Director of an Institution for Missionary Work at Home and Abroad, and other Operations. By W. ELFR
TAYLER. Wertheim, Macintosh, and Co.

MR. TAYLER resides at Bristol, and has many opportunities of testing the accuracy of the facts here records; we may therefore confidently accept the remarkable narrative with which he has favoured us. The operations of Mr. Müller, and the principle upon which they are carried on, are so well known in general, that we need not go into detail. God has given him great honour as well as responsibility, and a heart to work, and hitherto all has been well. We wish a little more prominence were given to some of Mr. Müller's coadjutors; for while he undoubtedly is the leader and head of the movement, he is not alone. It is with much pleasure that we call attention to Mr. Tayler's interesting report.

The Torn Bible. By ALICE SOMERTON. Seeley,
Jackson and Halliday.

A VERY pleasing narrative, founded upon the life and experience of a youth who received as a parting gift from his mother a Bible, which he promised to read, but neglected to do. After long years and many changes this person is wounded in India, and brought nigh to death. He is converted, and discovers that the Bible which he had torn and alighted had received the bullet which would have entered his heart. The hero lives to return home. The authoress has woven a very agreeable story, but doubtless some will think her principles not sufficiently in harmony with those of the Peace Society.

George Blackburn; or, the Last Hours of a Secularist. By his Widow, ELIZABETH BLACKBURN. Addressed to Working Men. With Reflections on Unbelief, and a Brief View of the Evidences of the Christian Religion. By the Rev. HENRY FRY, D.D. Wertheim, Macintosh, and Hunt.

GEORGE BLACKBURN was a working man, who renounced a profession of religion, and became ensnared by the disciples of secularism, of which he became an apostle. He lived to see, repent of, and renounce his error, and bore his dying testimony in favour of Christianity and against infidelity. His wife, who is a godly woman, prepared this brief account of him for the benefit of others. Dr. Fry has added other matter, in the hope that the publication may be serviceable, by the blessing of God, to those who have already fallen, or are in the way of temptation. We cheerfully commend this small volume to the notice of our readers, some of whom may find it just what they require.

Gospel Truths. By ROBERT BROWN. Nos. I. to VII. Wertheim, Macintosh, and Co.

THE object of these little books is practical, and they are written in simple, earnest language, and in an excellent spirit. We think they deserve an extensive circulation. The subjects are: "The Lord Jesus Christ Coming to the Sinner," "The Sinner Coming to the Lord Jesus Christ," "Confession and Prayer (chiefly in Scripture Language) for an Awakening Sinner," "The Awakening Soul's Complaint, with Christ's Loving Answer and the Soul's Surrender," "The Power of Faith," "The Trial of Faith," "The Reward of Faith."

The State of the Church in the Latter Ages of the World, &c.; being an Earnest Appeal and Warning to British Statesmen, Ministers of the Gospel, and to the People themselves. Collated and abridged from the writings of JOHN OWEN. By JOHN HAMPDEN, Esq. Nisbets.

JOHN HAMPDEN, Esq., might have been better employed. How he collates the contents of this book from John Owen's works we cannot understand, but he probably has a meaning for the word which we have not met with. To collate a benefice and to collate a book is intelligible, but to collate from a book is past our comprehension. Dr. Owen was a good and wise man, and what he wrote is like him, but John Hampden has not made the wisest application of the selections he has made.

Baptismal Regeneration. By G. W. MYLNE. H. J. Treasider.

CONTAINS some very good things against the erroneous view of baptism indicated by its title.

Oppositions of Science Falsely so Called. Addressed to the Brethren. By ADLPHOS. London: for the Author.

THE object of this tract seems to be to dissuade men from the irreligious aspect in which science is often presented; but it calls for no particular remark.

The Child's Companion and Juvenile Instructor. Religious Tract Society.

THIS little serial has now been in existence seventeen years, and the present volume is equal in interest to its predecessors. The title well describes its character, and we can cordially recommend it as an appropriate companion and instructor for our young friends, who may be made the wiser and better for its influence.

Prayer Answered in the History of the Crosby Hall Prayer-meeting. H. J. Treasider.

AN interesting little book, but not compiled with sufficient discretion.

Monthly Retrospect.

H O M E.

THE year just closed opened upon us with fair promise ; but its course has been a gloomy one ; and for the British Isles, at least, its sharpest stroke was reserved for the last. The Prince Consort is dead ! In that one sentence how much there is of anxiety and solicitude for the future of the country ! The husband of our Queen, the guide of her youth, on whose calm wisdom and mature judgment she was accustomed to lean in all the cares and perplexities of empire during the last twenty years, is now removed from her ; and she is left to bear the burden of State without further assistance from a counsellor so tried, so tender and true. Her and our loss in him—for we presume not here to speak of Her Majesty's domestic sorrow—is the more irreparable that he had created for himself a position in the State, not alien indeed to the genius of our Constitution, but one for which it makes no provision—a position dependent on personal character, and not ministerial appointment—one which can only be fitly discharged by a husband or a near relative, but which few husbands could discharge so well. Within two years of the Royal marriage, the late Sir Robert Peel, recognising the high qualities of the Prince, advised Her Majesty to associate her husband with her in the cares of empire, and from that time onward to his lamented death he was always present by the side of the Sovereign in her official interviews with her Ministers, listening to and discussing with them high questions of State policy, and occasionally making suggestions which the wisest admitted to be pregnant with instruction. Of his abilities in this point of view, indeed, we need no higher testimony than that of our present Prime Minister, who is reported to have said that his Royal Highness held all the tangled threads of foreign policy in his hand, and was better able to separate them than any other statesman in Europe. That was the phase of his character presented to Ministers of State. To the public at large he was chiefly known as the patron of science and art, the stimulator of invention and improvement, the head of all that was elegant and graceful in our national life. After twenty years spent in these important duties, most unobtrusively performed, he is snatched away in the full vigour of manhood, when his mind was ripened, his judgment matured, his value to the country acknowledged, and at a time when his counsel to Her Majesty would have been infinitely more precious than ever, as there is too much reason to fear that we are about to enter once more upon the horrors of war. It is for us only to bow in silence under this sore national stroke, and to recommend our widowed Sovereign to the tender care of Him who is the Father of the fatherless and the Husband of the widow.

For the first time since the establishment of the Church of England her Primate has been called, within the last few weeks, to consecrate a clergyman of the Church of England to take the episcopal oversight of a Church in a foreign and independent territory. Colonial bishops have of late been common enough; and in the course of last year there was a good deal of discussion, both in and out of the Church, as to the consecration of missionary bishops, on which point a compromise was at last agreed to. But the consecration of a Bishop of Honolulu, the capital of the King of the Sandwich Islands, at the hands of the Primate of England, was a new thing in the annals of the Church. Like other innovations, it has been made a party question of, and the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Oxford took different sides. Into that matter we shall not enter farther than to say, that as the calm wisdom and Evangelical zeal of the Primate was in the end enlisted on the side of the ordination, we are, upon the whole, disposed to augur favourably of the appointment. The new bishop is, we understand, a man of decided Evangelical principle; and as the consecration has taken place at the earnest request of the Hawaiian monarch, who wishes to adopt this mode of cultivating an alliance with England, we can only hope that his most sanguine wishes may be more than realised, and that the group which witnessed the death of our great circumnavigator may soon be united to the country that sent him forth in the bonds of civilisation and Christianity.

It is singular and sad to witness how, on the slightest possible occasion, the disloyal feeling of the lower classes of the Roman Catholics crops out. A short time ago some Irish Americans brought over to Ireland the bones—real or pretended—of Mr. M'Manus, a convicted traitor, who was reprieved from capital punishment in 1848, and, breaking his parole while in banishment, recently ended his days in California. The body was paraded through the principal towns of Ireland, and everywhere it was followed by gaping crowds, who testified in every possible way their regret for the failure of the enterprise which had proved so disastrous to Mr. M'Manus and his associates. More recently, on the first rumour of an impending war with America, a great gathering of the same class took place in the Rotunda, Dublin, where a magistrate and a member of Parliament—a gentleman calling himself the O'Donoghue—took the chair. He was unsupported by any one of his own rank, and, ashamed, we suppose, of the ridiculousness of his position, he has since withdrawn from the party. The Government have, at the same time, marked their reprobation of his conduct by removing him from the commission of the peace. It is fair to say, that the Roman Catholic priests took no part in either of these demonstrations; and we are charitable to believe that it is not only because they see no chance of the success of rebellion, but also because their Church has nothing to gain from the overthrow of law and order in Great Britain.

After the resignation by Mr. Spooner of his position as leader in the House of Commons of the attack on the Maynooth grant, there was some difficulty in finding a successor. Mr. Whalley, the member for Peterborough, at last volunteered himself as a fit and proper person for the vacant place. In the course of the recess the honourable gentleman has been making a tour in Scotland, and he addressed a large assembly of Protestants in the Dublin Rotunda. We regret to say that an examination of this gentleman's speeches, combined with all we know of his previous history, convinces us that he is not the right man in the right place. We do not yield either to Mr. Whalley or any of his supporters in our opposition to the Maynooth endowment; but it will be admitted by all that to appear in the House of Commons as the opponent of the grant requires, not courage only, but tact, judgment, moderation, information, and weight in the House; else he will only play into the hands of the Romanists. These were the qualities possessed by the late Sir Robert Inglis and Mr. Spooner; and justice requires us to add, they are not possessed by Mr. Whalley.

The Free Church of Scotland has just sustained a severe loss in the death of the Rev. Principal Cunningham, who took a leading part in the controversies that led to the disruption, and has ever since been one of the leaders of that body. On the death of Dr. Chalmers, he was unanimously chosen his successor as Principal of the Free Church College. Among all the eminent men who preferred their convictions to their emoluments, Dr. Cunningham stood pre-eminent for his courage, his honesty, his manly simplicity, and his severely logical style of argument. His vehement sense of right often impelled him to use language that his cooler moments refused to justify, but there was no man who bore less malice—none who was more distinguished for gentleness and kindness of heart.

We are glad to observe that the late fatal accident on the Brighton Railway has stirred up Christians throughout the country to endeavour to put a stop to the growing evil of Sunday railway excursions. An association with this object has lately been advertised. On this subject we may also observe that Christians on the Continent are also taking up the question of Sabbath observance. It is much wanted there, and we heartily wish the little band of reformers a God speed.

FOREIGN.

Very soon after these pages meet the eye of our readers—if not, indeed, before—the great issue of peace or war with America is likely to be determined. The seizure of the four gentlemen who were coming from the Confederate States of America to Europe, when on board an English mail-packet ship, has touched this country in the tenderest point—the right to give asylum to men of all nations, without regard to their political opinions. It is understood that our Government has sent a courteous, but firm demand to the Federal Government for the restoration of the prisoners, and an apology for the insult to our flag. If these are not complied with, our ambassador will at once leave Washington, and shortly afterwards we may look for war being declared in earnest. The British Government, in anticipation of the worst, has sent, or are in course of sending, a moderate-sized army for the defence of Canada, besides largely reinforcing our fleet on the American coast. These are distressing events. It is not for us here to discuss the right or wrong of the quarrel, the propriety or the impossibility of referring the case to arbitration; but no Christian man can fail to feel that, terrible as war is at its mildest, it assumes an aspect of peculiar ghastliness when carried on with our kinsfolk in America. We cannot conceive of a greater scandal to our common Protestantism than that two such nations as England and America should rush into war. We earnestly hope that some means may yet be devised of averting this catastrophe; and we rejoice to think that Christians on this side of the Atlantic have been engaged in crying mightily to Him who has the hearts of all men in His keeping, that He may dispose those on whom practically the decision rests, to thoughts of peace, and not of bloodshed.

There has been little or no change of late in the position of the armies engaged in the American civil war. But in its social condition there is a great revolution. The slavery question has at last, as it was long predicted it would, come to the front. When the war first began, the Northern leaders would not allow the question to be mentioned; in fact, many professed Abolitionists were willing to abandon their opinions, if thereby they could avert the strife. The first man to work upon the emancipation question in the war was General Fremont; and he, it is understood, was cashiered for it. Since then, other military officers have spoken in the same tone; but the most important declaration yet made on the subject is that contained in the message of the President, delivered to Congress in the beginning of last month. Mr. Lincoln suggests that, in the different expeditions made to the Southern coast, the slaves who may be found there shall be hired to work for wages in the invading army, and that they shall afterwards be emancipated. We cannot but regard this as a step in measured, but intelligible language, towards raising a servile war in the South. It may be right, but the men who have resolved on that step must have abandoned all hope of future conciliation. We may speak the more freely of this policy, as it is clear that the President has no respect for the slaves themselves. On the contrary, he quietly proposes to expatriate the whole coloured population from the American soil. His proposal is, when the war is over, to acquire some genial clime to which all the emancipated negroes of the South and all the free negro population of the North may be transported in one grand scheme of colonisation. But how if the free negroes choose to remain where they are? That is a contingency which does not appear to have entered the President's mind. We rejoice, however, in spite of these drawbacks, that the wrongs of the negro are forcing themselves upon the American mind. Many a man stirs a question he finds too vast for him to settle. Louis Napoleon opened the Italian question, but he could not close it as he pleased, and the same fate may befall President Lincoln and the negroes.

The recent elections in Prussia, which have given the death-blow to the old absolutist system of Government so much in force in the last reign, and which has hitherto exercised some influence on the present, have been watched with much and curious interest in England for their political effects. In the letter of our German correspondent will be found a clear and interesting summary of the influence they are expected to exercise on religion. Many good people are alarmed at the spring-flood of Liberalism which has overspread the land, and fancy that all that is best worth preserving in Prussia will be swept down before it. Our correspondent, who does not himself share this view, accounts for it by the fact that the beaten party had contrived to make politics of their religion, and that many simpleminded persons believed their representations. His exposure of the delusion deserves careful perusal; and we can help him to a parallel case. Many of our readers must remember the doubts and fears that were entertained by good but timid men as to the blighting influence upon religion, or at all events on the Church Establishment, of the Reform Bill. Th upholders of the former system had so contrived to identify themselves in the popular mind with the support of the Church, that while one section hated it for their sakes, another believed that it could not survive their fall. Time has exposed both errors. The old regime, and the men who administered it, have passed away, leaving scarcely a trace behind them, and yet it would be difficult to point to any period in English history when religion was more vitally active, or when the Established Church had a firmer hold on the mass of the people. Parties differ whether this latter circumstance be a gratifying or a deplorable result, but no one disputes the fact.

We are so much accustomed to the influence of the French Empire upon other countries, that we are apt to forget its internal condition. Our correspondent "X.X.X." seasonably reminds us of the sharp contest between light and darkness that is raging within that important territory. No one can deny the activity of the agents of the Romish Church; it would almost seem as if they had a presentiment that their power was short, and were therefore determined to make the most of it. Everywhere we hear of the raising of new associations, the revival of old monastic orders, the adoption of all measures, fair or foul, for the advancement of Romish ends. But all these efforts, executed, we must admit, with marvellous energy, are tinged incurably with the crimes of falsehood, dishonesty, and immorality. To Protestant eyes this is sufficiently shocking; but we must not too readily conclude that it has the same effect on the Romish population. With honest and upright, but ill-instructed persons, the result is too often, as our correspondent points out, the rejection of religion altogether; while of the bulk of the population it may be said, "The prophets prophesy falsely, and the people love to have it so." It is gratifying to find, however, that in the midst of all these delusions the work of evangelization goes on. The Protestants in France are in a position of great difficulty, and exposed to peculiar dangers. It is not enough that they have to contend with the persecutions of the Romish priesthood; but they are also subjected to a vicious Government arrangement, by which neologians and rationalists assume their name, enter into their assemblies, and may even obtain a majority in their counsels. It is satisfactory to find that, in spite of all these obstacles, they are making head, especially in the North of France. They have need of all our sympathies and our prayers.

A sombre picture is drawn by our Amsterdam correspondent of the absolute sway of Rationalism and lifeless orthodoxy among the Protestant Churches of Holland. From Italy we have cheering intelligence of progress in every department of educational effort, and among all classes. We are reminded of "Havelock's men" as we read the communication from Nagpore, of a daily gathering of soldiers for devotional exercises. The letters from Sweden and Northern Africa have also their different points of interest.

Evangelical Alliance.

“NOTE.—The Evangelical Alliance is responsible only for what is inserted under this head,”

INVITATION TO SPECIAL AND UNITED PRAYER, ISSUED BY THE COUNCIL OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION, NEW YEAR'S DAY, 1862.

AMONG the many qualities required in the servants of the Lord at this time, there is one which should be specially sought for with unceasing and humble prayer. In 1. Chron. xii. 32 it is said that “the children of Issachar were men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do.” One New Testament exhibition of this quality is to be found in Phil. i. 9, where St. Paul prays that the abounding love may be directed by “knowledge and all judgment [perception], that they may approve things that are excellent, that they may be sincere and without offence [transparently genuine, and not laying stumbling-blocks] unto the day of Christ.” A day of vitality is necessarily a day of transition and change. The seeds of the future are cast in power on every side. Is not heavenly wisdom especially needed at such a time?

It may be very much questioned whether the practical wisdom of any individual, or of any body, much exceeds their humility. Societies may well believe the wise man's words, that “by humility are riches, honour, and life;” and St. Paul, in his charge to the elders of Ephesus, affirms that he “served the Lord with all humility of mind;” and it is from the lips of St. Peter, who had suffered so much damage by pride, that the exhortation comes, “Likewise, ye younger, be subject [subordinate] to your elders, and being all subject [subordinate] to one another, be clothed with humility, because God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.” Some of Christ's most useful and experienced servants feel that there is ground for apprehension, because they see, or think they see, that the fundamental grace of humility has not been attained by the Church at present in any eminent degree. One honoured servant of Christ lately said: “Wherever I go, whatever I read, there stands forth the I—I—I; the exalting of self, the identifying of God's kingdom with our own efforts, and the lifting up of ourselves above others. I really think it ought to form a subject of special prayer in the meetings of the New Year.” Another person, distinguished for spirituality of mind, bore testimony before a large number of Christian brethren, that “in all the true servants of God whom he had known (and he thanked God that he had had the privilege of knowing very many), he had not known one in whom this principle—the undue love of self—did not very manifestly declare itself.”

The Evangelical Alliance was formed to promote mutual understanding and warm affection among the true followers of the One Lord; and though opportunities of co-operation have presented themselves, which it would have been folly and negligence of the Lord's call not to have embraced, the primary purpose of the society needs unabated and watchful attention. Only out of union and communion of heart are effective combinations in Christian action likely to arise; and only by continuing in love are they to be maintained and perfected. Each individual Christian, then, and each member of this Alliance, may permit himself at the commencement of a new year to be reminded of the example of that Lord who, when He knew that the hour was come that He should depart out of this world unto the Father, gave His disciples an example of mingled love and humility, in that He washed their feet, and said, I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you, and added: If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.

But the discoveries of the time, the increased pride of life—yea, the new religious activities of the day—even the increase of meetings for united prayer, and religious revivals—have something in them that sometimes works contrary to the spirit of humility, and so tends to diminish love and to hinder success. What methods God may have in store to deliver His own chosen and honoured means of saving souls from this canker to which they are liable, we wait to see. But it will not be in vain to have indicated the disease, and called attention to its dangerous character.

It can hardly be doubted, that one of the greatest impediments to the progress of God's kingdom lies in His servants seeking to further their own pre-eminence, even while they are labouring in His work, and truly desiring His honour. The faults of hypocrites and pretenders are the stumbling-block of an hour. But with the defects of the eminent servants of God it is widely different. Their light, set on a hill, passes not under eclipse without causing great offence, and making many to fall.

It is impossible to pass over our need of humility as a nation. We feel assured that what is deemed an outrage upon our national ensign will be met in a spirit which will not fail of its reward from surrounding nations; but, at the same time, do not many of our countrymen display an unchristian pride in their intercourse with other nations, without the abatement of which we can hardly expect that our country will be sincerely loved?

Again, are there no manifest marks surviving of ecclesiastical pride in every denomination of Christ's Church amongst us?

If the manifest task of the dear brethren who are comprehended in this Alliance is to strive together for the promotion of Evangelical union, how needful it is for each one to take the lesson to himself, and to make a sacrifice of himself, on every fit occasion, for the sake of the brethren and for the glory of the Lord Jesus.

Would it not be in keeping with an age in which God has largely poured out His converting Spirit, to make the endowment of all His people with the most excellent grace of humility the object of repeated public and private supplication and family prayer throughout this entire year?

It is very evident that this is no time for slackening in the work of intercession and prayer. More urgent and more frequent supplications seem to be imperatively called for. We are rather awakening by degrees to a sense of the blessings that may be obtained, than in anything like full possession of them. It would seem that God is waiting for larger and more general intreaty; and it is questionable whether some have not drawn back, discouraged by the obstacles, and giving way to objections against meetings for united prayer. But the spirit of the whole Scripture is clear, "I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them." When the spirit of supplication is poured forth upon God's people, creating in them an abounding earnestness and tenderness of heart, so that they find increasing delight in embracing every occasion for prostrating themselves at the footstool of Divine mercy, both in public and in private, we may expect the fulfilment of the latter part of the promise in the last two verses of Ezekiel xxxvi. : "I will increase them with men like a flock: as the holy flock, as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts: and they shall know that I am the Lord."

Nor can it be denied that a special call is given to every Christian by the appearance on the public horizon of neologian doubts regarding some of the fundamentals of our faith. The grosser expression of these may be regarded as already rebuked, and to a great extent repudiated, by British Christians; but there is still remaining a doubt and uncertainty, amounting, in many cases, to a considerable extent of scepticism, which can only be removed by patient study of the very Word of God, and by the plain utterance of a complete Gospel, well sustained by fervent and pertinent demonstrations of the true force and power of Bible truth. To be free from the narrow interpretations of party, and yet not to be moved by latitudinarianism to surrender any point of truth, requires the "well-instructed scribe," both clerical and lay. Indeed, the broader liberty of action now generally allowed and assigned to Christian laymen makes the persevering study of the Word of God specially incumbent upon them; and most blessed results may arise in the throwing of an increased light on the inspired pages, if the experience and prayerfulness and spirit of judgment of the whole active body of Christ is brought to bear on the elucidation of the Scripture. God does not reveal everything to any one man, or to any class of men: it is in the communion of gifts of the Spirit that the Church becomes really learned and wise. The Father of Wisdom wishes His own to be one; the Redeemer expressly declared this intent; and the Holy Spirit worketh in each and all continually towards this end, dividing to every man severally as He will.

This is the alliance which God's true people expect and desire: and for this the members and friends of the Evangelical Alliance would both labour and pray.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

In consequence of the General Conference at Geneva this year, the Annual Conference of the British Organization was limited to a single day. This Fifteenth Conference of the British Branch of the Evangelical Alliance was held at Freemasons' Hall, London, Nov. 20, 1861. For a full report of the proceedings the reader is referred to the December No. of Evangelical Christendom, pp. 715—719. The Rev. W. Arthur, who had engaged to deliver the annual address, was prevented from doing so by a family bereavement, which summoned him to the Continent a few hours previous to the meeting. The reading and enforcement of the "Practical Resolutions," according to annual practice, was kindly undertaken by the Rev. T. A. Aston, Incumbent of Trinity Church, Tulse-hill.

The report of the Council for the year was adopted, and the Council appointed for the ensuing year. Several resolutions on subjects of great interest were adopted by the Conference, for copies of which see Evangelical Christendom of last month. One or two of these resolutions are again referred to for the purpose of stating the action which has subsequently been taken with reference to them.

One of these resolutions is the following:—

That the International Exhibition, to be held in London next year, seems to us a providential occasion, which we are bound to use, for making known the Gospel in the chief languages of Europe, and in every judicious mode, to the foreigners who visit London. The subject is entrusted to the Council, with instructions to initiate an independent committee for that purpose.

It is now reported that the Council have acted on these instructions, and that an influential committee has been formed, independent of the Evangelical Alliance, to promote the object contemplated, who have already entered upon their interesting and important work. The office of that committee is at present 1, Robert-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Another of the Conference resolutions, on which the Executive Council have since taken action, is that which relates to the spirit in which controversy on ecclesiastical subjects should be undertaken. It is as follows:—

That the Evangelical Alliance, being constituted for the promotion of Christian Union, deprecates the bitterness and alienation too often connected even with unavoidable controversies between Christians alike engaged in the work of Christ. This Conference, therefore, instructs the Council to prepare an address to all the members of the Alliance, urging upon their prayerful attention the fundamental principles of their union, and the duty of watchfulness over their own spirits, especially in reference to the ecclesiastical controversies of the times.

Acting in accordance with these instructions, the Council have prepared an address on this subject, intended for the members of the Alliance, which will in due time be published. The Council bespeak for this feeble effort the prayers of their brethren, that it may prove "a word spoken in season," and tend in some humble degree to promote "due forbearance and brotherly love."

Another subject brought before the London Conference, and which had previously occupied the attention of the Conference at Geneva, was that of a combined action on the Continent for the promotion of a better observance of the Lord's-day in continental countries. This very important movement originated in the reading of a paper at the Geneva Conference by M. Godet, of Neuchâtel. The committee have had the satisfaction of receiving the subjoined communications, relative to the progress of it. The first of these communications, which was laid before the committee at their meeting in October last, was as follows:—

We, the undersigned, from the South of Germany and Switzerland, make the earnest request, that a special committee for the Lord's-day be appointed by the Evangelical Alliance—to put themselves into correspondence and communication with the friends and promoters of the observance of the Lord's-day in all countries—for the purpose of aiding this important cause, by the publishing and spreading of suitable tracts or pamphlets on the subject, by lecturing or preaching on the question, and by reminding, if possible, the Government and authorities of the necessity of a due observance and sanctification of the Lord's-day, in order to save the people from utter ruin.

KARL MANN, Dean of Eppingen (Baden).
C. U. HAHN, D.D., Heslach (Wurtemberg).
B. Schmidheine, Pastor at Bondo-Grison.

The other letter, which follows, conveys the fact that a Lord's-day Observance Society has actually been formed. May the Lord of the Sabbath guide and abundantly bless this association of His servants to promote his glory!

To Sir C. Eardley, President of the Evangelical Alliance (British Branch), London.

Geneva, Nov. 18, 1861.

Dear and honoured Brother,—In compliance with the wish that you have expressed to one of our number, we are happy to inform you that a society for the sanctification of the Sunday has been formed for our country, and that the foundation of principles which had been already laid down on the 3rd instant, by a meeting of several friends of the object, was confirmed yesterday by a somewhat numerous assembly, convoked for the purpose at the Hall in the Rue du Soleil Levant, in this city.

Be so kind, if you think right, as to give information of this fact to our brethren assembled at this time in London for the Evangelical Alliance, and to salute them from us, asking their prayers on behalf of this infant work.

Accept, Sir and dear Brother, our fraternal and respectful salutations.

SPANISH PERSECUTION.

It will have been noticed by those who have made themselves acquainted with the proceedings of the Geneva Conference, that a letter of sympathy and encouraging counsel was—by direction, and in the name of the two thousand Evangelical Christians from all countries of the globe assembled at that Conference—addressed to their "Brethren in Spain, who are prisoners for the Gospel's sake." It will be known, too, that that fraternal communication was kindly conveyed to Matamoros and his fellow-sufferers by the Rev. A. R. C. Dallas, accompanied by the Rev. H. C. Eade. Admission was obtained by them with difficulty into the prison, in Granada, in which the three persecuted brethren are confined. But the interview, which lasted for three hours, was most comforting to the prisoners, who have since, in a private letter, described it as "like the visit of angels." The letter from the Conference is given at length in the November number of Evangelical Christendom (pp. 660—2), together with a few remarks on the interview by the members of the deputation.

The subject is referred to here in consequence of the recent receipt, by the Committee, of a letter from the Spanish brethren, written by them since the return of the deputation, in reply to the communication from the Conference. The length of the letter, which is dated, "The Prison of the Audiencia, in Granada," forbids its insertion in these pages in extenso; but the following extracts will indicate its tenor and spirit. After stating that it is impossible for the writers to give a suitable expression to their feelings of satisfaction and gratitude on receiving the communication from the Conference, and referring to the comfort which such a token of sympathy has afforded them in their sad imprisonment and manifold privations and sufferings, the letter thus proceeds:—

If, unhappily, in our unfortunate country it is a crime to love the Gospel; if vexations, and troubles, and imprisonments, and calumnies, and griefs, and the melancholy future which is placed before them, are the only inheritance which is provided for those who aspire to be humble, but decided and unchangeable disciples of Christ; if the only legal prospect presented to them is inhumanity and injustice; if, in arraigning Spanish Protestants before the tribunals, reason is laid aside, the public opinion of the age is disregarded, history is forgotten, charity condemned, and their trial turned into the tortures of the Inquisition; if, in short, there is no security for them in consequence of the spirit which governs their blind enemies; yet, in spite of all this, Spanish Christians calmly, very calmly, await their sentence from men. And let those who thus deal with them know that they await to-day, and may realise to-morrow, the horrible and gloomy future which threatens them, not as a misfortune, oh, no! a thousand times no! but as an honour—as a surpassing benefit, which affords them the inexpressible privilege of suffering for the sacred name of Jesus; which supplies them with an occasion of manifesting their unshaken faith before the eyes of the world, and in the presence of the enemies of their faith, who are also the enemies of their Divine Redeemer, Jesus Christ. In the midst of the tribulations which surround us, and the dangers which threaten us, do not doubt, beloved brethren, that with our eye fixed on the Lord, our spirits raised to Him, our confidence placed in Him, we shall know how to overcome calmly the afflictions that either now beset or hereafter may beset us; and, firm in the cause which our faith inspires, we shall be able to pass tranquilly through the danger. In the midst of our sorrows we will sing psalms of praises to the Lord; in our distresses we will pray with fervent desire and attachment to the cross of Christ, and we will fear nothing—nothing! The sacred, the undying remembrance of the infinite sufferings of our Lord—those agonies to which He voluntarily exposed Himself, to snatch us from death—will never be absent from our minds; and if our most beloved Redeemer bore all this for us, if He delivered us from the horrible slavery of sin, and opened to us the true and only way of life, what sufferings shall be able to intimidate us, if they are the consequence of our ardent love towards Him, and our desire humbly to pursue the path traced out for us by His Divine finger? How can we find danger in these happy circumstances? What shall we call evil? Is it in the body, or for the body? Oh! let the flesh pay its tribute to weakness, but let our souls pay their tribute to Him who saved them from eternal perdition; and if a premature death is the end of this struggle, let us rejoice and give thanks to the Lord for granting us the honour of losing our lives for His glorious name, as He sacrificed His to save us.

Poor and miserable sinners that we are, although our humble voice is not worthy or suitable to pay the truly felt and sincere tribute of admiration and respect to the Evangelical Alliance, nevertheless we affectionately intreat you to express to them in our humble name our profound Christian gratitude, and to give them our humble, but ardent salutations; with the fullest assurance that we are faithful interpreters of the Christian sentiments which animate the Spanish Protestants, who, whether in prison or at liberty, have had the consolation of rejoicing in the self-denial, the zeal, and the Christian love displayed by those worthy disciples of Christ, during the year of horrible persecution which we have experienced.

Those speaking acts, so worthily and energetically seconded by the mystical body of the Lord in Geneva, clearly and distinctly show the brilliant and comforting future which is preparing for the Church of Jesus Christ in the world; and we, "less than the least," and the most unworthy of those that glory in being members of that body, feel our hearts agitated with sacred and ineffable delight in contemplating those remarkable testimonies; and we desire earnestly the happy moment in which we shall be able to sacrifice all that we have to give, including even our existence itself, upon the altar of so sacred a cause—the cause of God, holy, pure, and truly for eternal happiness.

Receive for yourselves, and for all our dear brethren in the faith that is in Christ Jesus, the fullest assurance of our constant Christian love; of our deserved and never-ceasing gratitude; of our respect and our lively Christian sympathy; and we intreat you to convey the same to all those who had the happiness of joining in the Christian Assembly in Geneva. We desire to express this, not only for their pious resolutions relating to Spain, but for the comforts and spiritual benefits which they have abundantly procured for us by their earnest prayers; and we request that this expression of our sentiments may be considered as extending to all the Church.

May peace, comfort, and Christian happiness, be with you all; may the Lord enlighten you in your holy work of edification in Christ; and may the communion of the Holy Spirit dwell with you for ever.

Your humble brethren in our Lord Jesus Christ,

(Signed) MANUEL MATAMOROS.

To M. Adrien Naville, President of the Geneva Conference, and others.

The further steps which are being taken, in conformity with the resolutions of the Geneva Conference, to arrest the arm of religious persecution in Spain, and obtain the release of the imprisoned brethren in that country, cannot, of course, be publicly indicated at present. But the fervent and persevering prayers of all the people of God are earnestly requested, that He may be graciously pleased to crown with success the measures adopted for the attainment of the desired object, and to bestow abundant grace upon His persecuted servants, keeping them steadfast in the faith, and filling their hearts with joy and peace through believing.

SPECIAL PRAYER-MEETING, EXETER HALL, WITH REFERENCE TO AMERICA.

Communications having been received from several quarters urging the committee to summon a solemn assembly for united prayer in the present crisis of our relations with America, a special meeting of the committee was held on the 7th of December, when it was resolved that a meeting for united prayer should (p.v.) take place in the large room, Exeter Hall, on the following Thursday, the day preceding that on which the despatches from the British Government were expected to reach Washington.

Notice was given of the intended meeting from many of the metropolitan pulpits on the previous Sunday, and on the day appointed the large hall was crowded with persons who came to join in earnest supplication that the threatened grievous calamity might, by the goodness of God, be averted, and peace be preserved between the nations.

The chair was taken by Sir C. E. Barclay, Bart., who opened the meeting by reading a brief statement prepared by the committee with a view of preventing any misapprehension of their motives in convening the meeting.

Parts of suitable hymns were sung. Two portions of Holy Scripture, Psalm xlv. and James iv., were read in the course of the meeting by the Rev. E. G. Arnold, Rector of Stapleford; and prayers were successively offered by the Rev. R. H. Herschell, the Rev. Marshall Hall Vine, Rector of St. Mary-le-Bow, the Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel, the Rev. T. Alexander, Presbyterian minister (Chelsea), and the Rev. S. Minton. Many earnest petitions were offered up on behalf of the Governments in each country, and for a special blessing upon the Christian brethren on either side of the Atlantic, and this large and solemn assembly dispersed, having, at the close, joined in the Lord's Prayer.

MEETINGS

On behalf of the Alliance, and attended by a deputation from London, have been held at the following places, viz.: Brighton, Worthing, Dorocheater, Weymouth, Melbourne, Derby, Dublin, Waterford, Tramore, Limerick, Clonakilty, York, and Cork. Much interest was felt, especially in statements of the proceedings and results of the Geneva Conference, and many new members have been added. Several drawing-room meetings have taken place, at which members of the Alliance, and other Christian friends, have been assembled. It is suggested that similar meetings might be held with great advantage in other places. One of the secretaries would be happy to attend such social meetings, or to supply extracts of correspondence and other information of the work of God at home and on the Continent, as topics for conversation.

PROPOSED WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

Our friends are again reminded of the invitation issued by the Committee to set apart the eight days, commencing Sunday, January 5, as a season of Special Prayer. Large blessings, it is believed, resulted from the general observance of a similar season at the beginning of last year. May greater blessings be still more generally sought on this occasion!

The following are the topics suggested as suitable for a prominent place in our exhortations and prayers for the successive days:—

Sunday, Jan. 5.—Sermons on the Holy Spirit: His Divinity and Personality—His Offices and Operations. Prayer for the Lord's blessing upon the services of the week.

Monday, „ 6.—Humiliation and Confession of Sin: As individuals—as families—as Churches, and as a Nation. Thanksgiving and Praise for recent religious awakenings.

Tuesday, „ 7.—Home Objects for Prayer: The conversion of the ungodly—the cessation of Intemperance and all immorality—and the spread of vital Religion; in our Families and Households—among our rulers—the Rich and the Poor—our Soldiers and Sailors—the Authors of our Literature, secular and religious.

Wednesday, „ 8.—Foreign Objects for Prayer: The revival of pure Christianity, and the extension of Religious Liberty in Europe and the lands of the East—the overthrow of every form of anti-Christian error—the Conversion of the House of Israel—the prevalence of Peace among all Nations, especially in America—and a yet more abundant blessing upon our Brethren and Sisters engaged in the work of Missions, Christian Education, and Literature in Foreign Lands.

Thursday, „ 9.—The Church of God and the Christian Ministry: The increased Spirituality of the Church, and its more decided separation from the world—Brotherly love, sympathy, and union of labour among the Lord's people—a higher standard of piety and power among Christian Ministers and all their fellow-labourers—the outpouring of the Spirit upon our Universities and Colleges, and on the rising Ministry at large—the Conversion of the Young, and a large blessing upon Sunday and other Schools.

Friday, „ 10.—The Word of God: That it may be received with increased faith, reverence and love—that its assailants may be enlightened and brought into the way of truth—that the power of the Divine Spirit may attend its private study and its circulation throughout the world.

Saturday, „ 11.—The Lord's Day: That its Divine institution may be recognised, and its desecration at home and abroad may cease.

Sunday, „ 12.—Sermons on the Signs, Dangers, and Duties of the Present Times—motives to personal holiness and Christian activity.

The arrangements for central meetings in the metropolis during the week are given below:—

GERMAN THEOLOGICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. DORNER'S REPLY TO THE QUERIES OF DR. FITZGERALD, BISHOP OF CORK.

WE announced in our number for last February that Dr. Dorner had signified his intention of including a reply to the queries of the learned Bishop of Cork, which appeared in the January number, in an article which he was then preparing on the Mansel-Maurice controversy. That article—a very elaborate and important one—has since appeared in the Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie, and contains the promised reply, which extends to considerable length, and is written with a degree of clearness and precision, and adaptedness to our English habits of thought, for which we cannot be sufficiently grateful to the able professor. Those of us who listened to the profound discourse which he recently delivered at Geneva on Individualism, and which was mainly intended for the ear of his own countrymen, will be aware how difficult it is for an Englishman to have a thorough understanding of what a deep-thoughted German addresses to Germans as deep-thoughted as himself. On the present occasion Dr. Dorner has remembered that he was addressing himself to an English rather than a German audience, and has been careful to avoid the use of phraseology which to us would have darkened rather than illuminated his meaning. The Bishop had reminded him that “we are plain, matter-of-fact people, bring things to short issues, ask terribly direct questions, and are impatient of obscure answers;” and had remarked, somewhat too brusquely, perhaps, that “if German theology is to be of any use to us, it must learn to speak plain, and in a tongue understood by the people.” The professor, while he demurs to the monopoly which we seem disposed to claim of plain, practical, matter-of-fact sense, and to the demand that German men of science should write in the style proper to other nations, and not to their own, has still been indulgent and self-denying enough in this instance to accommodate himself as much as possible to our usus loquendi, and to strive to make his ideas as plain and distinct and palpable—according to our standard—as the subject itself will allow.

We begin our translation with some remarks which Dr. Dorner throws into a note upon the demand just referred to:—

If, as his lordship seems to suppose, we had a wish to put ourselves forward with our theology as the teachers of other nations, it would be fair enough to demand of us that we should make use of the mode of expression employed by those nations. But that is not the case. Our theology is primarily German theology; we speak, and shall continue to speak, in the way which is natural to us—that is, in the way most suitable to the subject as we view it; and we think it only reasonable that whosoever wishes to have a share of what we have should be willing to take some trouble to understand us, as we all do, for example, in the case of the ancients. And if the German theology, ill understood though it be, is now undoubtedly making its influence felt in England, the necessity of this trouble being taken is doubly urgent, in the interest of England herself. If negative forces are striving in England—such as we here have been long acquainted with, and have been able, in fact, in some measure to overcome—and if these forces support themselves especially upon the credit of German thinkers and critics, it would be of no use for us to imagine that by any change in our mode of speaking we could spare any one the labour of penetrating scientifically into the depth of the subject, for every man has only so much knowledge as he has acquired by his own labour. A dead extra-tradition, or importation even of the best matter, is little better than a sham gift. It is understood, of course, on the other hand, and as a matter of common courtesy, that in a dialogue the language employed should be such as admits of being clearly understood; only, where the right understanding of it is wanting, it is not necessarily the speaker who is at fault.

Proceeding to the subject itself, Dr. Dorner gives the following summary of the remarks which he had made in the letter (communicated in our number for April, 1860), and which had called forth the Bishop of Cork's queries:—

I had said that the growth of the modern High-Lutheranism was partly a reactionary result of the negative criticism which had prevailed since Strauss, which had shaken the confidence of many in the historical credibility of Holy Scripture, and tempted them to seek, instead, the support of the authority of the Church. But Luther was the exact contrast of this tendency, who raised himself above the pretensions of Church authority, because by means of the Holy Scriptures, and the direct inworking of the Holy Ghost, he had acquired an experimental certitude of Christ and His salvation. At a later period, I contended, the German theology had allowed the testimonium spiritus sancti to fall out of view. Instead of seeking certitude of faith by the Holy Ghost and believing communion with Christ, it had fallen into an intellectualism, which sought, by operations and demonstrations of the understanding, to produce a certitude which, in this way of producing it, must ever remain superficial and inwardly weak, whether the rational arguments for the Divine authority of the Scriptures be derived from historical or à priori grounds, or support themselves ultimately upon the authority of the Church. I added that the rational arguments for the authority of the Scriptures, which are usual in England especially, are, however, not to be despised. Without being in themselves decisive, still they form, when taken along with the more inward spiritual way of the Reformation, a powerful means of defending the truth and promoting its interests; they guard and protect the historical realistic side of Christianity, and so room is left for a co-operation of English and German divines. These statements have not appeared obscure in other quarters in England, and I am glad to have the concurrence of the acute author of the article, "The Testimony of the Spirit and Private Judgment" (Jan., 1861). When Dr. Fitzgerald takes occasion from them to propose his queries, I am not misled thereby into the presumption of imagining that he wishes or expects instruction from a German theologian; but, on the other hand, I have no liking for a modesty which would be disposed to hold parley in such matters with an interrogator whose only aim was to bring others to acknowledge their ignorance (albeit it might be a docta ignorantia), and who, being in the same condition himself, would be disposed to praise this as the highest attainable condition—in a spirit of unenviable self-satisfaction. I hope that this is as little in the learned Bishop's meaning as the other. But I shall hope to avoid equally the blame of presumption and of a false modesty by regarding his queries as objections and attacks against the position which I have briefly defined above, and as objections taken upon the ground of his occupying an exactly opposite position, which, indeed, I could have wished to see more accurately defined. If, accordingly, I speak in the way of self-defence, I must add, however, that I shall not be able to do this without opposing myself decidedly to the position taken up by Dr. Fitzgerald—because in these questions of principle we must come at last to a decision between one principle or the other.

Dr. Dorner here appends a note, in which he says:—

Dr. Fitzgerald has not declared himself distinctly upon these questions of principle, but apparently his standpoint is the following: We have to regard Christ as the messenger of God, because He rose from the dead. The truth of His resurrection we must believe, because we are able to prove it in the way appropriate to the proof of all facts. With the proof of His Divine mission it is proved also undeniably that what Jesus teaches is a Divine revelation. He does not appear to make much of an immediate communion of man with God, wrought by the Holy Spirit, at all events of the consciousness of such a Divine communion—this seems to him mystical, or even enthusiastical. He says nothing apparently of the Holy Scriptures, and their credibility or inspiration; nor is it clear whether he means to rest the resurrection and the authority of Christ upon Scripture, or the Scripture upon the authority of Christ. But no doubt, with him, Scripture is the basis of the whole proof; and as it is not self-evident that we are bound to believe Scripture, we must have proof, he thinks, of its authenticity, credibility, and perhaps also its internal adaptation to our wants, in order that we may attain first to faith in Scripture, and then, through the resurrection of Christ, of which Scripture informs us, to faith in His Divine mission, with which will then connect itself, as assured to us by the authority of Christ, faith in the inspiration of the Apostles, and in the authority of Scripture, as the standard of truth.

After these preliminaries, Dr. Dörner proceeds with his explanations of the main subject in the following lengthened and eminently interesting statement, which, however far it may diverge from the views almost universally accepted by the divines of this country, is in a high degree worthy of their attention and study, especially in the present state of theological opinion and tendency among us.

I may begin my attempt to arrive at an understanding with Dr. Fitzgerald with the remark, that as certainly as the German Reformation was something quite practical, so certainly also is the position of the more modern German theology in regard to the testimonium spiritus sancti a very practical position. We abide therein upon the ground of practical religious life and its interests, and we put forth a warning against the dream that a chain of deductions is religion, or can become a ladder whereby a man may climb to heaven, instead of taking the via regia through repentance and faith. What we miss in this respect in English apologetics is just the practical character, in addition to our conviction that it does not satisfy the strict demands of science, that it is unable to accomplish what it proposes to itself, and that it must needs therefore take an aim somewhat different, in order to be a match for the storms which have now burst upon it.

We are well aware, indeed, that the Gospel, and our teaching about it, cannot be equally intelligible to all, however different may be their stages of moral and religious progress; we make no claim to any popularity which would annihilate the distinction between that which is naturally and that which is spiritually discerned (1 Cor. ii. 14), the latter being Christianity itself. But, on the other hand, it is not from any fear of strict science that we lay stress upon that via regia which to the world is foolishness. All we wish, is not to enervate the power of the cross and the resurrection of Christ, which would be the result if we should attempt to make the Gospel acceptable even to carnal sense, or if we should ascribe to human arguments anything of the power and effects which the Gospel ascribes to itself, especially the power to give certitude to the heart of salvation and religious truth. All the more, on the other hand, would we like to show to those who are susceptible of such a conviction, that what appears foolishness to the world is wisdom before God—i. e., wisdom indeed. This susceptibility or receptivity of the Gospel is not the gift of a few favourites of heaven, but the way to arrive at the certitude of salvation and of evangelical truth stands open to all, as certainly as all have the same moral and religious destination, whereas the other way of arriving at certitude, by a chain of reasonings, must at the best be the privilege of few.

Further, it is no intention of ours (and herewith I give a reply to another series of the Bishop's questions) to set forth a priori proofs of the truth of Christianity. Rather, as said already, we reject all proofs of the Gospel, whether historical or speculative, because they trench upon the royal right of Christian truth to prove itself, and attribute the power of proof to reason instead of to the Gospel. Neither do we say, such and such are the felt wants of men, and therefore the Gospel which promises to meet and satisfy them is true. Still less do we say, as the Bishop seems to fear, "You should believe it, however the question may stand as to its truth, because it will do you good to believe it." To us Christianity is no egoistic superstition, no contrivance for deliberately cradling ourselves in self-delusions. But it is precisely on that account that neither the authority of the Church contents us, nor any other human testimony; we wish to know the inner intrinsic truth of the Gospel; to find out the way which leads to it, and to stand up and plead for that truth after we have known it.

What now, more precisely, is this way? What Dr. Fitzgerald seems to regard as the end (or terminus ad quem)—namely, the historical certitude, reached by logical proofs, that Jesus rose again, and was thereby attested to be a God-sent teacher, lies only on the way to the end—is at most a beginning, and that even a beginning not necessary for all. Nay more, this beginning works injuriously when it obscures the true end, or gives itself out for it, as if nothing higher were attainable than that certitude, which in itself is not of a religious nature at all, and is attainable without God's Spirit, by pure human reasonings. But a full certitude of a higher kind is attainable, and it is the crown which religion in its perfection prepares for us. It is attainable to live in the light of the present, personal, living truth—i. e., in the light of Christ; and to know spiritually that in Him is life and salvation, is an immediate knowledge like that sensuous knowledge which we have of the warming and light-giving sun; or like the knowledge of the patient recovering from sickness, his knowledge of returning health. If any are disposed to deny the possibility of such an immediate self-conscious communion with God, and to call it something visionary or fanatical, let him know that he is of a different opinion from the Apostles (Rom. viii. 15, 16; 1 John iv. 16; ii. 27) and from the Lord Himself (John vii. 17; viii. 32; xiv. 21—23), and that he is still standing under the Old Testament, or has gone back to the legal position of the Church of Rome. For in that position Christ becomes no more than a lawgiver, either moral or dogmatic. Not even the consciousness of the forgiveness of sin is possible, if God does not witness Himself immediately or directly to the human consciousness by the Holy Ghost, as reconciled to us, if we know of heavenly things only at second-hand. The accusations of conscience may in such a case be blunted; but the positive element, the knowledge that God is to us a gracious Father, would remain excluded. The certitude which we recognise as the alone decisive and the alone attainable does not find place before faith, and has not for its use to impel a man to the act of faith, but it arises after the act of faith, and yet is not so properly the effect of faith as it is the effect of faith's object—i. e., Christ Himself, and an effect wrought out by the Holy Ghost—of course, only in him who has in faith received or embraced this object.

The word faith (in the subjective sense) has two theological meanings, which, however often they are confounded, ought to be carefully distinguished from one another. First, it means the receiving or closing with something of an invisible kind, whether with a doctrine, or truth, or with an impersonal grace, or with a person, God or Christ. But secondly, the word also means a conviction or certitude of something, and, in the present instance, a certitude of the Christian salvation as an objective truth. Now, faith in the second sense, say we, cannot be brought to pass by human reasonings or proofs. What help can anything whatever give us, if we do not know through God Himself what is God's mind toward us? Not even to faith in the first sense (as receptive or embracing) do we owe the certitude of salvation—that were mere imagination, mere self-absolution—but to the Holy Ghost. It is the power of the object received in faith, and become present to the mind, which witnesses itself to the mind, and so produces certitude.

Still we say, not that no certitude of any kind goes before faith in the sense of a receptive act, or a willingness to embrace, or that all manner of religious certitude first comes from that faith which has actually embraced its object. The believing act of receiving must not be done blindly any more than it must be done on the ground of mere human authority. A certain confidence, a childlike trust, belongs to faith in this sense—a willingness to receive or appropriate, a confidence not directed towards something impersonal, but towards the personal God in Christ. But in this confidence there already lies included a kind of certitude. Even before we attain that other God-given certitude of our being the children of God, we have a sure knowledge of something, and this something is, that we need the forgiveness of sin and sanctification, and also (after the historical image of Christ has been brought nearer to our understanding, and as far as possible, historically vouched) that it is a duty to seek salvation in Christ, and to hope that God, if we believe in His Son as our Redeemer, will reveal Him also in us, and communicate to us His gifts, His peace, for our wills His sanctifying power, and for our consciousness the certitude that we are His children—all by His Holy Spirit. But this hope of salvation is not the having of it. The certitude that we need a Saviour, and the certitude that it is our duty to hope for salvation from Him, is not the possession of salvation. On the other hand, when we have actually received His Spirit, then first have we the decisive certitude of the truth of the Gospel—then first does the work praise its Master. What we are able to have of certitude about Christ before this is only preliminary; and it fulfils its end when it impels us to cross the threshold of the sanctuary itself—i.e., to accomplish the act of faith—which act or exercise of faith not merely accepts as true historical facts or dogmatic statements—for these are only shadows and images, not the substance—but lays hold upon Christ, in His Word and Sacrament, in a personal living sense, in whom there is no longer a separation of the human and historic from the eternal, the true, and the Divine, because in Him the historically real and the divinely true meet, and are one. (John i. 17.) And now, for the first time, is the authority of Christ truly approved or certified to the man by the Holy Ghost, who proceeds from Christ; and now, also, necessarily, does the word of the Apostles and Prophets become of normative authority to the believer, for the abiding and the growth of his faith; it exists for no other end or object; and now, also, the science of faith sets forth to him a doctrine concerning Holy Scripture and its authority, and shows him that a Holy Scripture, as a true document of Divine Revelation, was indispensably necessary to the self-preservation of the Gospel in its original purity. But this certitude of the authority of Holy Scripture we derive from the authority of Christ, after His redeeming power and glory have become certain to us in faith—not the converse. It is not that Christ has to us a Divine, a truly certain authority, on the ground of the authority of Holy Scripture—e. g., on account of His resurrection, of which Scripture informs us. The resurrection, taken by itself, is something that concerns Him personally, but which does not bring us and our knowledge, or being, into living contact with Him. But it is His specific work—and His own personally—to communicate to us, in fellowship with Himself, reconciliation and holiness, by the power of His resurrection. Faith in the fact of the resurrection of Christ would be faith in a dead fact, if it did not rather take the form of faith in the Risen One, faith in His life, which is still the conqueror of death. To us the resurrection of Christ is not an isolated, dead fact of the past, but a fact which continues to work as a living principle upon our own present; and so, in this respect, we Germans are more a matter-of-fact people than Dr. Fitzgerald claims for the English to be, although it is only a claim. We believe, therefore, that men have no right, either by apostolic example, or by the nature of the subject, to require faith in the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures as the very first step in Christianity; but faith may even arise without the Holy Scriptures, by the mere oral preaching of the Gospel, as well now as it did in the times of the Apostles. It is not faith in the inspiration of the Holy Book which is necessary in order that we may believe in Christ, but only the Word of God is necessary, the preaching of the revelation of God in Christ, whether in free discourse, or by means of the Holy Scriptures themselves. For the man who is not yet a believer in Christ, the Word of God, in whatever form it comes before him, is a means of grace, and his duty to use it as such admits of being proved to him; but that Holy Scripture is the record of the perfected revelation, and that the living Word of God has found in it its normative expression—this is what can be known with full certitude only by the man who has become a partaker of Christ and His salvation. In relation to the world without, the Word of God, in whatever form it is set forth, is the net of the Church, which draws in the unbelieving part of the world to Christ. In relation to the Church within, or to those who have been brought to Christ, Holy Scripture is for them the supreme rule and standard, and also for the public preaching of the Word of God. But the Holy Scripture and God's Word were never intended to come in between us and Christ, to be a substitute for Him and His Spirit. Should our communion with it take the place of communion with Christ, our handling of it would become superstitious, and we should be sinning against Christ, who is its Lord and Master, and also against itself, for its wish is to be His handmaid, to lead men to Himself, and to keep them near Himself. On the other hand, the Evangelical doctrine distinguishes itself from enthusiasm in this, that it recognises no faith which has not sprung from the seed of the Word, as that Word is contained normally in Holy Scripture, and which does not continue to feed, and test, and regulate itself by the Word. Hereby the life-roots of faith take hold of historical fact. Hereby faith gains its historic and realistic side, and becomes a counterpart of the two sides of Christ, the ideal and the real—the Divine and the eternal on the one hand, the human and historic on the other, both united in His own person. But, as before said, the historical element in the Gospel is, as living faith now knows, no dead matter-of-fact, isolated, and merely past and gone, but is the expression, in historical reality, of One who is eternal, Divine, the Son of God; and conversely true faith separates not the Σαφὲς Χριστὸν from His inner nature, but apprehends in the manhood of Christ the Son of God, whose realistic expression it is (2 Cor. iii. 18, iv. 6), and who, as the once dead, but now risen and eternally living One, communicates Himself to us, with all that is His, in word and sacrament.

Dr. Dorner has an important note upon that sentence of the last paragraph which speaks of the distinction between the Evangelical doctrine and enthusiasm to the following effect:—

Strauss denies this distinction. He accuses the Evangelical doctrine of enthusiasm. He separates the two sides of the Reformation principle—the Word and faith—which belong inseparably together, and by this divide et impera his criticism gains an apparent advantage. The German theology of the present day holds fast, as a fundamental principle, the intimate, inseparable conjunction of both sides; and hereby Strauss is, in point of principle, overcome. The theology of England is at present, in like manner, visibly moving in the same direction, but still has much need of more emphasis being laid upon the material side of the Reformation principle, in comparison with the formal side—i.e., on the side of faith, as compared with the side of Scripture inspiration and authority—upon which latter is imposed the function of accomplishing what only the material side can accomplish, to the loss and disadvantage both of piety and theological science. The Oxford "Essays and Reviews" are a powerful admonition to English theology to become sensible of that onesidedness, and to return again, as we have been obliged to do, to the genuine Reformation foundation. The orthodox divines of a former age left that foundation, and unconsciously adopted the rationalistic principle in their mode of proof, in thinking that there could be a faith in the Divine authority of Holy Scripture worthy of the name before the attainment of that faith which is saving and regenerating. Nay, more, instead of subjecting man's mind to the working of God and His Spirit, they rather made man's mind the ground and support of what is Divine.

Dr. Dorner resumes, and pursues to a close the main subject, as follows:—

So long as men think that faith in the inspiration and Divine authority of Scripture is the first step in Christian piety, without which no progress in it is possible, or even that the faith required by Christianity is identical with faith in inspiration, so long must every new application of criticism to the traditional canon of the Church awaken anxiety and alarm, and the minds of men be disqualified to examine and test such historico-critical investigations with calmness and with that impartiality which desires to see nothing but the truth. The authority of the Church is still unconsciously allowed to be the deciding principle, and the right to exclude the apocryphal books is lost. There is a danger, also, of resting the truth of Christianity upon human reasonings, which amount only to probabilities, but do not lead to certitude. There is danger of Christianity coming to be regarded not as a Divine dispensation of life and spirit, which, in an eminent degree historical, renews its youth in every successive generation, but either as a piece of history past, and therefore dead, which has no inner and intimate connexion with the present, or as a doctrinal system of lifeless truths, to which we have to submit our faith, our will, and our action upon the testimony of divinely-accredited messengers. But the meaning and effect of this is to take us back to the standpoint of law—nay, to make this position perpetual, and to allow nothing that lies beyond it to obtain a footing. For the mark or signal of a position of bondage is this, not to know the truth simply as truth, but to make it dependent upon mere human testimony or external authorities, and to be without that conviction which springs from the inherent force of truth and its intrinsic freedom-giving power. (John viii. 32, xiv. 26.) The secret of the calmness manifested by our own later theology, amidst the dangers threatened by the operations of criticism, lies precisely here—in the clear perception which it has that faith in the inspiration of the canon of the Church is not the indispensable condition of faith in Christ, nor the first necessary step thereto;* that that faith in Scripture may exist without

* "I am happy to see," says Dr. Dorner, in a note, "that the beautiful little work of John Young, 'The Christ of History,' appears to find much favour, which exhibits a historical portrait of Jesus, quite independently, in the first instance, of the inspiration question, and using the Gospel documents in the same way as other sources merely human and in the main reliable."

the co-existence of faith in Christ, and without even the foundations being laid for such faith in Christ—for to this are needed conditions of quite another kind, conditions of a moral and religious nature; and lastly, that the moral and religious process, as distinguished from the purely intellectual one, never fails to bring any one who sincerely and steadily trusts himself to it, not only in the first instance to life and full satisfaction in Christ, but also afterwards to the acknowledgment of the normative and Divine authority of the documents of Divine revelation. But more than this is not needed either for the individual or for the Church. And this is a far higher and more firmly-grounded certitude of the normative authority of Holy Scripture than can ever be derived to it from the most perfect Alexandrian theory of inspiration.

While we thus, in accord with the Apostles and Prophets, make the Christian new birth—or saving faith in the Redeemer, and so a practical posture of mind—the turning-point of the whole spiritual life of men, we diminish nothing from the claims of Christian science and its proofs, but first find for them both the right foundation and the living impulse. We only take from them an apparent power of satisfying the mind, by the idea of a higher certitude of truth, which really satisfies and fills the whole man, that truth having a power like conscience, to verify itself; we warn against the method of satisfying ourselves with verisimilitudes and probabilities, when our nature is intended and fitted to reach a higher certitude—to have an immediate fellowship with God, and at its inmost core pines after it. We point out farther the way of attaining to such a steadfastness of heart as our best proofs cannot produce, but only God Himself, who does not deny it to those who believe. But if we have a standing in the faith, we have thus also an objective ground-knowledge of the truth (1 John ii. 27, Eph. i. 18.), and not a mere subjective feeling of that which is the centre-point of all things, and the very end of the creation. For in Christ believers are ἀπαρχὴ τῆς κτίσεως τοῦ Θεοῦ (James i. 18), and in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. (Col. ii. 3.) But from this fundamental Christian consciousness unfolds or develops itself, as on the one hand the sanctifying of the will, so on the other also the Christian view of this world, of ourselves, and of God, and Christian science in addition, when the enabling charisma exists. It is the province of the latter ever more and more to expound the secrets of God, but this, in the first instance, for Christians—for believers; for the unbelieving in the first instance are the objects of the practical action of the Church, and no man is ever made a Christian by demonstration. But the Christian theology is far from resting in a mere description of Christian feeling and subjective states, or from leaving Christianity without a ground or basis; it shows how Christianity has an eternal, objective, self-evidencing power; it shows how the creation of the world and its government, the common rational nature of man with its ends and wants, and the economy of the Old Testament, and all that was prophetic in the ancient world, are taken up into the Gospel and incorporated with its system, and find in it their ultimate end. While thus setting forth the consistency and harmony of the Gospel with itself, with the world, with right reason, and finally with the idea of God, Christian science is able to work beneficially also upon those who are not yet believers; it is able to disarm objections—to dissipate fears—as, e.g., the fear that there may be found something merely human in the Gospel, which we may be obliged to give up—and to allure men to penetrate into the heart of Christianity itself. But without the experience that the Gospel is spirit and life—is the truth—the best theological system will neither be truly understood nor still less conduct to true certitude.

The historical and critical departments of theology, also, as well as its dogmatic branch, must always have great importance, not only for the exegesis of Scripture, and not merely for the society of believers, who, the higher their attainments in knowledge become, feel the greater need of having their religious views historically cleared and defined, but also, and above all, in the interest of the propagation of the faith. It is not necessary, as we have seen, for the first rise of faith that men should be already fully convinced of the authority of the Scriptures, any more than of the authority of Christianity itself. But it would be impossible for faith to arise so long as a man remained unshaken in the opinion that the historical contents of Scripture are unworthy of belief. It is not necessary thereto that a man should have already the positive decided conviction of their entire trustworthiness; but nobody could feel any confidence in Christianity, or conclude to believe in Christ, to whom Christ was not a real historical personage, and a personage standing alone in history, of His kind. In ordinary times, or in certain situations and periods of life, the historical credibility of Scripture may, owing to the influence of education, tradition, and Church authority, stand in need of no special confirmation; and then all that is needed is that this hereditary common faith should work as a spur to seek after personal assurance and communion with God, so that no one may hold that for personal faith which is only the reflection of the faith of others. But in times like our own, of awakening or awakened doubt, when the credibility of the records of Revelation is denied by many, the point of primary importance is to place ourselves in the position of the doubters, not with the view or hope of making out the truth of Christianity to them upon historical and rational grounds, which can never succeed, and tends to issue only in the falsification or misrepresentation of Christianity, but in order to show the doubters that historical Christianity is sufficiently certain, has a sufficient degree of historical probability on its side, to make it a duty both towards God and themselves to seek salvation in it in a trusting spirit. But herein most good will always be received from deep consideration and reflection upon the historical portrait of the person of Jesus Christ. His pure and perfect sinlessness, His originality, and the uninventibility of His personal character and life, as described by the Evangelists, will enchain the conscience, will take hold of and call forth all the better part of man, and will awaken also the hope of the possible restoration of his own nature to a like Divine harmony and peace. From this will spring up the wish that things might be so, as the New Testament message of good tidings proclaims them to be, that Christianity might be able to accomplish what it promises to men, until at last the pressure of self-knowledge, and the awakened sense of need, and the opening of the understanding to see the glory of Christ and the meaning of His work, all conspire together to bring the soul to perceive that it is a duty to apply itself to Him, that He may approve himself to it, not only as He who once lived and worked, but as the living One, as the living Physician and Redeemer of souls.

Whosoever assigns to the ethical element of our nature the place belonging to it, as Dr. Fitzgerald, from his concluding words, would seem to do, has the means—in the moral consciousness, or the conscience—of satisfying himself of the possibility and necessity of the testimonium spiritus sancti, or of the self-evidencing power of the Gospel. For in the conscience of a man there is a man's own proper thinking and knowledge, and a knowledge that the good whereof conscience gives us the knowledge is good in itself, and consequently also good in the eye of God; and, finally, that this knowledge is no subjective product of our own, but God's work in us, and God's voice. Now just as we have thus in the conscience a Divine and yet also a human certitude of the goodness of the good, a knowledge, not obtained in a mere historical way, of that which God, according to Holy Scripture, has enjoined (however much our moral nature needs the aid of Scripture for its full development), as we have thus a Divine testimony for the true and the good to which our own consciousness at the same time bears approving witness, as truly as our own minds bear witness to a mathematical proposition with its self-evidence, so is it also, on the other hand, according to Reformation doctrine, with the testimony of the Spirit for Christ and our redemption. There is also the closest connexion between that first general testimony of the Divine Spirit for that which is right and good and this other testimony of the same Spirit for Christ and His salvation. Both testimonies come forth from the same Divine source—viz., the moral nature of God; and both have the same terminating object—viz., a world fashioned after God's own image, holy, and happy in its holiness. If we concede the testimony of conscience, we concede also the need of the second testimony, for the Christian salvation is nothing else than the tranquillising and satisfying of the conscience, as well in reference to guilt through reconciliation as in reference to sin by sanctification.

Such, then, is Dr. Dörner's reply to the queries addressed to him by the Bishop of Cork. We have given it at full length, word for word, and we have done our best to render it faithfully, as the author has evidently done his best to make it plain. It is a remarkable statement, and will, no doubt, meet with all the attention and deep consideration which it deserves. We hope it will excite discussion, for discussion upon the points touched by it was never more needed in England than just at the present time. Dr. Fitzgerald, we trust, will give the world the benefit of his comments upon the statement, and we will gladly open our columns to him. We postpone for a time any observations of our own, except to say in a word that Dr. Dorner appears to us to have made out a good case, and that as he carefully avoids one-sidedness in the direction of a too exclusive recognition of the self-evidencing power of Christianity, and an extreme disparagement of the external and logical evidence, it would be well for English divines to be equally careful to avoid the opposite onesidedness of laying stress too exclusively upon historical evidence and the power of logical reasonings, remembering that, after all, faith—real, hearty, saving faith—comes “not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts;” and that Paul and the other Apostles expressly framed and conducted their missionary method in such a way that the faith of their converts “might not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.”

MR. RODWELL'S TRANSLATION OF THE KORAN.*

THE great religions of the world have all had their origin in the East. It was the cradle of all civilization. The times, however, have changed. The West is now the abode of the arts, sciences, and literature of the world. The star of the East has long since declined. The Orientals in general are now more disposed to avail themselves of the literary treasures accumulated by their forefathers, than to amass new ones for themselves. Poetry first, and prose afterwards, and then an equal neglect of both. The literatures of India and Arabia, though widely distinct in their character, are still worthy of study in an almost equal degree. The scholar with a philosophical taste will choose the former, while the practical scholar will possibly prefer the latter. The lover of poesy will find about equal delight in the investigation of either.

Whatever tends to throw any light on the history of man is in itself deserving of study; and as a people are best known by their literature, the missionary who seeks to gain access to the hearts of any people will find it much easier work if he first strives to understand the channel in which their thoughts run.

The sentiment of Augustine, nulla falsa doctrina est quæ non aliquid veri permisceat, prefixed by Sale to his translation of the Koran, is of much more general application than Augustine intended. Much valuable truth is to be found in the Koran, the sacred book of Arabia, in the Vedas, the Laws of Manu and the other sacred books of India, and in the works of Confucius, the great philosopher of China. In order to effect any extensive change among these peoples, we must examine carefully the various books which they venerate, that we may comprehend the truth they contain, those truths in which they are defective, and the errors that they teach.

As Mohammed was the presiding genius of Islamism, and a prophet who is almost adored by millions in various lands and in many dependencies of our empire, it is well to understand his character and the real nature of his mission. These are revealed to us in the Koran, for, as the proverb current among the early Moslems says, القرآن خلقه, "His character is the Koran." "'Tell me,' was the curious inquiry often put to Ayesha, as well as to Mahomet's other widows, 'tell me something about the Prophet's disposition.' 'Thou hast the Koran,' replied Ayesha: 'art thou not an Arab, and readest the Arabic tongue?' 'Yea, verily.' 'Then,' answered she, 'why takest thou the trouble to inquire of me? For the Prophet's disposition is no other than the Koran.' Of Mahomet's biography the Koran indeed is the key-stone."—Muir's Life of Mahomet, vol. i., pp. xxvii. xxviii.

The title "the Koran" signifies "the reading," which meaning corresponds with the designation of "the Book," which it also receives, better than the idea of addressing, or preaching, which Mr. Rodwell seems inclined to prefer. It is also termed "the Volume" and "the Furkân" or "the division"—viz., between truth and error, unless this last word is identical with the Chaldee ܠܚܬܝܡ, which signifies deliverance.

The Koran, it is well known, consists of those revelations which Mohammed pretended to receive from God, through the agency of Gabriel. When these revelations were delivered by Mohammed to his followers, they were written down by them on any sort of writing materials which happened to be available, as palm-leaves, leather, stones, &c. Whether Mohammed retained in his own possession any copies of these revelations is unknown to us, as Sale's statement, that "the originals were put promiscuously into a chest," is not borne out by good authority.

Nor would such a proceeding have been necessary. The memory of the Arabs is peculiarly retentive, and this faculty, at that time and long after, was in a high state of cultivation amongst them. Many of the Arabs were able to repeat all the great poems of their nation. Nor was the case different in such an important matter as the knowledge of the revelations of the Koran. All the Moslems knew more or less of them by heart, and he was held in highest estimation who could repeat the largest portion. Several were able to repeat the entire revelation. And moreover, even during the lifetime of Mohammed, it is exceedingly probable that many of his followers had copies of his revelations, though these copies were most likely only fragmentary.

But the sacred revelation could not always remain in that state. After the signal victory of Khālid Ibn Walīd at Yemāma over the false prophet, Musailima, which took place not later than a year after the death of Mohammed, it was determined to collect the revelations of the Koran into one volume. That victory had been dearly bought, and many of the companions of the prophet had fallen. Abu Bekr entrusted the matter to Zaid ibn Thābit, one of the Ansārs, helpers or converts of Medina, who sought out the Koran from every quarter, collecting it—as the Arab narrator informs us—"from date-leaves and tablets of white stone, and from the breasts of men." Omar, in his caliphate, committed the collection to Hafsa, one of the widows of Mohammed. Soon, however, varying texts arose. The Syrians pleaded for their readings the authority of Mikdād ibn 'l-Aswad; the men of Irak, Abu Musa 'l-Ash'ari. Hodaifa warned the Caliph Othman to "stop the people, before they should differ regarding their scriptures, as did the Jews and the Christians." Othman, accordingly, appointed a commission composed of Zaid ibn Thabit, a second time, with 'Abdallah ibnu 'z-Zubair, Sa'id ibn el 'Asi, and 'Abd ar-Rahmān ibnu 'l-Hārith. Their recension having been completed, transcripts of it were made and forwarded to the chief cities in the empire, and all previously existing copies were committed to the flames, by the command of the Caliph.

Since that day there has been but one Koran, the variants in the Arabic text being few and unimportant. To support various readings was considered to be a political crime, and punished accordingly. The collection under Abu Bekr and the revision of Othman were both conducted with great care, and faithfully transmit to us the words of the prophet of the Arabs.

With respect to the arrangement of the Koran, as Mohammed himself did not arrange his revelations, it is, as might be expected, very confused. The Mohammedans indeed pretend that the present order was prescribed by Mohammed. But in the suras, or chapters, into which it is now divided, many subjects are heaped together, without any conceivable reference to one another. With the exception, too, of the first sura, which was not unsuitable to be placed foremost, as a sort of exordium, all the suras follow one another according to their respective lengths, the longer chapters being placed first, and the shorter last. Mr. Muir remarks: "The irregular interposition and orderless disposal of the smaller fragments have, indeed, frequently destroyed the sequence, and produced a perplexing confusion. Still the fact remains, that the fragments themselves were Mohammed's own composition, and were learned or recorded under his instructions; and this fact stamps the Coran, not merely as formed out of the Prophet's words and sentences, but to a large extent as his in relation to the context likewise."

Of these suras there are 114—the word sura in Arabic literally signifying a row of stones in a wall. These are subdivided into "verses," which is the correct explanation of the Arabic word, not signifying, as Sale would have it, following the Arabic commentators, "signs," "wonders," or "miracles," "such as the secrets of God," for the Arabic ^{سورة} _{سورة} is the same as the later Hebrew ^{פסוק} _{פסוק}, a letter, Chaldee ^{פסוק} _{פסוק}.

The Koran has been long known in this country by the translation of Sale with valuable prolegomena. Several translations had been executed before his day, the best of which was one in Latin, published at Padua, in 1698, by Father Lewis Maracci, a work to which Sale was greatly indebted. In French, the best translation is that by M. Kasimirski; in German, that of Ullmann, published in 1840. The great Arabist, Mr. Lane, edited in 1843 a few selections from the Koran in a revised English translation; had he given us the entire book, similarly translated, good service would have been done. Mr. Rodwell has now presented us with a new translation, in which he has profited by the labours of his predecessors in this department. His work is therefore more valuable than the translation made by Sale. He arranges the Koran, as far as possible, according to the chronological sequence of the suras, in which he has made much use of the recent investigations of Mr. Muir in England (perhaps we should rather say in India), and of Weil, Sprenger, Geiger, Geroch, Noeldeke, and Freytag, in Germany. In his pages the Koran is presented in a much more readable shape than in those of Sale, the verses being distinguished from one another and metrically arranged ; but we miss much the prolegomena of Sale, and the copious explanatory notes with which his translation is furnished, though much information is condensed in the preface of Mr. Rodwell. From what we have examined, the translation seems better executed, and the work will be of more service to those engaged in labours among the Mohammedans, and probably more extensively read by English readers, than that of Sale, which many have purchased, but of which few have read more than a few pages. We are also greatly pleased with the style and appearance of the work in the way of typography.

Although Mohammed disavows any knowledge of writing (Sura xxix. 47), yet it is not easy to credit the truth of his statement. The art of writing was introduced into Mecca not later than A.D. 560, and Mr. Muir gives solid reasons for considering that it was known long before. It is likely, therefore, that Mohammed knew it, and some portions of the Koran give us the idea that they were not produced without much study. Stress is laid on the phrase "the illiterate prophet," in Sura vii. 156—158, as Mr. Muir, after Sale and others, renders the Arabic ^{سـمـي} (comp. Gr. λαϊκος from λαος); but it is more likely that it may signify "national," from ^{سـمـي} _{سـمـي}, a nation, though used, no doubt, in the other signification.

It is hard to believe that an illiterate person could have written the following (Sura lxxxi. 1—19), which we quote from Mr. Rodwell's translation :—

When the sun shall be folded up [soil. in darkness],
 And when the stars shall fall,
 And when the mountains shall be set in motion,
 And when the she-camels shall be abandoned,
 And when the wild beasts shall be gathered together,
 And when the seas shall boil,
 And when souls shall be paired with their bodies,
 And when the female child that had been buried alive shall be asked
 For what crime she was put to death,
 And when the leaves of the Book shall be unrolled,
 And when the Heaven shall be stripped away,
 And when Hell shall be made to blaze,
 And when Paradise shall be brought near,
 Every soul shall know what it hath produced.
 It needs not that I swear by the stars of retrograde motions,
 Which move swiftly and hide themselves away,
 And by the night when it cometh darkening on,
 And by the dawn when it brighteneth,
 That this is the word of an illustrious Messenger.

Mohammed was indeed a strange character. Truth was curiously mixed in him with falsehood. He does not deserve the abuse and execrations with which he has been loaded by some, nor the praise that has been heaped upon him by others. He was the great reformer of his age, and did a great work, but he also produced great evil. We must, however, remember that he was subject at times to considerable mental derangements, and he probably never came in contact with true Christianity. The base, heathenish religion known by the sacred name of Christian, which existed in Arabia, could not win his affections. He banished idolatry, he raised aloft the standard of the one true God. No wonder that he denied the divinity of the Lord Jesus, when that Holy One was, in that age, associated as one of a Trinity composed of God, Jesus, and Mary. The doctrine of a special, all-pervading Providence became a living principle through his means. As Mr. Muir says: "An absolute surrender and submission to the Divine will (the very name of Islam) was demanded as the first requirement of the religion. Nor are social virtues wanting. Brotherly love is inculcated within the circle of the faith; orphans are to be protected, and slaves treated with consideration; intoxicating drinks are prohibited, and Mohammedanism may boast of a degree of temperance unknown to any other creed."

Yet radical evils have been produced. These are, in the words of Mr. Muir, "FIRST, Polygamy, Divorce, and Slavery, are maintained and perpetuated; striking as they do at the root of public morals, poisoning domestic life, and disorganising society. SECOND, freedom of judgment in religion is crushed and annihilated. . . . THIRD, a barrier has been interposed against the reception of Christianity."

We have always admired the xciii. Sura, which we quote here, in conclusion, from Mr. Rodwell's translation. It has reference to the personal history of Mohammed, but will well bear a more extended application:—

By the noonday brightness,
And by the night when it darkeneth!
Thy Lord hath not forsaken thee, neither hath He been displeased.
And surely the future shall be better for thee than the past,
And in the end shall thy Lord be bounteous to thee and thou be satisfied.
Did He not find thee an orphan and gave thee a home?
And found thee erring and guided thee?
And found thee needy and enriched thee?
As to the orphan, therefore, wrong him not;
And as to him that asketh of thee, chide him not away;
And as for the favours of thy Lord, tell them abroad.

HALF A CENTURY OF MISSIONARY LABOUR.*

ANNIVERSARY meetings of societies are always of more or less interest. Jubilees, centenaries, and bi-centenaries are naturally still more so—especially, we would say, the jubilee celebration, as on such an occasion there usually are some present who have been present at the commencement of the society, and have marked its progress up to the ripe age of fifty years. . . . As a traveller delights on ascending a hill to look back on that portion of his road that he has traversed, as well as forward to that portion of the way which is yet before him, so there is an interest always attachable to retrospects, especially as it is wisely denied to man to look very far into the future.

In the great work of the evangelization of the world we can both look back and look forward. Though we cannot see exactly in what way that work may be carried on, and with what success it may meet in the immediate future, we are permitted to look to the end, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and His Christ. Similarly, the Christian may not, and cannot, see the path by which he may be led, the darkness hanging over the future; but far beyond there are the eternal hills bathed in sunlight, and distinctly visible by the glass of faith from the Delectable Mountains.

There is a growth in all things. The full-grown man was once a child; and the greater the final result, the slower are the steps by which it is reached. The world was long being prepared for the coming of the Saviour. It had to grope its way and feel its darkness before the light was manifested. "God moves in a mysterious way," and part of the mystery is that He seems to be slack concerning the fulfilment of His promises; but the inspired writer tells us He is not so in reality. In the light of the land beyond the grave we may be permitted to know the mystery of what men count slackness in the Lord's dealings. We are yet in our childhood, and not only know only in part, but could not understand were we told the whole. Humility is the highest result of man's wisdom.

Most interesting is the Memorial Volume of the American Board which has called forth the above observations. We are shown the infancy of that great association, and what God has been pleased to allow it to accomplish hitherto. Many of our readers are well acquainted, we doubt not, with the origin of that association; but as many likewise are not, it is well to note it here.

A boy overheard his mother say she had dedicated him to the service of God as a missionary. That boy was Samuel J. Mills. When he was converted his mind was turned towards missions. He was wont to hold a prayer-meeting with some other students in a grove. A thunderstorm drove them to take shelter under a neighbouring haystack, and there, amid the storm, the question of missions was discussed. It was not a missionary age. One of the five present relates that "Mills proposed to send the Gospel to that dark and heathen land [Asia], and said we could do it if we would." It was made a subject of prayer while the dark clouds were passing away and the clear sky breaking out after the storm. They prayed together earnestly, and those young men founded a society, the object of which was "to effect in the person of its members a mission to the heathen." This led to the formation of the American Board.

Such was its small beginning. Five only assembled at its first meeting, seven at its second. Thousands are now assembled at its annual meetings, and at the Jubilee meeting held last year, when, according to custom, the Lord's Supper was celebrated on a Thursday afternoon, it was necessary to occupy four churches, and it is calculated nearly 4,500 united in this "fellowship of saints." Its missions are almost in all parts of the globe. 1,258 missionaries, ordained and unordained, male and female, have been sent out. "These," in the words of Dr. Hopkins, "have established thirty-nine distinct missions, of which twenty-two now remain in connexion with the Board, with 269 stations and out-stations, employing 458 native helpers, preachers, and pastors, not including teachers. They have formed 149 churches, have gathered at least 55,000 Church members. . . . It has under its care 369 seminaries and schools, and in them more than 10,000 children. It has printed more than a thousand million of pages, in forty different languages.

It has reduced eighteen languages to writing, thus forming the germs of a new literature. It has raised a nation from the lowest forms of heathenism to a Christian civilization, so that a larger proportion of its people can read than in New England."

Missionary work above everything is calculated to draw forth the spirit of true Evangelical love. Abroad the missionaries of various denominations are more united than those engaged in spiritual labours at home. And why is it so? Because the foe is more apparent; but have we not more insidious foes at home? Alas! it is the case that the work of the ministry at home is too much regarded in the light of routine duty, and precious time is wasted about the externals of Christianity, while the inner graces of love, joy, and peace in the Holy Ghost are left to decay. With regard to our British missionary societies it would be invidious to speak particularly, but we may speak of others more freely, and certainly there is a rare spirit of Christian love in general to be found among our dear American brethren engaged in foreign work.

It is worthy of remark that the missionary work of the American Board is entirely separated from any ecclesiastical organization. The missionaries are left free to decide what form of Church government is more suitable for the genius of the people among whom they labour.

We now proceed rapidly to view some of the results of the fifty years' labour, reminding our readers that, as we are not writing a missionary report, we will pass over many interesting points. To the Memorial Volume we would refer those who desire more information, and in that volume even the usually dry subjects of finances and the constitution of the Board wear an interesting dress.

The mission of the Board to the Sandwich Islands was commenced in 1820. A strange revolution had taken place before the arrival of the missionaries; the idols of the nation had been destroyed and human sacrifices abolished. But the moral nature of the people was not improved by the change. The nation was composed of thieves, drunkards, and debauchees. The people were slaves. The chiefs were irresponsible, and the king despotic. The language was unwritten, and there was no education. Now the people are a Christian nation, though not yet civilised. The Sabbath is observed, Churches abound in the land, the language has been reduced to writing, and is read by nearly one-third of the people. The Bible has been circulated freely. The native government spends upwards of 50,000 dols. on education. Laws did not exist in 1820; now they have been drawn up, and are at present embraced in five octavo volumes. The first article in the constitution promulgated by the king and chiefs in 1840 declares "that no law shall be enacted which is at variance with the Word of the Lord Jehovah, or with the general spirit of His Word," and "that all the laws of the islands shall be in consistency with God's law."

This is a result of missions.

So with regard to the Cherokee and the Choctaw nations of North American Indians. They are now Christian nations. When the mission commenced among them, in 1818, they were Pagans; now they take their stand as truly Christian. The same can be said of other tribes.

And has not much been done in the field of Turkey? Though the very independence of the native churches have in some instances led to difficulties, and a spirit of sectarian proselytism has worked some mischief in Constantinople, yet a real work has been done. Leaving the station of Constantinople, as being at present under a cloud, let us take the instances of Aintab and Marash, towns in the Turkish dominions. Dr. Dwight wrote thus of them last year: The day after his arrival on a tour of inspection was the Sabbath, "and it was to me a most delightful day. I had the privilege of preaching to more than a thousand people, and of addressing a Sabbath-school, all assembled in one room, of 1,668 members, including the teachers. In the evening of the same day I attended the monthly concert, at which probably 700 were present."

So of Marash, he says: "This place is indeed a wonder. Twelve years ago there was not a Protestant here, and the people were proverbially ignorant, barbarous, and fanatical. Six years ago the Evangelical Armenian Church was organised, with sixteen members. The congregation at that time consisted of 120. On the last Sabbath I preached in the morning to a congregation of over 1,000; and in the afternoon, at the communion, I addressed nearly or quite 1,500 people, when forty new members were admitted to the Church, making the whole present number 227. Nearly 100 of these have been added since Mr. White came here, two years ago. . . . One entire half of the body of the church was filled with females, packed closely together on the floor; the other half, and the broad galleries around three sides of the house, were completely crowded with men. A new church, in the other end of the town, is needed immediately."

This is another result of missions. "What hath God wrought?"

Fain would we speak of the field of Koordistan, and of the work wrought among the Nestorian people. Never do we remember having heard of such a catholic spirit as that by which the devoted missionaries there have been actuated. They came among a benighted people, Christian only in name, followers of an Episcopal Church boasting of its apostolical succession. They have enlightened that Church, by giving it the Gospel, but made no proselytes from her communion. The native pastors prepared by the American missionaries have been ordained by the Nestorian bishops; and one instance, and only one, in later times has been given of a corrupt church becoming reformed while her constitution and church-government remain the same. The Christians have been tested and tried by the financial embarrassment caused to the Missionary Board by reason of the American war. There has been a true revival among them—a revival that has brought forth practical fruits. Men have given half their property, and more than that—women their bracelets, their ornaments—in order that the Gospel might be preached in their midst, and preached to the regions beyond. The poor oppressed Nestorians have given out of their deep poverty liberally to the Lord. Such a giving has not been heard of since the remarkable Pentecostal effusion of the Holy Spirit.

Nor has this movement stopped there. The reality of the Christian life of the converts in the district of Madura, in the South of India, and of Ahmednuggur, in the West, has been similarly proved. Tokens of affection from deceased loved ones have been sold for Christ's sake; even when nothing else could be given women have parted with some of their cooking pots, and have given them to be sold for the benefit of the mission.

These are also some results of missions, and are only the firstfruits of a glorious harvest.

The American missionaries seem to be well qualified for their work. Men of faith and men of prayer, there have also been no contemptible scholars in their ranks—we think from what we have seen of them, their men are better qualified on the average than those sent out from Britain—scholars like Eli Smith, the translator of the new Arabic version of the Bible; Stoddart, the author of the modern Syriac grammar; Riggs, of the Bulgarian Mission; and others. The journal of the American Oriental Society gives full proof of their linguistic researches. The sciences of comparative philology and ethnography have been enriched by their labours, and yet the work of the Lord has not suffered in their hands. Grammars have been published by them of modern Greek, Armenian, Arabic, Syriac, Tamil, Hawaiian, Dakota, Grebo, Mpongwe, Zulu, &c., and dictionaries, more or less complete, of the Armenian, Tamil, Chinese, Hawaiian, Grebo, Mpongwe, Zulu, and Dakota. A dictionary too of modern Syriac, of about 10,000 words, has been prepared, and will soon be published. O si sic omnes!

CIRCULAR OF THE MINISTER OF WORSHIP RESPECTING CERTAIN PROCEEDINGS OF MONASTIC COMMUNITIES.

The scandalous affair of Eliza Bluth, Sarah Mayer, and others of the same kind, which I have frequently brought under the notice of your readers, have at length excited the just solicitude of the Government. Louis Napoleon and his counsellors felt that it was time to give some guarantee to the heads of families against cases of abduction and concealment of children, by which the provisions of the law are violated.

M. Rouland, Minister of Worship, has addressed to the prefects of the various departments a circular, in which he regrets that he has ascertained that several religious communities transgress the regulations laid down by law, by admitting minors into their establishments. "These communities seem to think," says the Minister, "that their responsibility is sufficiently covered by pious motives, or by the licence granted by superior ecclesiastics, and they do not attach sufficient importance to the feelings or the authority of families. Quite recently, and before the courts of justice, directors and chaplains of [Romish] associations have gone still further, and have asserted that the promptings of a spirit of proselytism ought to prevail over the observance of the laws of the land. According to them, when children, having arrived at a certain degree of discernment, are willing to abandon the belief of their parents for the [Roman] Catholic religion, conscience requires that they should be encouraged in that course, though it should lead to the estrangement of the children thus withdrawn from paternal superintendence. If such a principle were reduced to practice by the members of every religious body recognised or tolerated in France, it would be the cause of the most deplorable disturbances. Therefore our legislation . . . allows no one, priest or layman, the privilege of pleading his reli gion as a reason for withdrawing a child from the custody and direction of its parents." The Minister of Worship consequently requested the prefects to make known to the religious associations that, if they received children without the formal consent of their parents or guardians, they would subject themselves to judicial proceedings, or be deprived of a legal existence.

This official document has been warmly approved by public opinion and the liberal press. It is evident that the rights of the domestic hearth—of home—must be protected against the encroachments of the priests. To withdraw youths and girls from the authority of their fathers and mothers, under the pretext of saving their souls, by instructing them in the Romish faith, is to repeat the crime committed in the Mortara affair. An odious outrage of this kind is allowed to take place in the Pontifical States; but, thank God, it is not legal in this country. The Ultramontane journals maintain that M. Rouland's circular raises the authority of the father above the authority of God! [Roman] "Catholicism, which puts everything in its place," says the Monde, the organ of the Jesuits, "wishes that God should be obeyed rather than man." Yes; but it remains to be shown that the abduction of children, with all the violence, fraud, and lying which accompanies such deeds, are the expression of the will of God! In truth, the clerical faction, with gross impudence, identifies God with the priests—the Divine cause with human passions! This astonishing line of argument only excites the deepest disgust.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE MINISTER OF WORSHIP WITH THE BISHOP OF ARRAS.

The controversy provoked by the circular of the Minister of Worship is far from being finished. A very turbulent prelate, who is prompt at seizing occasions of displaying a zealotry more distinguished by warmth than intelligence, M. Parisis, Bishop of Arras, has addressed to M. Rouland a long letter, which contains many rhetorical phrases, but very little logic. He says that the abuses mentioned by the Minister are extremely rare, and that the best of all guarantees for families is episcopal surveillance. He also expresses his regret that M. Rouland should not be content to make a confidential communication to the bishops. He fears that religion may suffer from these public discussions between the spiritual and the temporal power. But he does not touch the delicate point of the question—namely, obedience to the law, which protects parental authority. On the one hand, he dare not openly declare, like the Jesuitical press, that the surreptitious taking away of children is agreeable to the will of God; on the other, he is not disposed to make the least concession to the rules established by the State.

M. Parisis's letter having been published by several periodicals of the capital and the provinces, the Minister of Worship has thought proper to reply to it. This he does with a courtesy of language which does not exclude firmness, or even a gentle irony. How remarkable! Almost all the Popish prelates write in a coarse and abusive strain, like people of low breeding, while the lay magistrates respect the proprieties suggested by decency and a good education.

M. Rouland has revealed but a part of what he knows. "If a general and serious discussion should become necessary," he says, "I hope that there will be no failure upon my part, and if the country requires complete revelations, I shall be quite ready to give them." Perhaps it is to be regretted that these complete revelations have not been made. Upon such serious matters the French people have a right to know everything. But the bishops are very careful not to reduce the Government to that necessity: they might be apprehensive, and with too much reason, that disgraceful and terrible secrets would be divulged!

The Minister confines himself to recalling to the recollection of M. Parisis the history of the abduction of a young girl named Antoinette Lepréle, who was hidden in a nunnery at Arras, without the consent of her mother. The widow Lepréle brought her case before a judicial tribunal, and her daughter was restored to her by the order of the magistrate. M. Rouland then asks the Bishop of Arras what comes of episcopal surveillance?

M. Parisis had said that Divine and human laws had confided to the bishops the charge and control of monastic establishments. M. Rouland replies to him: "These communities continue subject to the common law of France, and cannot take exception to the interference of the authorities charged with making that law respected by all citizens. . . . No, I have not written a circular gratuitously offensive to the episcopate [such were the terms employed by M. Parisis]; but it is necessary, in order to fulfil my duty to the State, and to prevent abuses which do injury to religion, to remind those who forget it of the power of the law."

Such, then, is a summary of this curious correspondence. At the bottom of the discussion there is an opposition of principles and sentiments which it is important should be fully understood. The priests make the exorbitant pretension in France, in Italy, in Austria, and probably also in England, to be absolute masters within the limits of convents and other monastic establishments. They consider these religious houses as a sanctum sanctorum, where the eyes of the laity neither can nor ought to penetrate. Hence it follows that the most criminal acts, the most enormous outrages, might be committed within convents, while the depositaries of civil authority remained at the door, unarmed and powerless! Never will a civilised State admit such a monstrous doctrine! The law must be respected and obeyed everywhere, and the interior of convents must not be less open, less submissive to the common laws of the land, than the habitation of the simple citizen.

ANOTHER CIRCULAR ON CLERICAL SCHOOLS.

The quarrel on monastic associations is not the only one which has broken out between the Government and the Romish Church. M. Rouland has addressed another circular to the prefects respecting the clerical schools conducted by Brethren of the Christian Doctrine. Some preliminary explanations are here necessary.

The Brethren of the Christian Doctrine are half-monks, half-laymen. They make vows of celibacy and of passive obedience to the authority of the bishops. Their special object is to furnish the children of the people with means of elementary instruction. They go, by threes, into the towns and villages: upon one of them devolves all domestic concerns, because no female is allowed to enter their lodging; the two others are occupied in conducting the elementary school. They ask no pecuniary remuneration of their scholars; it is one of their rules to give instruction free of charge.

This is well; but look at the abuses. These brethren, called also Frères Ignorantins, because they are expressly forbidden to study the Latin language, or any branch of the sciences—these brethren, I say, receive grants of money from the municipal funds; so that if they are not paid by their scholars, they yet obtain their means of subsistence from the purses of the inhabitants.

You can easily understand how, by this method, they become formidable competitors of the lay schoolmasters; for the latter cannot teach children gratuitously; and the Frères Ignorantins, while receiving a pension from the communal council, present an appearance of generosity and charity. Not only the poor, but even persons placed in easy or opulent circumstances, send their children to these clerical schools; in fact the prospect of having nothing to pay is very seductive to most fathers of families.

The priests have naturally employed all their influence in favouring this tendency. They have no love to the lay schoolmasters, who, in their eyes, are of too independent a spirit, and they give all their support to the Brethren of the Christian Doctrine, who are wholly submissive to the inspirations of the Jesuits. Besides, the teaching given in these clerical schools is poor, and little better than a mockery: lessons in the Romish catechism, litanies in honour of the Virgin, many genuflexions and practical superstitions, with some hints upon the art of reading—this is all. The children thus educated present an easy prey to the narrow bigotry of Popery.

M. Rouland saw the grave danger of granting so much influence to the docile agents of the clergy, and of exposing the lay schoolmasters to inevitable ruin. He therefore ordered the municipal councils who make a pecuniary allowance to the Brethren of the Christian Doctrine to demand payment from all heads of families whose means enable them to furnish it. Thus the clerical and the lay schools will be placed upon an equal footing. A fair competition will become possible between the two classes of schoolmasters, and there is reason to hope that many parents will decide upon henceforth confiding the education of their children to laymen, who will more carefully develop the faculties of their children.

JUDICIAL SENTENCE IN A CASE OF PIOUS FRAUD.

Our age is not very favourable to false miracles. In Spain, these juggling tricks, to which certain dignitaries of the Romish Church attach so much value, may still succeed; there is in that country a Sister Patrocínio, who, supported by the powerful intervention of the confessor of Queen Isabella, safely and fearlessly lays claim to the gift of prophecy and the power of working miracles; she finds apologists even within the walls of the Spanish Parliament. But in France pious frauds, as they are called, do not at all obtain the same success, and persons who give themselves to this kind of charlatanry have an account to settle with the Minister of Justice. This is precisely what has happened to a certain Marie Revoiran, in the department of the Drome. She was condemned to a month's imprisonment, in spite of the high character obligingly given her by the clergy.

This Marie Revoiran took a fancy to remain in a solitary cell, and pretended to live without nourishment, in order to establish her reputation as a saint and a prophetess. During the day she only drank a little cau sucrée; but it was proved, to the satisfaction of the judge, that, during the night, she ate some good pieces of meat, which were brought to her in secret by an eating-house keeper, who was very much interested in this fraud, because the numerous pilgrims who came to visit the young miracle-monger sensibly increased his income.

Marie Revoiran related that she had had frequent apparitions of the Virgin and of angels, and she gave the most minute details of her interviews with celestial beings. Moreover, imitating the example of the famous stigmata bearers of the middle ages, she declared that she had on her hands, feet, and side, the five wounds of Jesus Christ! Now, it came out in the course of the investigation that this woman tore her flesh with her own nails, in order to pretend she had these stigmata!

Would you believe that, every Sunday, from 1,500 to 2,000 pilgrims came from all the country round, in order to salute and express their veneration for this saint? Would you believe that many of the priests themselves—some ignorant enough to be deceived, others fraudulent enough to make a speculation of this disgraceful imposture, in order to put the money into their own purses—sanctioned, by their approbation, the popular folly, and delivered from their pulpits panegyrics upon this wretched woman, who was lying to both God and man?

The public peace in that part of the country became disturbed. This increasing multitude of visitors to the cell of Marie Revoiran introduced discord into families and sowed the seeds of deplorable fanaticism. In vain did the civil functionaries request the leading clergy, for the sake of maintaining tranquillity in the commune, to interfere in the affair, and prevent the pretended saint from continuing her imposture. The priests gravely shook their heads, and replied that it would be sacrilege to put themselves in opposition to the Divine manifestations. The question was then brought before the tribunals, and the judges, who are neither superstitious nor credulous, pronounced a sentence of imprisonment upon the prophetess. They admitted, however, that there were extenuating circumstances in the case, "because the accused had been led astray by the credulity of persons whose duty it was to enlighten her." These are the terms of the sentence. The judicial tribunal visited the Popish clergy with indirect censure. It is very evident that the ministers of Rome might have put a stop to this work of fraud from the first moment; but they had no wish really to do this.

Moreover, the ignorance of the inhabitants of the rural districts serves to keep up other frauds, not less disgraceful and reprehensible. There is in circulation, in our villages and hamlets, a mass of little pamphlets which contain such things as letters written by the hand of Jesus Christ, and found in the Holy Sepulchre (?), a recital of the miracles of St. Donat, or an account of the resurrection of a nun, two hundred years after her death, &c. It is stated at the end of those flying sheets that whoever will wear them upon his breast will be preserved from storms, hail, and sickness, that he will gain one hundred days' indulgence, and that he will certainly see the Holy Virgin three hours before his death! Such are the stupid pamphlets which are distributed with the approbation of the Popish ecclesiastics, or at least with their tacit consent, and which are designed to promote the religious education of the French people!

AN ARTICLE OF M. DE RÉMUSAT ON THE RATIONALIST THEOLOGY.

I pass at once to a wholly different subject. The Revue des Deux Mondes, in its January number, publishes a long article by M. Charles de Rémusat on the French Protestant Rationalists. Critical Theology: such is the title of this carefully-written and elaborate essay. M. de Rémusat, whose name has already appeared in our correspondence, is a member of the French Academy. A Roman Catholic by birth, he is a man of an independent mind, and possesses just authority in the philosophical and literary world. His writings are numerous and are held in high estimation. It is therefore interesting to learn what is his opinion of the principles of MM. Schérer, Albert Réville, Colani, and other neologians.

As M. de Rémusat professes to be a free-thinker, he never speaks in the name of orthodoxy, either Protestant or Roman Catholic. It is in the name of common sense, invoking the rights of the intellect and of logic, that he estimates the opinions of the critical school, and consequently his judgment deserves the more to be listened to.

The great fault which M. de Rémusat finds with MM. Colani, Schérer, &c., may be summed up in the following language: You establish a radical distinction between faith and science. Faith is with you an inward state, spiritual and moral; it is the piety of the heart, a subjective fact, a spontaneous phenomenon of the soul. You exalt faith; you pretend to preserve and even strengthen it within you and among your disciples. But faith is produced by objective facts, or by external and historical realities. Well! if you destroy these objective facts, these historical realities, by your science; if, on submitting the Bible, the life of Jesus Christ, His miracles, His character, to a powerful criticism, you arrive at these negative conclusions—that the Bible is a purely human book, and full of gross errors, that Jesus Christ was simply a man, that He never performed a miracle, and that even His character was not perfectly holy; if, in a word, you abolish, by your science, all that is objective in Christianity, what becomes of your faith? It will no longer have any foundation; it will be an effect without a cause; in its essence it will be nothing.

These objections on the part of M. de Rémusat are grave and striking. A purely negative science cannot harmonise in the same individual with a positive faith, and the testimony of experience, seriously given, would confirm what is proved by common sense. There are many theologians of the rationalist school who, in beginning their war upon the historical facts of the Gospel, asserted that they were still believers, pious in heart, and perhaps, in fact, they had preserved some of the lessons of their early education. But speedily the deleterious influence of their learning, their philosophy, falsely so called, enfeebled, and afterwards destroyed, the last remains of their faith they have turned aside more and more from Jesus Christ, from His Word and His precepts; they have ceased to pray, to attend public worship, and to take an interest in sacred things; they are become infidels, and their mental powers no longer find food in religion; they are concerned about philosophy, politics, literature, and so forth. Such is the lamentable history of the Lichtfrunde in Germany; this will be the history of our French Rationalism; faith inevitably perishes when ill-directed science leaves nothing in the head but mere negations.

GREAT PROGRESS OF PROTESTANT SCHOOLS IN PARIS.

The bulletin of the Society of St. Francis de Sales (an institution intended to impede the preaching of the Gospel) recently published a statistical account of the Protestant Schools of Paris. The bigoted author of this article shows, by positive figures, that the schools contain more than 5,200 scholars. Then he makes a calculation—the details of which I spare your readers—in order to show that nearly two-thirds of the children who attend these schools are Roman Catholics. “Thus,” says he, “3,000 of these poor little creatures are exposed to the almost certain danger of losing their re- ligion, and being taken from the [Papal] Church!” Such is the evil, adds the Ultramontane writer, and he asks that a hundred new Romish schools may be immediately founded at Paris.

This admission of the adversaries of Christian truth is worthy of attention. It shows that Protestantism is making great progress among the rising generation, and that many parents prefer our schools to those of the priests.

THE PARIS PRESBYTERIAL ELECTIONS.

P.S.—As I conclude my letter I learn that the Paris elections for the re-appointment of a portion of the Presbyterian Council have been favourable to the evangelical cause. The members of the Council, who, according to law, were submitted to the suffrages of the flock, were all re-elected by a large majority. These are men in whom orthodox persons have entire confidence. This result is the more remarkable and cheering, as the Liberal Protestant Union—that is to say, the adversaries of the Evangelical party—made the greatest efforts to obtain the election of candidates of wholly opposite principles. The striking triumph of orthodoxy in Paris must exert a beneficial influence upon the whole of French Protestantism. X. X. X.

ELECTION OF THE NEW PRESBYTERIAL COUNCILS IN FRANCE.

Our readers will observe in our French correspondence the statement that a special importance had been imparted by the formation of the so-called Liberal Union to the recent election by universal suffrage of the Presbyterian Councils of the Reformed Churches. We now add a few particulars of these elections, as supplied by the Archives du Christianisme. It appears that Paris was the especial centre of operations, and the point of attack by the adversaries of the Gospel. Their object was to break down the majority, which was becoming more and more decided in favour of positive and Evangelical Christianity. Much money was collected for this object, and efforts worthy of a better cause were vigorously put forth. Circulars were issued, and electors solicited, summoned in some sort, in the name of “liberal religion;” the most false accusations were heaped upon the Council whose powers were about to expire; malevolent insinuations were studiously spread abroad; the pretended liberals essaying all sorts of arguments, even to the extent of affirming that their pastors were the only ones who drew large congregations, or who obtained large collections for the poor. They affirmed that the immense majority of the members of the Reformed Church of Paris were of their negative religion, and made unprecedented efforts to get inscribed upon the parochial register a crowd of voters, mechanics and others (never to be seen in the churches), and to bring them to the poll. They were, moreover, confident of success, and any one who, at the opening of the poll, should have foretold its result, would have greatly surprised them. All this, by God's goodness, has but rendered more striking and significant the signal defeat which their principles have just undergone. Six members, according to law, retired from the Council—viz., MM. Delessert, Thierry, sen., de Triqueti, Mettetal, R. de Pourtalès, and Beigbeder. They were eligible for re-election, and the orthodox party determined to re-elect them all. The Rationalists were prudent enough to ask only that the last three should be displaced; but though more than 1,500 votes were polled, they only succeeded in depriving them of 400. The exact result was as follows:—

For F. Delessert . . .	1453	} On both lists.
„ Thierry, sen. . .	1447
„ De Triqueti . . .	1442
„ Mettetal . . .	1072
„ R. de Pourtalès . . .	1067
„ Beigbeder . . .	1048

These last three were struck out of the “liberal” list, and replaced by MM. Say, Bordier, and Pages, who obtained 496, 470, and 451 votes respectively. The list of the friends of the Gospel thus passed entire, and, from the very first, by an overwhelming majority. The defeated candidates and their friends, however, now find consolation in the belief that the relative strength and position of the two parties in the Reformed Churches of France has undergone no change!

The anti-orthodox Lien says: “This issue of the struggle was foreseen by the majority of those who knew the ground, and we ourselves anticipated it. . . . Compared with the results of the elections of 1852-3, the only ones hitherto contested, the numbers show that the situation, at Paris, has scarcely changed, and that the relative strength of the two parties is still, notwithstanding ten years of orthodox dominion, what it was of old.” After the confident anticipations of success indulged in by the majority of the anti-orthodox party, this kind of consolation, we should think, will hardly be appreciated.

PROGRESS OF THE GOSPEL IN FRANCE.

The statistics of Protestant schools, referred to this month by our correspondent, “X. X. X,” as having been published by the Society of St. Francis de Sales, has suggested to Dr. Frederic Monod an article in the Archives du Christianisme, contrasting the condition of French Protestantism at the present time with what it was fifty years ago. Dr. Monod shows that in 1807 there were but three pastors of the Reformed Church in Paris, and but two places of worship, in each of which there was one sermon every Sunday! Two sermons each Sunday then comprised all the Protestant worship celebrated in Paris; for, as regards the Lutheran Church, we learn that, although an Imperial decree had established a place of Lutheran worship, under the direction of the General Consistory of Strasburg, the pastor had not yet been appointed. In 1819 an assistant pastor was accorded to the Reformed Church. The Lutheran Church had, by that time, two pastors, one place of worship, and one consistory. Thus six pastors, three places of worship, and three sermons on Sunday, constituted the whole of the outward means and appliances of Protestantism at Paris! What is its state, in these respects, now? There are 48 pastors of different denominations, 31 places of worship, 83 sermons weekly (49 in French, 12 in German, 22 in English), of which 59 are on Sundays, and 24 on week-day evenings. Independently of these, there are numerous meetings for prayer, for the study of the Word of God, and for mutual edification, which may be estimated at about 50 weekly. Let us add that the first Sunday-school was opened at Paris on the 22nd of September, 1822, with from fifteen to twenty scholars, and that there are now from twenty-five to thirty of these schools, with a number of scholars estimated at from 2,500 to 3,000.

So much for Paris. Dr. Monod then glances at the whole of France. In 1807 there were throughout the country 551 pastors in the Reformed Church, and 480 in the Lutheran. Of these, however, a large proportion belonged to departments now no longer French territory. Deducting these, the numbers were: Reformed, 227; Lutheran, 224; total number of pastors, 451. According to the "Protestant Year Book for 1861," the present numbers are: of the Reformed Church, 653 pastors; of the Lutheran Church, 405; total, 1,058 pastors. Finally, the first Protestant religious journal was established in 1818 there are now twenty-one such journals published, not including those which come from Switzerland, Belgium, and elsewhere. Well may Dr. Monod express his gratitude to God in the view of changes so great and momentous, and his firm confidence that what the Lord hath done is a sure pledge of that which He will yet accomplish.

THE VILLEFAVARD CHURCH AND SCHOOLS.*

Villefavard, Haute-Vienne,
Nov. 13, 1861.

Knowing the lively interest taken by you in the work of evangelization in the Haute-Vienne, and especially in the commune of Villefavard, we are happy to be able now to inform you of the great deliverance which the Lord, in His loving-kindness, has just granted to us. You are aware that, in 1856, our church was re-opened for the free preaching of the Gospel; but alas! contrary to our expectations, our schools remained shut. It was doubtless the will of God to try our faith and constancy. The authorities stationed a Roman Catholic schoolmaster in our commune, telling us that we might, without apprehension, send our children to him, and that their religion would not be interfered with. But this did not satisfy us; we wanted a schoolmaster who, while training the minds of our children, should also be able to feed their souls with the pure doctrines of the Gospel; and how was it possible for one who was a stranger to our religious convictions to do this? Accordingly, none of us were led away either by promises or solicitations. The pious and devoted schoolmasters placed in our midst by the thoughtful consideration of the Evangelical Society of France did their best to repair, as far as possible, the wrong that we suffered, by traversing the villages daily, and going from house to house, in order to impart to our children a Christian education.

After persevering efforts on the part of the committee of the Evangelical Society of France to obtain the recognition of our rights, we were, in the month of July last, led for a moment to believe that a better day was about to dawn upon us; but our hopes were again deceived; the authorities maintained that our schools must be closed in the interests of public morals, as they said. Depressed, but not driven to despair by this fresh obstacle, we felt the need of crying with the greater importunity to "Him who executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed." A month had not elapsed after the decision by which our beloved schools were kept closed when we were informed that they might be re-opened. The news filled us with joy; we blessed God, who, in answering our prayers, fulfilled our dearest wishes, at the very moment when all hope seemed gone; and praise and thanksgiving ascended to the Lord from every heart. It was on the 30th of September, after waiting nine years, that our schoolrooms were at length thrown open, so that our numerous youth might gather round their much-loved masters. It is this good and delightful news that we felt pressed to inform you of; it is this fresh evidence of the mercy of God towards us

* The facts stated in this letter have already appeared in our pages; but we cannot deny ourselves the gratification of placing upon record a narrative of the whole affair, as related by those most concerned, especially as the tone of the letter is so admirable. The patience under persecution, and thankfulness for deliverance exhibited by these good villagers, may be said to be evidences of the power of the truth and of their submission to it. It is scarcely necessary to say, that the letter was addressed to friends who had practically manifested an interest in them during their long season of trial.

that it gratifies us to communicate to our dear and worthy benefactors—for it is you who have helped and sustained us in our long and painful trial, by providing in so generous a manner for the support of the labourers whom the Evangelical Society stationed with us—the profound gratitude with which our hearts are filled towards you.

Our children will no longer be left to themselves, as in the past; taught by masters who strive to impress upon their hearts the truth of the Gospel, we expect, by the mercy of God, from the opening of our schools, the happiest results; the Christian influence exerted upon them will be the greater as the moral and intellectual teaching will be the more efficacious. . . .

In the name of the congregation of Villefavard. * * *

ITALY.

Florence, January 18, 1862.

A HOME MINISTER WANTED.

The great want of Italy, at this moment, is an able Home Minister, to employ the present providential pause between past successes and future efforts in organising the internal interests of the country. A series of constitutional but rapid annexations has taken place among peoples of various races, climates, and laws; and the assimilation of these, by judicious legislation, is a task of no ordinary magnitude. Though much has been already accomplished—although railways are fast obliterating the fictitious landmarks of the past, and steamers are bringing into closest intercourse ports formerly far distant from one another—so much remains to be done, that one statesman after another has lately shrunk from the responsibilities of the Ministry of the Interior. It is well known that the extraordinary liberation of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies from Bourbon despotism, by the bravery of Garibaldi, not only astounded the world, but took the great Cavour himself by surprise.

His cherished plan, after making Sardinia a little England, was, through the annexation of Lombardy and Venice, to make the northern kingdom such a model of a powerful and prosperous state, that, one by one, the lands of the south would claim to be affiliated with it. He accepted, however, the reversal of his plans with fortitude, and was so prolific in expedients, that he rose to the height of the emergency, and grappled successfully with the immense difficulties of the situation. His successor is seriously occupied with the same task of equalising the burdens, developing the resources, and adjusting the laws of the country, so as to make Italy truly “one” and “united.” Often baffled, he is not dejected; occasionally misled, he is not deserted by the patriot band in Parliament.

LEGAL ANOMALIES IN TUSCANY.

As a specimen of the anomalies which had to be provided for, let me cite the case of Tuscany. On each successive annexation the criminal code of Sardinia, as well as the “constitution” and the “free press,” were proclaimed in the new territories owing submission to our gallant King. It so happened that the Tuscan criminal code was in some respects superior to that of Piedmont, owing to the milder character of the people; for example, with regard to the treatment of criminals and the question of capital punishments. Travellers who visit the prisons and hospitals of Central Italy are greatly pleased, and admit that England might take a leaf or two out of the Italian book with advantage. This actual superiority on the part of the Tuscan law has caused delay in introducing the Sardinian criminal code, until other pressing difficulties were solved, and a Committee of Parliament could adjudicate on the differences, and prepare a general measure for the acceptance of the country. This delay has been productive of great inconvenience, in more respects than one. The cause of Gospel truth has especially suffered thereby. This same Tuscan code, though excellent in some of its regulations, is most bitter and persecuting in all that refers to the Evangelical cause. The idea of printing Italian Bibles and Testaments here, at the Claudian printing-press, or at any other, is too dangerous to be attempted till a happier day arrives, though it was permitted in Turin last year.

OBNOXIOUS LAWS AGAINST RELIGIOUS LIBERTY REVIVED.

At the annexation of Tuscany the freedom of the press and the equality in the eye of the law of all religions were distinctly proclaimed. Under shelter of this noble statuto, Christians have met together from Sabbath to Sabbath, dépôts have been opened, books have been printed, and colporteurs have gone over the land on their sacred mission. Occasional hindrances have been thrown in the way, but on the whole a prudent and practical liberty of action has been enjoyed. The experience of the last few weeks, however, has taught us that liberty of worship and liberty of conscience are two different things. We have just made the disagreeable discovery that throughout Tuscany we are still under the obnoxious laws of 1849, barbarised by the Grand Duke after his return from a temporary exile and companionship with the Pope in Gaeta. The very men who in the time of the Medici carried out these laws to their utmost limits are still the officials in the various municipal and pretorial offices here and in Leghorn. Yea, the very summonses and condemnations issued now against our brethren bear the Grand Ducal arms at the head of them. In the judgment of the friends of the Government this is a great blot in the management of public affairs. Not only have the willing tools of the old régime been retained in their several functions, but in many instances they have been promoted under the present Administration. The policy of Ricasoli is to bribe these men over to the new system, or at least to shut their mouths, and carry them, by force, along with the reforms and progress of the re. But it is a dangerous policy, as the fondled serpents may one day prove. Biscossi, the Governor of Leghorn, is a noted lay member of the Jesuit society, and the new Prefect of Florence, "being Catholic from religion and conviction, can never tolerate the circulation of Protestant books in Italy"!!

PROSECUTION OF PROTESTANTS.

Not to speak of private seizures of books, such as that of a New Year's Address by the evangelist in Elba, we have four different cases before the public tribunals of Tuscany for contraventions of this precious law of July, 1849, which prohibits, under severe penalties, speech, writing, and sale of books "against the religion of the State."

A colporteur of the Scottish Bible Society, by name Rocchiccioli, has been in "durance vile" for five days, had the Amico di Casa almanac and other books taken from him, and was fined in the expenses of the trial. Nothing could be done for him, as no authority but that of the King can absolve from a criminal sentence. The hardship in this poor man's case is that he alone of all the vendors of almanacs and religious books of various kinds has been arrested (thus showing the partiality of our law officers), and that, in common with others, he had the promise of the municipal authorities that he should not be disturbed in his occupation as a bookseller. Each day of his imprisonment he was visited by kind friends, who supplied this excellent inoffensive Christian sufferer with everything needful. He counted it all joy to suffer for Christ, and was deeply affected to see how the whole body of Christians suffers and sympathises in the sufferings of its humblest member, while the members of a mere political corporation would have considered him beneath their regard.

One of the Waldensian students, Giovacchino Gregori, who laboured in spiritual things during the vacation in the island of Elba, where large congregations now listen nightly to the Gospel message, is under process at Lucca. The chief priest of Porto-Ferrario published a letter to his parishioners full of calumnies against the Evangelicals, and the young preacher replied in a short and conclusive document, for which, it would appear, he must be condemned to five years' imprisonment, under the still existing laws of Leopold II. This is the opinion of his own counsel. The "law's delay" is proverbial here as at home, so that some time may elapse before the trial is concluded.

SIGNOR GAVAZZI AND MR. RIBET BEFORE THE TRIBUNALS.

Signor Gavazzi is also before the tribunals. A very cowardly spirit has been shown in indicting the "Padre" upon the most trifling charges, such as speaking against processions, against the nuisance of bell-ringing, &c., instead of arraigning him on the weightier matters of his Evangelical discourses and discussions. After a preliminary hearing, the case was indefinitely postponed, without any reason assigned; so that whether the prosecution will be continued or let fall to the ground, no one can tell.

Mr. Ribet, the Waldensian pastor at Leghorn, has also been summoned into court, along with his printer and dépôt-keeper, for publishing a reply to an attack upon him by Padre Romolo. Against his own wish, and that of his advocate, the case has been remanded to another time. The judges decided and insisted on carrying out the decision, "in order to afford time for the defence," although the defendants pleaded that they were ready to answer for their conduct, and begged that the case might proceed. There was quite a scene in the court, however, before the parties withdrew. Mr. Ribet not only knows that certain laws are in his favour, and that he can take advantage of the spirit of the constitution, but, like an Englishman, he loves his liberty, and moves about like a freeman, with the full consciousness of habeas corpus immunity. Accordingly, as two errors were found in the citation, when asked to speak for himself, he boldly declared that he had been unwarrantably summoned on the ground of two falsehoods, and that it was deplorable to see how priests and bigots might preach or print, might sell or post all over the town their open philippics against the Evangelical faith, and their covert attacks against the Government of Italy, without any notice being taken, while as soon as he ventured to put in a word of explanation for himself, or defence for the Government, all the authorities, from the governor to the policeman, were down upon him instantly. The chief judge was so excited on hearing this, that he let fall his scaldino (a little portable fire-pot), while another judge, coming to his aid, overturned and broke the chair of the worthy President, and made confusion worse confounded.

WHAT MAY BE EXPECTED.

That these four cases should have occurred since my last communication will astonish the friends of Italy. But it must be remembered that the increasing difficulties of the Government reached a climax recently in the vain efforts of the Premier to obtain a coadjutor for the Home Department. A resignation was considered inevitable, and no time was lost in seizing the golden opportunity.

Now that things continue as they were at Turin, the likelihood is that these prosecutions will be suspended for the present. Were Ricasoli to be driven from the helm of the State, or another crisis of peculiar difficulty to occur, we can easily perceive that the priestly party would carry the law much further than is indicated by the foregoing cases. In such circumstances, the need of united counsel and action among Christian brethren in Tuscany is evident. It is earnestly hoped that the Government will examine the matter, and listen to their prayer, and speedily place us here on an equal footing of privilege with our brethren in Naples, Milan, and Bologna. Let our friends at home pray that these violent proceedings may be overruled, as so many others have been, for the advancement of the kingdom of Christ. The Liberal journals of Italy will soon take up the subject. Already has the Nazione, the Times of Tuscany, said that the authorities in Turin, while legislating for the country, seem to have forgotten that there is such a place as Tuscany in the very centre of Italy, which needs the benefit of their labours as much as any other part of the Peninsula.

THE POPE'S SOVEREIGNTY.

A very clever brochure from the pen of Napoleon Roussel was brought out here lately, under the title of the "Vero Tracollo del Temporale" (The True Breakdown of the Temporal Power). As Christmas was at hand, when gifts are expected here or at home, it was headed, "Ceppo al Papa" (A Christmas Present to the Pope). The Pope is represented before a crucifix in St. Peter's, pleading with every worldly argument that Christ would interfere and defend the Church-lands against the enemies of religion. The reasoning of the Pope closely resembles the language of his recent allocutions. The Saviour always replies in most appropriate scriptural quotations, so that the Pope is at last driven to the resolution that in his own strength, and with his own means, he will defend his temporalities to the last farthing. The "Tracollo" is in the happiest style of its talented author. We anticipated for it as wide a sale as that of the famous "Colpo di Grazia" in June last. But the authorities refused to allow it to be sold in the streets. The translator, espousing the cause of the tract as his own, asked permission from his intimate friends, the district police magistrates, to have it publicly circulated, but in vain. The Prefect was appealed to through an influential quarter with a similar result. The Archbishop had been coquetting with the civil authorities, and lo! an abridgement of the liberty of the press. The various printers of Evangelical books were summoned and warned to beware; so that with the greatest difficulty could they be got to affix their names to the works published, as they are required by law to do. The very lucifer-match boys, who have ways and means of their own of disposing of numberless copies of a popular pamphlet, were called and informed that the slightest disobedience would involve the forfeiture of their licence as hawkers. What was to be done? One hundred and fifty large placards were affixed to the walls of the town, and intending purchasers directed to the Evangelical Dépôt. Several times have such posters been prepared for various publications, but on each occasion, in order to please the authorities, who deprecated the excitement of the people and the wrath of the priests, they were destroyed. In this case there was no other resource, and it was adopted. As a result, more than 600 have been sold at the dépôt here in single copies, and about 400 in Leghorn. The sale is going on in the streets of Naples and other towns, but with what success is not yet known. The "Tracollo" has already called forth one reply, which has doubtless aided its circulation. This will give you an idea of the straitened liberty of the press enjoyed by Tuscany.

THE CENSUS: IGNORANCE IN ITALY.

On the last night of 1861 a census of the Italian kingdom was taken. The schedule contained some very interesting questions of an educational and religious character. Although the whole question of a census was hastily ordered by the Government, and though the priests in the country and southern districts have not failed to alarm the people, and to declare from the altar that the schedule was only the precursor of taxation and conscription, the returns are said to have been very generally made. They will be of immense value to the Government. As the Evangelicals have fearlessly stated their religious faith, the authorities will now see that the native Protestants are not only composed of knots of people here and there in the agricultural districts, but number by hundreds in the large towns of the kingdom, and may fairly claim their full share of rights and privileges as an important body in the State. The educational statistics also will be turned to good account by the Italian people, so thoroughly aroused to a sense of responsibility and immediate action with reference to the prevailing ignorance. Only imagine the state of things revealed by the two following facts: "The supposed proportion of those who can read is, in Lombardy, from thirty to forty in a hundred; in Piedmont, from twenty to thirty in a hundred; in Tuscany, from ten to twenty in a hundred; whilst amongst the inhabitants of the districts thirty miles round Rome not one in a hundred can read." Again: "According to an official document published by Luigi Settembrini, Inspector-General of Public Instruction, there are in the province of Naples 1,845 communities, of which 846 are destitute of any schools and means of instruction. There are not more than 67,431 who get any school training. Accordingly, since the province of Naples amounts to 6,500,000, one child only in every thousand of inhabitants gets instruction." No wonder that Cavour left a large portion of his fortune for schools. No wonder that the Government of Italy is taking up the question of education as one of life or death. Should the census yield such returns as the above, we may well look for some parliamentary scheme for the removal of this disgrace to a civilised land.

POPISH CONTROVERSIAL LITERATURE.

As a result of the successful work of preaching and colportage carried on in Leghorn, a society of priests was formed about a year ago "for the publication of good books," and more than a dozen cheap and clever Popish expositions have been issued. About three months ago a similar society was formed in Pisa, the Rome of Tuscany, "for the spread of Catholic literature," and already half a dozen dialogues, catechisms, and apologetic papers have seen the light under its auspices. All that is stale in controversy and violent in assertion is reproduced in a portable and attractive form. The Waldenses come in, to the exclusion of everybody else, for the most severe handling, showing that the priests are alarmed at their success. Doubtless their organization, guaranteed liberty of worship, and well-known Evangelical character for centuries, have awakened a well-founded fear, for they have obtained the Royal sign-manual to the purchase of their College in Florence and handsome church in Leghorn. A good deal of amusement has been caused in Florence by a man of fair ability and perseverance, a devoted literary hack of the Papacy, who has lately made an effort to ride into fame on the back of the best of our Evangelical publications. He brought out this year a "Vero (True) Amico di Casa," as a foil to the popular and widespread almanac, the Amico di Casa. He has just commenced a journal like the Buona Novella, the fortnightly Evangelical organ of the Italian churches, which is called the Vera Buona Novella; and no doubt when Dr. De Sanctis's theological work appears next month, under the title of "Discussione Pacifica," we shall hear of a series of dialogues from our caricaturing opponent, to be called "The True Peaceful Discussion." All these hostile treatises are of service in stimulating inquiry and eliciting truth.

PASSAGLIA: HIS JOURNAL AND HIS POSITION.

The new bi-monthly journal of Passaglia has been looked for with much interest. It is called the Mediatore, and proposes to reconcile Pope and King, civil and religious interests in Italy. All that ability can do will be earnestly employed; but the ex-Jesuit is not yet trusted by many, even in his present line of action, though he has been appointed by the King to a chair in the University of Turin, consequent on the loss of all his emoluments from Rome. The articles are of the philosophic cast, and will not reach the masses of the people. Indeed, it is only among a few thinkers that any hope is entertained of a genuine and permanent understanding between such conflicting interests. Had the Pope accepted last autumn the very favourable offers of Ricasoli, not even the Minister himself could have prevented a curtailment of religious freedom throughout the land, and the growing feeling is that the peace would have been a hollow one, and in a few years the irreconcilable opposition of the Papacy to civil freedom would have shown itself. It is remarkable, however, to see the former defender of the Immaculate Conception, and the bosom friend of Pio Nono, combating the opinions of M. Guizot; and arguing, in so doing, with might and main, for thorough liberty of conscience. Truly, "times change, and we do change with them." It is to be hoped that Passaglia and his accomplished band, if really honest in their present convictions, will be led, from the circumstances of their position and struggle, gradually nearer the truth. The Pope has good reason for ordering the removal of Passaglia's easily-recognised head from the celebrated picture in Rome, which is to hand down to posterity the remembrance of the solemn announcement of the last infallible dogma of the Church of Rome.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

Last week, in concert with our brethren in home lands, we had a series of union prayer-meetings in the Waldensian Chapel, on the basis of the arrangements made by the Evangelical Alliance. The Rev. Dr. Revel, Messrs. Geymonat, Hall, O'Neill, McDougall, and Colonel Walker, were the presidents; while the Rev. Messrs. Gordon, Stallybrass, of Liverpool, Francesco Madiati, and many others, took part in the devotional exercises. The meetings were numerously attended, and it was felt by all to be a week of great privilege and refreshing. Not only did every denominational distinction disappear, but the various nationalities blended into one in Jesus Christ.

"THE WORK OF GOD IN ITALY."

I have read with the greatest pleasure "The Work of God in Italy," by the Rev. Wm. Owen, of London, and hope that it will be perused by all those who wish to have a correct idea of the various works and agencies in operation in this land. Mr. Owen has placed himself in communication with the best sources of information, and has produced a most interesting volume, surpassing all others on the same subject in painstaking accuracy of fact and unsectarian sympathy with all that is good, devoted, and laborious in Italy. A considerable difference of opinion may exist as to whether Gavazzi, who is the hero of the book, and an excellent portrait of whom adorns the work, is the great reformer of Italy, but no doubt can be entertained as to the ability and eloquence of the Padre, and as to the good he has already done, and the important services, we trust, he is yet destined to render in the evangelization of his native land.

GERMANY.

LABOURS OF GUSTAVUS WERNER, OR CHRISTIAN COMMUNISM REALISED.

Frankfort, January 15, 1862.

WERNER'S PERSONAL HISTORY.

One of the signs of the times which history will have to note as pertaining to our epoch is the infinite diversity of religious views which manifest themselves in the Church, and the diversity, not less great, of the undertakings by which every one seeks to give practical effect to his own system. The more that Christian faith and life abound in any country, the more does this diversity augment, provided that it have liberty sufficient to manifest itself in open day. The little German kingdom of Wurtemberg might serve to justify this remark. There, in fact, might be enumerated an infinite variety of religious tendencies, within as well as without the pale of the National Church. If I to-day venture to entertain your readers with the appearance of a new sect, it is less because of the religious opinions which distinguish it, than to point out to their attention a work, unique of its kind, and certainly very remarkable, which this sect has originated.

Let us speak first of the extraordinary man who is the chief and the soul of this whole movement. Gustavus Werner was in 1837 curate of a country parish, in which he acquired reputation by a persuasive eloquence, and a very active beneficence amongst the poor and working classes. In 1840 he established himself in the little city of Reutlingen (Wurtemberg), where his father resided as an experienced man of business, and director of the Chamber of Finance. Young Werner was himself without any fortune. Free from all charge in the Church, he then commenced the career of an itinerant preacher, and was soon surrounded by a multitude of adherents. In his preaching of the Gospel certain views were maintained which resembled those of Swedenborg. His allegorical interpretation of Scripture, his lively descriptions of the invisible world, made a profound impression on men's minds, but were hardly within the ordinary tracks of the Established Church. Under such circumstances, the great success of his preaching in different places could not fail to provoke the opposition of the clergy. This itinerant preacher, whom the masses came to hear in private rooms, in farm-houses, or in the open air, was summoned before the Consistory, and invited to make a frank declaration respecting his doctrine and his unwonted activity. Werner replied that he considered his vocation was to preach a living and active Christianity in the spirit of St. John; that in other respects he had in nowise changed his position in relation to the Church. The Consistory expressed itself satisfied, and decreed that with the presbyter of each parish should rest the decision whether or not Werner should be authorised to preach in the Church. This movement spread with great rapidity. In a few years Werner had in the country more than one hundred centres of activity, to the religious wants of which he responded by unheard of efforts of body and of mind. Not unfrequently did he preach in one day, in four parishes (somewhat distant from each other), discourses of not less than one or two hours' length, taking hastily on his journeys some very simple refreshment. This devotedness and self-renunciation of a man who expended himself entirely in the service of the people contributed, not less than his eloquence, to increase his influence over his adherents, who were always increasing in numbers and in zeal.

But, as might have been expected, the activity of Werner soon came again into collision with official opposition. Ecclesiastical authority once more put to him the question whether his faith and labours were in harmony with the confession of faith of the Lutheran Church. In his reply, he declared that all his activity was based on Christian charity, founded upon faith; that he felt himself to be in accord with the Protestant Church, and desired to remain in harmony with it; that, for the rest, he prayed the authorities not to impose on him the obligation of a symbol. The result was, that the Consistory, without putting any obstacle in the way of his activity outside the Church, interdicted him from all functions within her pale.

WERNER'S INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

But now we have to relate how the extraordinary undertaking which is properly the subject of this recital developed itself in the hands of Werner. When he was yet only a curate he had founded in his village an asylum for poor or deserted children. Subsequently, he purchased, for this object, a house which has since been enlarged; fields capable of supporting twenty head of cattle, and cultivated by eighty of the children whom he had brought together. He next founded an institution for the education of young women designed to become schoolmistresses. He added to his little domain a paper factory, and resolved to give a Christian basis to this branch of industry, which produces such great results, but which often draws after it so much immorality; he resolved, in a word, to found a vast association, of which "Christ should be the King." To realise this design, and to obtain the necessary resources, he bought, in 1850, at Rertlingen, a new paper factory for the sum of 40,000 florins. The opening of this establishment coincided precisely with his exclusion from the service of the Church. His industrial activity from that time continually increased, and never ceased to have for its object the relief of the poor and working classes, and the development of religious life in their midst. Mutual loan associations, the foundation of new asylums for deserted children, the acquisition of a new domain of twenty acres in extent—all was made conducive to this end.

These industrial establishments now amount to twenty-two, and are all connected with those of Reutlingen, as their metropolis. The majority of trades, and the manufacture of all articles of the first necessity, are there represented. Lastly, to crown all these enterprises, and to meet the wants of a multitude of poor people who flocked around him, Werner commenced, at Dettingen, the erection of a new establishment, the ground for which, with the buildings, cost him 200,000 florins. When he began to build he did not himself know whence he should procure money for the morrow. Nevertheless, all has been accomplished.

But what is most remarkable in all this is not only the exercise of charity in works of beneficence, but the principle upon which all these works repose. All these establishments form but one single and vast association, each member of which works for, and is supported by, the whole body. No one receives any salary, for his salary is precisely the sacrifice which he offers to the Lord and to his brethren. The revenues of all the establishments constitute a common treasury, from which all the expenses are defrayed; and the surplus serves for new enterprises. The money which the members of this large family entrust to the common chest is placed to their credit, and passes as an inheritance to their children. The general financial administration, as well as the decisions relative to new acquisitions, are confided to a council, chosen by all the members, and which meets every week at Reutlingen. All the members constitute but one body, and are always free to discontinue their contribution to the common fund. Already, in 1858, the receipts of this society had exceeded a quarter of a million [florins?], and the sums received from its auxiliaries, by which all had contributed to the general undertaking, had amounted to a million.

RESULTS OF WERNER'S LABOURS.

It is thus clear that Werner has realised what hitherto has appeared in the eyes of the whole world as an Utopia—Christian communism. Religion and labour, these are the two great elements of his undertaking; love to God and to the brethren are the life and soul of it. We may ask ourselves what will become of this astonishing society in the future? We may have our doubts as to whether, after the death of its founder, it will find a successor endowed with his talent for organization, and possessing the power of his piety. But one thing is certain and indubitable—viz., that a multitude of beings, morally and materially fallen and degraded, have regained, under Werner's guidance, a respectable position as honest and hard-working people; that gross sinners, admitted into these establishments, have there been preserved from again falling into vice; that, finally, a great number of men who felt discontented and unhappy, because, by their own fault, or without their own fault, they had found no position suitable for themselves, have been brought, through Werner's instrumentality, to know the peace of God, and to engage in works of honourable activity. To seek and to save that which was lost, to relieve the woes and sufferings of all; such, following the example of his Master, is the task to which Werner has devoted his life. And all his industrial enterprises are but a means of securing for his brethren their well-being in the present world, and salvation for eternity. Whatever the opinion we may have of his principle and of his work, as regards the future, every Christian cannot but desire for him the blessing of God.

RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF EAST FRIESLAND.

THE COUNTRY AND PEOPLE.

East Friesland lies at the north-west extremity of the kingdom of Hanover, to which it belongs, and is separated from the Dutch province of Friesland by that of Groningen. The river Ems flows through the district, and to it Emden owes its importance as a port. Emden contains a population of perhaps 13,000; but the chief place is Aurich, which probably contains not above 4,000 inhabitants. Some portions of the land lie so low, that embankments have been erected to keep out the sea, while in the interior the surface exhibits moors, marshland, and fens. The chief occupations of the people are agriculture, rearing of cattle, and fishing; on the borders of Oldenburg there is a little weaving carried on. The entire population is probably 180,000 souls. With regard to the religious condition of the province, East Friesland certainly is not remarkable for the prominent manifestation of the spiritual life beyond its neighbours; but in some respects the details are peculiar; it would therefore be a mistake to judge of this locality by what appears in Hanover proper. Indeed, in the western districts of Germany considerable diversity appears; thus the parts about Minden present quite a different aspect from those upon the Rhine, both in regard to population and the Church. The notices which follow make no pretence to be a complete statement of the facts, but only a reliable contribution towards them.

In order to understand their religious condition it is necessary to pay some attention to the character of the population, and this again is connected with the physical features of the country. East Friesland forms only a part of the country of the Frisians, which extended along the shores of the Northern Sea. In 1570 about 100,000 persons were drowned by an irruption of the sea; again, on Christmas-eve of 1717, there was another dreadful catastrophe of the same kind; and a third so recently as 1825. With their old enemy the inhabitants keep up a perpetual struggle; the sea striving to win upon the land, and the people either to retain what they have, or to recover more. To this necessity for industry is ascribed the earnestness, perseverance, and reserve of the people, as well as their dislike of innovations and their attachment to what is old and approved.

RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

The Reformation very early took hold of East Friesland, which had been in many ways prepared to receive it. The Church was dead here, as everywhere else; there were no fewer than 3,000 monks, and the clergy generally were men of dissolute habits.

In 1519 Heinrich Brun began to preach from the Scriptures; in 1521 or 1522 the Count Edgard received a preacher from Luther, and the new doctrines were rapidly disseminated. Into the history of these events, however, we cannot enter, but the labours of John à Lasco are deserving of especial remembrance. He was in 1543 appointed pastor at Emden, and superintendent of East Friesland. Subsequently there were many struggles between the Lutherans and the Reformed, which ended in the establishment of both. The Pietists, also, as the followers of Spener and Francke were called, disseminated their principles. In 1744 the independence of East Friesland terminated, and it was annexed to Prussia. Various alterations in the ecclesiastical arrangements ensued, the chief of which occurred in 1766. In 1806 East Friesland was taken by Napoleon, but in 1814 it returned to Prussia, and in 1815 was annexed to Hanover.

CHURCH CONSTITUTION.

The strife between the Lutheran and Reformed confessions continued for a century, and ended, as we said, in a mutual recognition. They are not strictly united, but they labour, side by side, for the advancement of the kingdom of God. Their differences in doctrine and rites do not prevent their co-operation and communion in various ways. The clergy exchange their pulpits with each other, and the Lutheran candidates for the ministry are examined by the Reformed general superintendent; but the contrary does not take place, inasmuch as the Reformed candidates are examined by the committee of the Assembly. The Consistory, which is subject only to the ministry of public worship, and comprising three lay members (one of whom is chief inspector of schools), the Reformed and Lutheran general superintendents, and the high bailiff, who has the direction of it, has its seat at Aurich, and exercises ecclesiastical control over the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. Besides, there is the Ministerial Association at Emden, formed in the interests of both churches, but now restricted to the Reformed, and the Assembly, which has watched over the interests of the Reformed Church since 1544, with the exception of twenty years (1583 to 1603), when it was suspended. This last is altogether a Church institution, quite independent of the Government, so that the Consistory can lay no claim to the right of chief control, and can at most send a lay member to its meetings, and prevent any discussion of political questions. For this reason the Cabinet, some years ago, ordered the Consistory to watch the Assembly more narrowly, and the latter of right protested against it; hitherto, however, their relation has not been regulated by any formal decision. Under each general superintendent there are the respective pastors of the five towns of Aurich, Emden, Esens, Leer, and Norden, and the superintendents. These have comparatively very small districts to superintend, for the Lutheran Church has eight, with at most fourteen pastors each, and the Reformed have each not more than eleven. Similarly large is the proportion of the clergy to the laity in general. In the Lutheran Churches there are 102 pastors to 127,000 souls, or little more than 1,000 to each. Still more favourable is the proportion among the Reformed, who have 88 pastors to 53,000 souls, or about an average of 1 to 600. In the towns the proportions are different, and give about 1,500 souls to each pastor. Every superintendent has at his side a layman as Church commissioner. Superintendents are nominated by the Consistory, and general superintendents by the Crown. Ministers are usually appointed by the whole Church, so that of three candidates the one is elected who has a majority, but it may, and occasionally does happen, that some one is unanimously invited. The Church commissioner is present at every elective act. In the Lutheran Church there are 59 places filled by election, twenty-seven by the consistory, and four by patrons; in the Reformed Church there are sixty-eight places filled by election, fourteen by patrons, and only six by the Consistory.

In 1635 the magistrate issued a declaration that he would receive all who were persecuted for the Gospel, and East Friesland was the refuge of the persecuted. There is an inscription to this effect:—

Heere, bewaare de herberg dyner gemeente (Lord, protect the shelter of Thy people); and in the great church another:—

Gods kerk vervolgt, verdreven;
Heeft hy hier troost gegeven.
(God's Church persecuted, and out driven;
Here hath He consolation given.)

Emden gave liberally to needy churches, not only to those abroad, but to those at home. Owing to the intimate relations with Holland, the Dutch language was established in East Friesland. When Dutch theology flourished, in the seventeenth century, most of the Reformed ministers were educated in Holland. At present the Dutch and German languages are alternately used by the Reformed, but the Mennonites regularly employ Dutch. Students are now mostly educated at German universities, and only visit Holland in order to master the language. The Heidelberg catechism forms the basis of instruction, and there is a German hymn-book, adopted in 1832. No regular liturgy is employed.

STATISTICS OF THE CHURCHES.

As already stated, the Lutherans were at first in the minority, but there are now 127,000 Lutherans to 53,000 Reformed. At the close of the sixteenth century, Emden and Leer were altogether Reformed; there are now in Emden about two Reformed to three Lutherans; in Leer twice as many Lutherans as Reformed; and in Norden, where the numbers were equal in the seventeenth century, only about one-tenth are Reformed. The reason of the change is, that East Friesland is no longer under the influence of Holland, but of Germany. In the middle of last century German became the language of the educated, and the children were sent to the German schools of the Lutherans, and German sermons were preferred by them to the Dutch. For East Friesland the German universities are now the nurseries of science and education. The German preaching in the Reformed Church is now liked better than the Dutch. To this it may be added that, for a series of years, many colonists have settled in the once unfruitful moors, which, by the well-known practice of burning the ground, have been gradually rendered fertile; but these parts lie within the Lutheran communes, and thus the incomers for the most part quietly enter the Lutheran community; the children are sent to the German schools, and they are baptized and commune in the Lutheran Church.

MODES OF WORSHIP.

That the Lutheran Church continued for centuries under the influence of the Reformed one may say is proved by every glance at the unadorned church buildings; we mean not merely their absence of ornament, but their very structure. Any one would take them for Reformed churches. Still more marked is the influence upon the worship. The clergy kneel in the pulpit, but the people do not kneel, neither do they stand up at the reading of the Scriptures, at prayer, or at the benediction. The sermons are moderately long, and after their introduction the so-called pulpit verse is sung (a relic of the older liturgy), during which the collection is made. The Lord's Supper is observed mostly every month, not in the presence of the congregation, and is not well attended. Baptism is very little prized. Confirmation is commonly put off to the age of twenty years, or even longer. The Sunday service consists of a hymn, prayer, reading, hymn before sermon (sometimes sung directly after the first hymn), sermon, general prayer, Lord's Prayer, benediction, and a closing verse, almost as in the Reformed Churches. The only traces of a liturgy are in particular places, and are endured with difficulty. Music is employed, but crucifixes and lights are not permitted upon the altar. The preaching is at present, in general, not scriptural. There are exceptions, and some believe in original sin, a devil, the eternal condemnation of unbelievers, like the Jews, and in Christ, out of whom there is no salvation, &c. The Gospel must be freely preached, not only in the churches, but in the schools, upper and lower, but complaints are made especially of the first. The younger clergy are educated mostly at Erlangen and Tübingen, a few at Halle and Berlin. Immediately on their return from the University they take their first examination, and their second just before their ordination, but these examinations are not sufficiently comprehensive and thorough.

But how is it with regard to the Christian life of the community? We can only judge of this by their fruits. Of the small attendance at the Lord's Supper we have spoken above. Notwithstanding the Prussian law, divorces are very rare, illegitimate births are few, and suicide seldom occurs.

CHRISTIAN ACTIVITY.

Pastoral visiting by believing and consistent ministers is very satisfactory, and experienced and intelligent Christians are found, although they are exceptions to the general rule. Family worship is seldom observed. Christian publications are widely diffused, particularly of older works, the well-known writings of Arndt, Lenczer, and Müller, and sermons of a later date, especially those of Hofacker and J. W. Krummacker.

The Evangelische Kirchenseitung (Church Journal) and the Protestantische Monatsblatt (Protestant Monthly Magazine) are not simply read by the clergy, but also by the laity, particularly by schoolmasters, as well as the Volksblatt (People's Paper) and the Sonntagszeitung (Sunday Journal), from Berlin, and missionary magazines.

The temperance movement, through the exertions of the Baron von Seld, has been productive of many good effects, but no special efforts are being made at present in its favour. The work of the Home Mission is almost entirely in the background. It would be a good sign if it were no longer necessary, but that is not the case. Would that the words spoken by Dr. Wichern in Osnabrück last year may not be lost upon the East Frieslanders! On the other hand, the aims of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, the Bible Society, and particularly Missions to the Heathen, are warmly supported.

The two last annual reports of the East Friesland Missionary Society lie before us. Each report contains the sermon preached at the anniversary of the chief society, held by turns in the five large towns, then the statement made after the sermon, and the list of subscriptions. This society has existed for more than twenty-five years. It does not send out missionaries, but contributes to their support. The commencement of the mission dates from the beginning of this century. The circular letter of 1795, addressed by the London Missionary Society to the Christians in Germany, speedily found a friendly reception in East Friesland. The missionary college, founded in Berlin, in the year 1800, by Johann Jähnicke, had its first true supporter in the Missionary Society of Senfkorn, in East Friesland, and shortly before his death (in 1827) Jähnicke wrote a letter of acknowledgment for their renewed subscriptions.

In the year 1834 both the Protestant Churches united in one society, and they, in the twenty-four years from their union, collected 70,998 dols. for the missions to Jews and heathen, besides possessing more than 2,700 dols. in legacies; of this they have sent away 66,147 dols., the remainder being devoted to home expenses. To almost all the missionary societies in Germany has East Friesland rendered annually considerable aid. In the year 1839 the society sent three missionaries (Noordhoff, Lienemann, and Wilken), to be educated in the institution of the Netherland Missionary Society. The two last are in the East Indies, as also Rittel, and Von Gerpen; Sternenburg labours in South Africa. This confederate missionary society has been especially active since 1851.

SCHOOLS.

In looking at the national schools and their teachers, we have only, as regards the latter, the most cheering account to give. As Christian men, they know that the souls confided to their care are given to them to guide to Christ, to educate, not only for time, but for eternity. This consciousness of their duty regulates their domestic life, and gives them the happiness of being always hopeful under the most trying circumstances. A cheering proof of this is that a number of former teachers have devoted themselves to the study of theology, and are actively engaged, with blessed results. During the last eight years there has been a preparatory school for teachers at Aurich, with a director and four tutors.

DISSENTING COMMUNITIES: THE RATIONALISTS AND CALVINISTS.

East Friesland has its Dissenters. The Mennonites, almost as old as the Reformation, are about 600 in number, with three ministers, but are not aggressive; and as the teachers derive their education and theology from Holland, the churches are sunk in Rationalism, with some exceptions. The Baptists have sought to gain a footing, but have only one very small church. There are also the Coccians, who are separatists from the Reformed, and only date from 1834. These are strong Calvinists, and directly opposed to Rationalism. They are, in all, from 50,000 to 60,000, and have a seminary at Kempen. The strictest part of them call themselves The Sheltered under the Cross, but there are only a few of them in East Friesland; the mass of them are in Holland. They are at present much divided, and will possibly soon disappear. There is also a small congregation of about thirty Moravians at Norden, with one pastor. Of the Pietists we have already spoken.*

HUNGARY.

DEATH OF AN HUNGARIAN PHILANTHROPIST.

Samuel Friedrich Liedemann was a merchant of Pesth, who died on the 29th of November, 1861, in his seventy-first year. His father, John Samuel, was one of the founders, and many years a trustee of the Protestant Church at Pesth. Samuel Friedrich was also a trustee, and took his father's place in the Church, but he more than carried out his plans. In the most liberal manner, he seldom allowed a year to pass without some special offering for some good cause. Thus, a few years since the Church wanted 12,000 florins for a particular object, and was at the same time burdened with a debt of 42,000 florins. Sundry plans were discussed, and a loan, a levy, and a subscription, were proposed alternately. At a meeting held for the purpose of considering ways and means, most were in favour of a loan; but Mr. Liedemann stood up and said he wanted, not a loan, but a gift of the 12,000 florins, and, for his part, would be one of twelve to give 1,000 florins each. The first to follow his example was Franz Liedemann, his brother, and after him came Fuchs brothers, and in a week the whole amount was raised; but there still remained the 42,000 florins, and Mr. Liedemann believed that this also might be cleared away while a manse and a schoolhouse were being erected. Money was obtained to the extent of 16,000 florins for these purposes, and of this also Mr. Liedemann gave 1,200, besides 500 on a separate account. He was ever a cheerful giver, and expended thousands upon objects of which he approved. For public and private purposes his liberality was incessant.

He was born at Pesth, in 1790, and was trained for commerce at Hermannstadt. In early life he took part in some political movements, and went on a military expedition to Galatz in the time of Napoleon. From Galatz he went to Constantinople on commercial matters, and then returned home. Next he went to Vienna, and in 1818 to Germany. In 1819 he married. He left no children, but had adopted those of others. As a merchant in Pesth he was successful, and went on a mercantile mission to Fiume, in 1828, on behalf of his native city. His father died in 1834, and from that time he became increasingly active and devoted. Through all political and commercial changes he held on his way, seeking to advance the temporal and spiritual interests of the entire community. Any attempt to enumerate the different schemes of improvement and benevolence which he advocated and aided would be imperfect. At his funeral thousands followed him, bearing witness to his worth and their grief; among them were many widows, orphans, and destitute, who wept over his bier. His piety was simple and unostentatious, and showed itself more in deeds than in words.

LAPLAND.

SINGULAR SERVICE RENDERED BY A BIBLE.*

One of our fellow-labourers travelling in Lapland writes to us from Swatzsjo (Dalecarlia), in September, 1861, the following narrative. It shows to what use, amongst others, a Bible may be put when journeying.

We had (he says) just proceeded some way on our travels in Lapland, almost entirely on foot, and had arrived at Kareuando, a small town in Swedish Lapland, situated on the right bank of the Muonio, on departing from which we could finish our route by boat. Having no knowledge of the Finnish tongue, we requested the Norwegian and Lapland guides whom we had brought from Athurgaard (near Hammerfest) to act as interpreters for us, and procure us a boat. Some hours afterwards three strong Finnish rowers were taking us down the course of the Muonio, whilst our guides returned northwards by the road through the mountains.

The Muonio flows over a length of more than fifty leagues through great and impenetrable forests, the silence and solitude of which have never been disturbed by the hand or the foot of man, and we experienced a feeling of melancholy, very naturally resulting from the thought that we had no means of communicating with our boatmen, the only living beings whom we should see for many long hours.

Suddenly, although we had scarcely accomplished half our distance for the day, they ran our bark on shore, shouldered our luggage, and conducted us, notwithstanding our most energetic protestations and eloquent gesticulations, to a small deserted hut near the bank, in which, after having lighted a good fire, they left us alone, and disappeared in the forest.

A whole hour passed, and dejection began to gain upon us, when suddenly, whilst examining all the corners of this little hut, I discovered, between two beams, some books in the Finnish language, amongst which was a New Testament. To show my discovery to my colleagues, with an exclamation of joy, to take my own New Testament out of my bag, and to commence study, was the work of an instant. My companions joined me, and after an hour of a task of which the interest and the ease increased as we advanced, we had compiled a small vocabulary containing all the words of which we had most need for the moment.

Soon afterwards our boatmen reappeared upon the bank, and it was with a very legiti-mate delight that we ran to meet them, to inquire, to their great astonishment, in pure Finnish, why they had put us ashore, and when we should set out again. Some indispensable repairs to the boat had been the cause of all this delay, and as it would yet be some time before they could be completed, we were able, at our ease, to complete the work we had begun. An hour afterwards they came to tell us that everything was ready, and when we quitted our little cabin we took with us, thanks to my New Testament, transformed into a dictionary, the means of understanding our boatmen and their fellow-countrymen during the six whole days that we had yet to pass in their midst. The remainder of our journey was thus accomplished without any difficulty, thanks to the Bible, which had once more served us—and this time in the literal sense of the word—as a guide upon the earth.

CHINA.

PROGRESS AND REVERSES IN THE MISSIONARY WORK.

DR. LOCKHART IN PEKIN.

The recent intelligence from China is of a mingled character—in some respects deeply painful, in others encouraging. Our readers will have learnt from the secular press the change which has taken place in the government, by which the old council, whose policy was of the most objectionable kind, has given place to an administration headed by Prince Kung, whose views, as to political matters, are said to be liberal and enlightened. The Prince had not yet, it would seem, been invested with his new and important functions when Dr. Lockhart, of the London Missionary Society, arrived in the capital of the empire, into which the Protestant missionaries, for some time previous, had been in vain endeavouring to obtain admission. Dr. Lockhart writes: "I hope my coming will be the commencement of Protestant missions in Pekin. . . . The more I see of the place, the more important, in every way, does it appear to me." The accession to power of Prince Kung, and the arrival of Dr. Lockhart at the seat of government, could not have been separated by more than a brief interval, if they were not actually coincident. We may hope, therefore, that this soldier of the cross may not only obtain a permanent abode in the capital, but that he will be followed thither by other members of the missionary host.

The other items of intelligence are distressing in the extreme. There is, first, the MURDER OF TWO MISSIONARIES.

Dr. Parker, of the American Episcopal Board, and the Rev. J. I. Holmes, of the American Southern Baptist Convention, had settled at Chafoo, in the northerly district of Shantung, a place which seemed very suitable as a missionary centre. In the beginning of October the peace of the town was disturbed by the approach of a body of rebels, whose line of march was marked by destruction and burning. On the morning of the 6th of that month Messrs. Parker and Holmes, well mounted, went out to meet them, and tell them that the French, who hold the town by the treaty till the indemnity is paid, were prepared to defend it. They returned no more; and two days afterwards a party of the rebel force moved down to the town, but very rapidly disappeared again when a French gunboat lying off the place threw a shell or two amongst them. After a few days had elapsed a troop of French soldiers went out to see what the rebels were doing, and found that they had left the neighbourhood. A party of gentlemen, amongst whom was a brother of one of the missionaries, scoured the country, and at last found the mangled remains of their missing friends some 45 miles from Chefoo. They had been hacked to pieces by sword and spear, and their pockets had been rifled. The road along which the rebels had passed was strewed with mangled and headless bodies; the ponds were filled with dead; women and children lay mangled on the thresholds of their dwellings, and the hamlets were in ashes. The Rev. Mr. Smith, of the Episcopal Mission, who was living there too, took all the missionaries' families to Chefoo at midnight, and they just escaped, and that was all.

It is also our painful duty to chronicle the

MARTYRDOM OF A NATIVE PREACHER.

Six years ago a native named Ch'èä, living in the city of Poklo, which is about 100 miles from Hongkong, visited the missionaries at the latter place, and asked for instruction in the truths of Christianity, of which he had heard something from a colporteur. In each succeeding year he came again to Hongkong, bringing other converts with him, and Dr. Legge and the Rev. John Chalmers have, in their turn, visited him at Poklo, and been greatly gratified for the intelligence and good conduct of the Christian community which he had gathered round him. Up to the middle of last year they had been unmolested by their heathen neighbours, but then a spirit of persecution arose, and, as the interference of the Governor at Canton seemed to have no effect, Dr. Legge started for Poklo on the 14th of October with a special officer deputed by the Governor. As soon as the local magistrates heard that he was on his way, they set themselves to do that which the Governor's despatches had been quite ineffectual in bringing about. Their behaviour to Dr. Legge was most obsequious, and they agreed to all that he said to them with only too great facility. The gentry, too, were all smiles; and the Doctor left Poklo with the belief that the peace and safety of the Christians were secured. Scarcely, however, was his back turned when a horde of countrymen, constituting a new army of rebels, were gathered at a neighbouring village, and, vowing vengeance on foreigners and Christians, they seized some of the magistrates, captured Ch'èä, and, after two days of torture and insult, threw him into the river. The Christian converts have all been obliged to fly, and some have made their way to Canton. The rioters were led by Soo-Hoyu, who had all along been the opponent of the Christians; and their flag bore the inscription of "Security to the Government and extermination to the barbarians." The movement seems to be extending, and the authorities at Canton are in no little alarm about it.

MADAGASCAR.

CESSATION OF PERSECUTION—THE NEW KING AND THE NEW POLICY.

The persecutions of Christians, which continued almost from the death of King Radama I., in 1828, to the death of Queen Ranavalona, in July last, have come to an end. The sighing of the prisoner has been heard by Him who pitieth them that fear Him. Upon the death of the Queen the Prince Royal succeeded to the throne. Communications were at once made with the British authorities at the Mauritius by the Malagassée Government, with a view to the renewal of friendly intercourse. This led to a deputation or mission to the island, and it is to some of the facts connected with that mission that we desire to call attention. With these facts, however, we shall connect certain details belonging to a separate movement in favour of Christianity.

Immediately upon his accession to the throne, the new King, Radama II., communicated the fact to the Governor of Mauritius. A few days later he announced that no duties would be charged at his ports upon either imports or exports; and, at the same time, the principal secretary of state intimated that an envoy might be sent to congratulate the King upon his accession. The Governor of Mauritius at once forwarded a letter of congratulation, and the colonial secretary forwarded particulars of the proposed embassy. It was an instruction to the mission not to interfere in either political or religious affairs. A number of presents to the King were entrusted to them, and they arrived at Tamatave on September 26, 1861. After accomplishing the objects for which they were deputed, the mission returned to Mauritius, where they arrived on November 9. The Overland Commercial Gazette, published at Port Louis, Mauritius, gives the following

SUMMARY OF THE STATE OF AFFAIRS.

We need not say that the mission was well received; it could not be otherwise, as it had been sent at the formal request of the King. No contrast can be greater than the policy of Radama II. compared with that of the late Queen; and if internal dissensions are not caused by the fear and hatred of the adherents of the old regime to the new order of things, we must expect to see this country occupy a more important place than it has done in the world's history. The change has been sudden, and has excited much jealousy. Europeans have free access to a country that was previously closed to them; education is to be encouraged, to dissipate superstition, and raise the character of the people; Christianity is showing evident signs of existence among the natives, notwithstanding the former cruel persecution of those who had enlisted under its banners; commerce is aided by liberal regulations at the ports; and, as soon as better means of communication are opened with the interior, a great stimulus will be given to industry among a people who have been forced into indolent habits by the obstinate, ignorant, and oppressive government of the late Queen. But what is cheering, to all who wish well to this vast country and its inhabitants, is to see that the seeds of civilization and religion sown in the time of the first Radama still bear their fruit. The European character is adopted to write the native language. English and French are spoken by many of the Hovas; the forging and working of metals are understood; tools and instruments are made in iron, which are very serviceable, and not costly; and an aptitude is shown for the useful arts generally. There is an intelligence in this people, a certain advancement in civilization, and a desire to advance further, which entitles them to be left to govern themselves. We only fear the present King is too mild to resist the opposition which appears to be offered to the radical changes he has made. Latterly, intelligence from the capital reports an unsettled state of things. Now the life of the commander-in-chief has been attempted, and the disappointed aspirant to the throne, Ramboasalama, is said to be the instigator. A British and a French resident at the capital, if they could be sure of agreeing as to the advice they would give the King, would greatly strengthen his position; and as he is imbued with the same desire as the two great nations of Europe, the entente cordiale would not be difficult. The report of the mission conveys information which has been acquired by personal observation; it gives a good idea of the character of the people, the aspect and condition of the country; it describes some of its productions; and confirms the opinion held with regard to the disposition of the new King. His first act was to strike off the chains which bound the native Christians, and for this alone he deserves every support from the two great nations of Europe, which, we learn from the instructions of his Excellency the Governor to the Mission, have agreed to act in harmony.

ARRIVAL ON THE ISLAND OF A PROTESTANT MINISTER—ROMISH PRIESTS AND SISTERS OF CHARITY AT THE CAPITAL.

It may be needful to remind the reader that the Hovas referred to in the preceding extract are one of the two principal races inhabiting Madagascar. Tamatave is the principal port of the island. With these explanations we may proceed with our details. A letter from Tamatave reported that Mr. Le Brun, a Protestant minister from Mauritius, had started for the capital, accompanied by an interpreter and twenty marmites, native bearers or porters, who carry passengers in a kind of palanquin. The writer expresses his belief that gold might be found in the country. The natural productions are diversified and abundant, and offer every inducement to trade. On the 13th of October a French steamer from Bourbon arrived, with a few passengers, including two priests and four Sisters of Charity. A large crowd of natives collected to witness their landing. They were dressed in their official robes, and wore large crosses suspended round their necks. The packages accompanying them were labelled "Mission, Tamatave." It is understood that the Sisters intend to establish a school at Tamatave for the instruction of the Malagasse girls. "This reinforcement, with the priest already here, who arrived from St. Marie, will make a total of three priests and four Sisters." The Propagandists evidently resolved to lose no time, whereas the only Protestant minister then in the island was Mr. Le Brun.

Among the principal officers in Radama's court, one was educated in England by the British and Foreign School Society, and others have been in this country. On the 15th of October we read: "To-day being the festival of St. Thérèse, mass was celebrated in a small room in Tamatave, the first time for many years: only a small audience. A few Malagassees outside the door looked in with much curiosity. The room contained a small organ, with other things generally used at this ceremony." On the 17th the writer was present at a dinner given to some foreigners and others. He says: "A plentiful meal was supplied, including plenty of liqueurs, wine and champagne, pastry, fruits, coffee, &c. The sides of the wall were hung with mirrors, and the band played very well. Numerous toasts were drunk, including the health of the King of Madagascar, the Queen of Great Britain, and the Emperor of the French. All the Hova officers present were dressed in civilian costume, in which they looked very well. The dinner occupied about six hours. The band played 'God Save the King,' which is the national air of Madagascar, adopted from the English. When the health of the King was drunk every one turned to the west, the direction of the capital, said 'Veloma,' and bowed." On the 18th M. Chéry, a trader, died, and his funeral took place on the 19th, when many persons assembled, and "the ceremonies usually performed by the Church of Rome on such occasions" were performed by two priests and the Sisters of Charity. News reached Tamatave on the 21st that the Roman Catholic priests had arrived at the capital, so great had been their diligence. "The changes that have already taken place in Madagascar (says the same writer) since the death of the Queen are marked and extraordinary. Before that event there was no communication with any part of the interior open to Europeans; they could not proceed many miles from Tamatave without being arrested and sent back. No Bibles or other religious books were allowed. I once had a New Testament exhibited to me, but it was only inside of closed and locked doors."

A NATIVE'S OPINION OF PROTESTANT AND ROMISH PROSPECTS.—LIBERAL SENTIMENTS OF THE KING.

Another communication from Tamatave, dated October 22, furnishes further details. A bazaar had been opened, and various articles were offered for sale. Every vendor was provided with weights and scales for weighing the out money, pieces of five francs French. It was very difficult to circulate any money but five franc pieces. Rice was freely offered. At that time Mr. Le Brun had not reached the capital, but the Catholic priests had begun quietly to pursue their avocations. A Hova remarked that the sect which could afford to expend most money in paying native teachers would succeed; but the history of the last thirty years leads us to hope that he was mistaken. In case the King dies, it is said his crown will devolve upon Rabado, his wife. This Rabado is alleged to be a great friend of Ramboasalama, the rival of Radama, who is opposed to the new order of things. On the 29th of October English money had begun to pass.

In a letter to the Society of Arts and Sciences at Mauritius, King Radama II. says: "Rest assured, gentlemen, that it is my ardent wish that agriculture and the arts and sciences should flourish in my kingdom, and scientific men explore my kingdom, so that it may be advantageous to my people and profitable to other countries." The following is part of a memorandum to the instructions given by the Governor of Mauritius to the mission: "It is not improbable that persons who may have gone from this island to Madagascar, or may be about to do so, may wish to engraft themselves on my mission of congratulation, or to become directly or indirectly identified with it; and they may have private designs of a commercial, territorial, political, or religious character, with which I do not wish my mission to be in the least degree concerned." The mission was, therefore, to be in no way connected with such persons. When the mission arrived at Antananarivo, the capital, an audience was had of the King, who said, his whole wish was to extend trade, to know and honour the English, and to do all he could to obtain their regard and friendship; that he looked upon the English as his greatest and truest friends; and that he very much wished to encourage English education. He did not touch upon the subject of religion.

IS THE KING A CHRISTIAN?

A member of the embassy, in a letter to the English press, says: "It has been currently reported that the King is a Christian. It is premature to say so now, but there is ground to hope that he will become so. At present he professes a sort of Deism, which his chief secretary has engrafted upon him." With reference to this point, we distinctly remember that Mr. Ellis, in his "Madagascar," expressly says that Radama had adopted the Christian faith, and if we mistake not, he adds that he had been baptized, besides which, he mentions the unsuccessful attempts of Romish missionaries to make him a Papist. It is quite certain that for a number of years he has protected Christians to the extent of his power, and that he has shown them all possible favour since his accession to the throne. He even addressed a letter to Mr. Le Brun, in which he stated his desire to place himself in early and friendly relationship with English Protestant missionaries and artisans, to whom he promised protection and encouragement. That letter is dated July 31, 1861, and, in accordance with it, Mr. Le Brun at once proceeded to Madagascar. Not only so, some of the Malagassee Christians wrote to Mr. Ellis, of the London Missionary Society, a letter, in which they say that Radama II. said to them: "Write to our friends in London, and say that Radama II. reigns, and say that whosoever wishes to come up can come." They add: "Bring all the Bibles and tracts with you, for we long to see your face, if it be the will of God!" Knowing the facts of the case, Mr. Ellis had set out for Madagascar before this letter arrived. Finally, the adoption of Christianity by Radama is called his conversion by Mr. Ellis, who refers the event to about 1844. That he wishes himself to be regarded as a Christian and a Protestant seems to follow, not only from his invitation to Mr. Le Brun, but from the fact that that gentleman has been called to officiate in a chapel of the palace at the capital. Our authority is a letter from Tamatave, dated Nov. 13, and the exact words are: "Mr. Le Brun had arrived at Antananarivo in good health, and was superintending the school. He had also a private chapel inside the palace for the King, and a public one outside for the population." If he continues faithful to his present principles, the example and influence of the King will, by the Divine blessing, tend powerfully to promote the interests of Evangelical religion. He has tested the hollowness of Popish pretensions, and, therefore, while he may give freedom to all, his heart will be with the Protestants.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE EMBASSY FROM THE MAURITIUS.

The chief officer of the embassy, in his official report, gives a pleasing account of the mission, and important details respecting Madagascar and its resources. All these we must omit; but there are one or two sentences which we must copy. "The King," says the writer, "constantly impressed upon us his aversion to shedding blood, and declared that he would not do so." "It was imagined that Christianity had been entirely suppressed, but now Christians are to be found in all parts of the capital; and already a school has been established under the special patronage of the King, and, for the short time it has been in existence, appears wonderfully prosperous. The want of books is severely felt, their possession having been forbidden during the late Queen's reign. The few copies of the Bible that are to be found are nearly useless, having been for a long time concealed underground. By command of his Majesty, and out of special compliment to the embassy, the schoolmaster and the children attending the school were dressed in European clothes." "Nearly all the arts with which the people are acquainted were taught them by the missionaries." To this he ascribes the universal joy with which the visit of the English was greeted. "It was most satisfactory to see the state of things at Antananarivo, especially when we reflected that only six short months before scenes of cruelty and tyranny had been enacted which are difficult of belief. The Christian persecution had gone on with little intermission up to the time of the late Queen's death; and parties of Christians who had been for many years in chains were released at King Radama's accession." The preceding statements fully justify us in saying, with Radama himself, that he has been "raised by God" to his high station. We may add that when his Majest announced his intention to erect a school-house, with a native superintendent (letter of July 31, 1861), he said that while many of the natives had contributed towards its construction, he should receive with joy any subscription that might be made for it on our side of the water. "It is," he said, "my greatest wish that knowledge, commerce, and agriculture may flourish in Madagascar, for she is a land highly favoured of God—a land flowing with milk and honey."

Any remarks upon the preceding will be unnecessary. But with our gratitude for what God has done for that recently unhappy land, it is our duty to pray for its spiritual and temporal welfare, and to provide abundantly the means of grace—the living Word, and its living teachers.

LETTER FROM THE NATIVE CHRISTIANS.

The directors of the London Missionary Society state, in the January number of their magazine, that they are now fully assured that God has opened a wide and effectual door, and are most deeply anxious that messengers from the churches should be found ready to enter in and broadcast the field with the good seed of the kingdom, before the enemy, who is eagerly waiting for the opportunity, can scatter tares. Two well-qualified agents have already offered themselves for this great service, but six at least will be required for its commencement. The letter from the native Christians, referred to above, is as follows:—

Antananarivo, September 11, 1861.

To Rev. Wm. Ellis.

We have received the letter that you wrote in the month of June, 1861, which came from London, and we rejoice at the exhortation you gave for our continuance in Jesus Christ, and your remembrance of us in your prayers to God; and that the brethren and sisters with you ceased not to intreat God on behalf of the brethren and sisters with us.

And now God has heard the prayers which we have offered to Him, and Madagascar is wide open for the Word of God; those that were in bonds are now all released from their chains, and are come to Antananarivo. The pilgrims that were in hiding-places are now to be seen; and these are now new things with us.

On Friday, the 23rd of August,* Ranavalona, the Queen, died, and Rakotond Radama was raised to be the King of Madagascar—on the 23rd of August, 1861, he, Radama II., was raised to be the King.

But there was nearly a contention about it, for Prince Ramboasalama hired many people to set him upon the throne, and there was nearly a struggle at Antananarivo among the people. But God overturned their foolish plans to nothing, and the officers, and the judges, and the leaders of the people were banished by the King, and sent away as exiles. Prince Ramboasalama was also banished from Antananarivo, and those people that were chained and banished were those people that were strong in persecuting, and did not like the Christians. And now we thank God for subduing the enemy.

When the people heard it proclaimed that Radama II. reigned, all the people, both great and small, rejoiced exceedingly; and the Commander-in-Chief, Rainiharo's son and his family, and some of the officers and Christians, did all to cause Radama II. to reign. But all these people had not power enough to do that, for it was God who sought to do good for Madagascar, and gave strength to these people to cause Radama II. to reign.

And on Thursday, the 29th August, 1861, we that were in concealment appeared; Rainivao, Ramiandry, Rainiketaka, Razaka, Rabodo, and Andrianbahiny; then all the people were astonished when they saw us that we were alive, and not yet buried or eaten by the dogs, and there were a great many of the people desiring to see us, for they considered us as dead—and this is what astonished them. On the 9th of September those that were in fetters came to Antananarivo, but they could not walk, on account of the weight of their heavy fetters and their weak and feeble bodies.

And this we tell you our beloved friend, that whosoever of our brethren or sisters that wish to come up to Antananarivo, there is no obstacle in the way—all is free, for Radama II. said to us: "Write to our friends in London, and say that Radama II. reigns, and say that whosoever wishes to come up can come." And bring all the Bibles and tracts with you, for we long to see your face, if it be the will of God. We are much in want of medicine; for many are sick and feeble among the Christians, and we long for you to come up to Antananarivo. And we visit you, and we visit your wife, and we visit your children, and all the brethren and sisters in the faith; until we meet may God bless you, saith

RAINIVAO, RAZAKATOSA, RAMIANDRY, RAZAKA, RAINITAHINA, RATSILANGET.
RABE,

And all the brethren and sisters salute you.

* The Queen appears to have died before; this was the date of the official announcement of the fact.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

In accordance with the notice contained in our last number, meetings were held in various parts of the country throughout the second week in January, for united supplication and thanksgiving upon the subjects previously specified, which were also to form the themes for devotional exercises throughout the world during the same period. The central meetings, held twice daily at Freemasons' Hall, for which arrangements had been made by the Council of the Evangelical Alliance, were numerously attended, and deeply interesting. United meetings were also held at Islington, Chelsea, Camden-town, Kentish-town, &c., and in various parts of the provinces. The following is a summary of the

MEETINGS AT FREEMASONS' HALL.

MONDAY, JAN. 6.—Subject: Humiliation and Confession of Sin. As individuals, as families, as Churches, and as a nation. Thanksgiving and praise for recent religious awakenings. Morning: Chairman, Sir Culling E. Eardley, Bart. The plan adopted at each meeting was to announce a text as a motto. That for the first day was Mal. iii. 16, 17—“And they that feared the Lord spake often one to another,” &c. The reading of this passage was followed by an interval for silent prayer, for the Holy Spirit's presence during the meeting. Prayer was then offered successively by the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel and the Rev. J. Fisher, Presbyterian. The address on the subject of the day was delivered by the Rev. Edward Auriol, Rector of St. Dunstan's, Fleet-street. Psalm li. was read by the Rev. P. Latrobe, Moravian. This was followed by a pause for silent prayer, “For the bereaved and afflicted, especially the Queen and the Prince of Wales, and also for the imprisoned Spanish Protestants.” Prayer was successively offered by General Alexander, Rev. Robert Robinson, and Rev. E. H. Bickersteth, of Christ Church, Hampstead, the last-named closing with the Lord's-prayer and blessing. Hymns were sung at intervals during the devotional exercises. — Evening: Chairman, the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, M.P. Mal. iii. 16, 17 was read, and followed by silent prayer. The devotional exercises were then led by the Rev. Mr. Birch and Mr. Robert Baxter. The addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. Edmond, of the United Presbyterian Church, Islington. Rev. iii. was then read, and prayer was successively offered by the Rev. H. J.

Lumsden and Mr. Hawk, after which the Doxology was sung, and the Rev. S. Minton gave the Benediction.

TUESDAY, JAN. 7.—Home Objects for Prayer: The conversion of the ungodly—the cessation of intemperance and all immorality—and the spread of vital religion; in our families and households—among our rulers—the rich and the poor—our soldiers and sailors—the authors of our literature, secular and religious. (Motto, 1 John v. 14, 15.) Morning: Chairman (in the absence of Captain Trotter from illness), Captain Fishbourne, C.B. Prayer was offered by the Rev. J. A. Jetter, missionary of the Church Missionary Society, and the address was delivered by the Rev. J. Rattenbury, President of the Wesleyan Conference. Romans xii. having next been read, prayer was offered by the Rev. W. Brock, Baptist minister. There was next an interval for silent prayer, “For our unconverted relatives, that they may be led to confess Christ before the world.” The concluding prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. Weir, Secretary of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel amongst the Jews, and the Benediction was pronounced by the Rev. G. Albert Rogers, incumbent of St. Luke's, Holloway. — Evening: Chairman, Dr. Forbes Winslow. The address was delivered by the Rev. A. C. Price, minister of the Lock Chapel. He spoke on the efficacy of prayer, adducing Scripture examples, and dwelling especially on the deliverance of Peter from prison in answer to the persevering intercession of the Church. Among those who successively led the devotional exercises were the Rev. R. W. Dibdin, minister of the Episcopal Chapel, West-street; Mr. Thomas Chambers, the Common Serjeant; the Rev. J. E. Ford, missionary to Sidon; and the Rev. W. L. Thornton, Wesleyan. There were intervals for silent prayer, one being specially set apart for the remembrance of any persons suffering from spiritual depression or peculiar temptation; and another for the Divine blessing on the meeting of 300 or 400 clergymen held during the week in Islington. The Chairman read 2 Tim. iv. 1—8. The proceedings closed with the Benediction and Doxology.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 8.—Foreign Objects for Prayer: The revival of pure Christianity and the extension of religious liberty in Europe and the lands of the East—the overthrow of every form of antichristian error—the conversion of the house of Israel—the prevalence of peace among all nations, especially in America—and a yet more abundant blessing upon our brethren and sisters engaged in the work of missions, Christian education, and literature in foreign lands. (Motto, Mark ii. 5.) Morning: Chairman, the Hon. Captain Maude, R.N. The address was delivered by the Rev. W. Pennefather, incumbent of Christ Church, Barnet. The Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel read portions of the Epistle to the Ephesians. Among those who engaged in prayer were the Rev. Edward Auriol, Rector of St. Dunstan's, Fleet-street, General Clarke, Rev. F. Tucker, and Rev. C. Hargrave. The Rev. F. Tucker closed the meeting with the Benediction.—Evening: Chairman, Mr. J. Finch. The Rev. C. Stanford delivered the address. Prayer was successively offered by the Rev. J. W. Richardson, Rev. Samuel Minton, Rev. W. Bevan, Mr. Williams, and the Rev. James Davies.

THURSDAY, JAN. 9.—Subject: The Church of God and the Christian Ministry: the increased spirituality of the Church, and its more decided separation from the world—brotherly love, sympathy, and union of labour among the Lord's people—a higher standard of piety and power among Christian ministers and all their fellow-labourers—the outpouring of the Spirit upon our universities and colleges, and on the rising ministry at large—the conversion of the young, and a large blessing upon Sunday and other schools. (Motto, Heb. x. 19—22.) Morning: Chairman, Mr. P. F. O'Malley, Q.C. The address was delivered by the Rev. Newman Hall, of Surrey Chapel. The successive prayers were led by Major Straith, one of the secretaries of the Church Missionary Society, the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel, the Rev. W. Walsh, and General Alexander. The Rev. S. Minton read John xvii. In the course of the proceedings thankful allusion was frequently made to the intelligence of war with America having been averted. The Rev. S. Minton pronounced the concluding benediction. Although the weather was very unfavourable in the morning, there was a large attendance.—Evening: Chairman, Mr. J. Corderoy. The Rev. Claremont Skrine delivered the address. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Charles Jackson, Lord Radstock, and Mr. Corderoy. The Rev. J. Davis pronounced the Benediction.

FRIDAY, JAN. 10.—Subject: The Word of God: that it may be received with increased faith, reverence, and love—that its assailants may be enlightened and brought into the way of truth—that the power of the Divine Spirit may attend its private study and its circulation throughout the world. The motto for the day was Psalm cxxiii. 1, 2. Morning: Chairman, Lord Radstock. The address was delivered by the Rev. Capel Molyneux. Among those who offered prayer were the Revs. J. S. Jenkinson, S. B. Bergne, and S. Minton. The Rev. C. Jackson, Secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, read John vi. 53—55.

—Evening: Chairman, General Alexander. The Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel delivered an argumentative and practical address on the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures. Prayer was offered by the Rev. R. W. Dibdin, Dr. Forbes Winslow, the Chairman, and others.

SATURDAY, JAN. 11.—Subject: The Lord's-day: that its Divine institution may be recognised, and its desecration at home and abroad may cease. (Motto, Rom. xii. 12.) Morning: Chairman, Mr. Joseph Tritton. The address was given by the Rev. John Graham, and prayer was successively offered by the Revs. W. Cardall, G. J. Duncan, P. Latrobe, R. W. Dibdin, and H. Stevens. There was an interval for silent prayer, specially in reference to London and Sabbath observance. In the course of the proceedings, the Rev. S. Minton said it had been arranged by several Christian mothers to offer special prayer for the Queen and Royal Family every Saturday night as near as possible to the hour at which the late Prince Consort died. He invited the concurrence of Christian mothers generally in this concert for prayer.—Evening: Chairman, Mr. Robert Baxter. The Rev. William Arthur delivered the address, and the Rev. E. Auriol, Mr. Wilbraham Taylor, and others, engaged in prayer.

The meetings were continued with unabated interest till the close of the week. Persons of all classes were observed among the attendants: members of noble families, clergymen and gentlemen, and humble working men and women. The proceedings were marked by much solemnity, to which the plan of setting apart occasional intervals for silent supplication for the presence of the Holy Spirit, for unconverted relatives, and others, seemed to add considerably.

UNITED COMMUNION.

The meetings in Freemasons' Hall were followed by an United Communion. But it was not arranged by the Alliance Committee which organised the meetings for prayer. A correspondent of the Record writes:—

On Sunday afternoon an Open Communion was held in Freemasons' Hall. The room was completely full, and a very devout feeling seemed to pervade the whole assembly. The Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel presided; and addresses were delivered by the Rev. W. Arthur and Rev. W. Brook. The Rev. W. Chalmers and Rev. S. Minton conducted the devotional part of the service; and the Rev. J. P. Dobson concluded by reading the post-communion prayers from the English Liturgy. The bread and wine were distributed, as before, by laymen. Among the communicants were the Hon. and Rev. Leland Noel, the Rev. — Gough, Church of England missionary from China, Rev. W. Bunting, Hon. A. Kinnaird, General Alexander, Dr. Forbes Winslow, Messrs. W. Taylor, R. Baxter, J. Sheppard, S. Kirby, and J. Ranyard.

FOREIGN.

SPANISH PROTESTANTS SENTENCED TO THE GALLEYS.—The painful intelligence has been received from Spain that Matamoros and Alhama have been sentenced to seven years' penal servitude in the galleys, and Trigo to four years of the same punishment. It is stated that there will be an appeal from the sentence, but it is feared it will be in vain. "They had been previously tried and acquitted of alleged political offences, so that the present sentences are solely for reading the Word of God." It is to the influence at Court of "Sister Patrocinio" that public opinion attributes the passing of this iniquitous sentence.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN FRANCE.—These meetings have been held every evening, and the subjects previously indicated occupied the chief place in the prayers of each day. The numbers present were as great as could be hoped for, considering the season, and the great distances to be gone over in a city like Paris. A thoughtful demeanour, religious life, and a true spirit of devotion, were everywhere apparent. From the 5th to the 12th of January daily meetings for prayer were held at Havre, Courbevoie, Nismes, St. Jean du Gard, &c.—Archives du Christianisme.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER AT GENEVA.—Devotional meetings were held during the week of prayer in the city of Geneva and in the rural parishes of the canton. We have not been furnished with details, but we learn that there was the same large attendance as on similar occasions in the two preceding years, and that the various services were productive of real edification. The addresses were characterised by earnestness of appeal, and the prayers by fervency of spirit.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER AT TURIN.—According to arrangements in harmony with those adopted in this country, the week of prayer was observed at Turin. Meetings were held every evening at eight, near the Waldensian Chapel.

REVIVAL MEETINGS IN PARIS.—Mr. Reginald Radcliffe is at Paris for a short time. A first public meeting took place in the chapel of the Evangelical Reformed Church, Rue Chabrol, on the 18th of January. Mr. Radcliffe is to visit other localities, where his presence is desired.

RESULTS OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE ON THE GENEVESE.—A correspondent of La Croix speaks of the beneficial effects upon the Christians of Geneva of the Alliance Conference held in that city. He mentions, as one result, the formation of the Society for the Observance of the Lord's-day referred to in our last number, and adds: "The other result which I wish to mention to you is the organization, the multiplication of the means already employed to awaken the Church, and to add to its membership, independently of the meetings for prayer which previously existed in various places, and the formation of a committee of members of the Alliance and others, clergy and laymen, who continue to meet, on the Monday, in the Salle de la Rive Droite, with numerous audiences, of a very varied character."

ALLIANCE CONFERENCE AT GENEVA.—M. D. Tissot has published the first portions of the French record of the Conferences, under the title, "Conférences de Genève, 1861. Rapports et Discours Publiés au Nom du Comité de l'Alliance Evangelique." The whole will form two vols. 8vo, and subscribers will receive it for eight francs.

SICILIAN PRIESTS IRRITATING THE POPULACE AGAINST A PROTESTANT MINISTER.—M. Appia has laboured earnestly at Palermo, for some time past, much to the annoyance of the priests, who have sought to stir up the ignorant populace against him. A few weeks back some of the priests came to his service, and upon a signal given their agents threw the place into confusion, shouting for the Virgin and "Down with the Protestants!" M. Appia was threatened and in danger, but was providentially protected by the courage of his friends. It appears that the priests had falsely represented that the Protestant minister was a friend of the Bourbons!

BIBLE BURNING AND ATTACK UPON A COLPORTEUR IN SICILY.—A colporteur at Girgenti has had rough treatment, thanks to the priests. He no sooner appeared in the place than hostility commenced, and it was suggested that he should be punished and his books burned. One priest bought a portion of his stock, probably to destroy it. Another took a more economical mode; with a crucifix in his hand, and at the head of a crowd of school-boys and rabble, he stalked through the streets shouting, "Let us burn the Protestant books! Death to the Protestants!" A bonfire was made in one of the squares, and in it a number of Diodati's Bibles, and other religious books, were reduced to ashes. The poor colporteur made his escape, or he might have suffered too. The authorities have taken up this matter in a commendable spirit, and the consequence is that the furious priest and one of his lay friends and fellow-fanatics have been committed to prison.

ADVANCE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN AUSTRIA.—By the recent intelligence from Austria we learn that religious liberty has been greatly advanced by the abolition of the ordinance of 1842, which requires that, in the case of mixed marriages, a pledge shall previously be taken to bring up the children in the Catholic faith. It has been calculated that, in Vienna alone, since 1842, 18,000 children have thus been compelled to embrace the Romish religion in opposition to the wishes of the father.

MONUMENT TO LUTHER.—A new statue has been raised to Luther at Mora, near the very house where his parents resided when he was born, Nov. 11, 1483. This statue, which is of bronze, is nine feet high, and stands upon a pedestal of ten feet. Clothed in a long robe, bareheaded, and with extended hand, Luther holds a Bible, open at the words, "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." The front of the pedestal bears the inscription, "To our Luther." The bas-reliefs represent the man of God affixing the ninety-five theses to the door of the church at Wittenburg; taken prisoner at Altenstein; and translating the Bible at the Wartburg. This work of art (by the sculptor Miller) has cost 14,000 florins, nearly the whole of which sum has already been subscribed by the Protestant princes of Germany, by private individuals, and even by some Catholics.

PRESENTATION OF A TESTIMONIAL TO THE BRITISH CONSULAR CHAPLAIN AT AMSTERDAM.—We have received an account of this presentation, quoted from the Amsterdam Herald of Jan. 10, and bearing the signature of the Rev. C. Schwartz. The writer says: "When the present British chaplain came to Amsterdam he stood almost alone in the clear enunciation of the truth as it is in Jesus, and many who could find at that time no true nutriment for their souls sought counsel and guidance in the 'little sanctuary' of the English Church. Many a soul has there found the Lord. Mr. Jamieson has not only ministered the Word of Life with regularity to his own flock, but also since 1852 at Utrecht, and indeed wherever his countrymen were gathered together in such great undertakings as the drying of the Lake of Haarlem, &c.; and many of his friends, as well as the members of his own Episcopal congregation, were specially anxious to give him some token of their gratitude and regard, and therefore readily responded to an invitation to present him with a precious copy of the Scriptures, 'in commemoration of a quarter of a century's ministry in Holland; as a mark of personal esteem, and in recognition of his uniform kindness, faithfulness, and indefatigable exertions in the spreading of the sacred Word of Life." The writer says that, so far as he can learn, there has been only one precedent in the past history of the Church of England settlement in Amsterdam for such an event, and that occurred in the reign of William III., Prince of Orange and King of Great Britain. The proceedings on occasion of Mr. Jamieson's presentation were conducted partly in English and partly in Dutch. They are described as having been of a simple and touching character.

MISSIONARY WORK IN JAMAICA.—A missionary writes us under date of Bethany, Jamaica, December 17, as follows: "I beg to acknowledge the receipt of the November number of Evangelical Christendom, and thank you for the same. I have perused several articles with pleasure and edification, and shall return to the rest when time allows—no doubt, to find something instructive. . . . Our work in Jamaica goes steadily onward. Most churches are well attended, and believers are added to them, who give evidence of being united to Christ, having been called by the Holy Spirit. It is delightful to witness the altered conduct of those who have been savingly converted. That wild and vacant stare which they formerly had has been subdued, and the countenance becomes lighted up with a very different expression. The fruits of the Spirit manifest themselves in many a heart that formerly was a den of uncleanness. We have had a gracious awakening; but I do not mean to say that there are not many still without who are dead to Christ, and fearfully alive to sin. The great obstacles in the way in Jamaica are superstition and sensuality. The grosser forms of these are still very prevalent, though undoubtedly there is a great improvement. Though one should rise from the dead, we are assured that some would not believe; so in the most extensive awakening that has yet taken place, the fatal sleep of death is slept by not a few. This is what we observe around us. We shall still, however, go on in the Lord's name, praying and labouring, that these sinners may be converted unto Him."

THE DECEASE OF DR. BRIDGMAN, THE OLDEST MISSIONARY in China, is, we regret to see, announced. He was sent out from America, and began his labours in 1830, when Dr. Morrison was the only other Protestant missionary in China. He died at the age of sixty.

REMARKABLE SCENES AT AHMEDNUGGER.—The Bombay Guardian gives details of some remarkable scenes at Ahmednugger, in connexion with American missions. At the anniversary meeting, referring to the necessities of the mission, a native pastor said that the time for action had come; and, taking out his purse, emptied its contents on the table. Soon one member of the Church arose, and said he would give a rupee. Another and another brought forward their offerings and cast them on the table. Others, who had not come prepared for such a scene, gave pledges for amounts varying from two annas to over fifty rupees. One poor blind woman came feeling her way to the table, and laid a rupee on it. Many gave or pledged gold and silver rings, bangles, and other species of ornaments common among the natives. Animals also were given—a horse, a pair of goats, half the price of a buffalo, a cow, a pair of hens, a duck, eggs, a turban, a book, a month's wages, half a month's wages, three months' wages. Thus it went on for an hour. Passages of Scripture were read at intervals, accompanied with remarks and singing. The next morning the congregation came together again. The scene of the previous day was repeated with increasing interest. Many of those who had given doubled their gifts. A great part of the congregation were in tears, and some could hardly restrain themselves from crying aloud.

Literature.

MR. YOUNG'S NEW TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments, literally and idiomatically translated out of the Original Languages. By ROBERT YOUNG, author of several works in Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, Syriac, Greek, Latin, Gujarati, &c. (See page vi.) Edinburgh and London: A. Fullarton and Co. 1862. [To be completed in Twenty Parts. No. I. containing Gen. i.—xliv. 19.]

Translation of the Book of Job. By the same Author.

WE have had occasion before to introduce our readers to Mr. Robert Young, of Edinburgh. In the course of last year we reviewed his translation of the Song of Solomon, and noticed several glaring mistakes in which that translation abounded. Our review, though written in a kindly spirit (for we were not at that time so fully acquainted with the Oriental scholarship of Mr. Young as we are now), drew forth an angry reply, which we also noticed as fully as its tone and scholarship deserved.

There are now lying before us two additional specimens of Mr. Young's powers of translation, which we deem it a duty to notice, but which we shall notice at no great length. The title-page of the first of the two we have given in full, and it refers to page vi. of the cover for a complete catalogue of Mr. Young's publications. These, at first sight, appear most extensive, amounting in number to three-and-thirty; but if we subtract from them mere specimens and portions of works, the list can be somewhat reduced. Notwithstanding, they are very numerous indeed. Nearly, however, nine-tenths are of no value whatever, for we may remark of them and him—

Ad populum phalaras. Ego te intus et in cute novi.

For instance, Mr. Young, no doubt at a great expenditure of time and trouble, has translated the Shorter Catechism of the Westminster divines into Chaldee, Syriac, Chaldee-Samaritan—which, in plain words, is almost Chaldee transliterated into Samaritan characters—and has also translated it into Hebrew-Samaritan, as well as into Hebrew; Hebrew-Samaritan, it being borne in mind, being nothing else than simply Hebrew “done into” Samaritan letters.

Again: Somewhere or other Mr. Young got hold of a song of a Finlandian countrygirl in Finnish, which he considered of such intense interest, that at once he set to work and translated it likewise, to the great marvel of the vulgar, into Hebrew, Hebrew-Samaritan, Chaldee-Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, and English, which valuable pamphlet is advertised at the small price of twelve pence, but which we have sought for in vain in London.

Now, be it remembered that Chaldee, Syriac, and Samaritan, whatever may be said of Hebrew, are dead languages, and have not been spoken for some hundreds of years (for a book in ancient Syriac is unintelligible to one speaking the modern Syriac, without special training), and then we can arrive at a just estimation of the value of these linguistic labours of Mr. Young. So much for their value. As for the correctness of these works, we can say nothing, not having ever seen them; nor would they be worth examination if we had them on our shelves, where we confess we have some useful books of Mr. Young.

The yellow wrapper in which Mr. Young's first part of his work is enveloped is of special interest to us, for it contains information of a varied nature. We have here set forth nineteen “opinions as to the scholarship of Mr. Young.” They are striking exhibitions of the way in which some men give testimonials as to matters of which they know little.

Thus Dr. Candlish tells us that as to Oriental acquirements, he supposes that “Mr. Young is almost, if not altogether, unrivalled.” Dr. Eadie avers that he has “looked into the most of his publications, and has no hesitation in saying that they display a great amount of accurate Hebrew philology.” Dr. Goold, the learned and accomplished editor of “The Works of John Owen, D.D.,” says that Mr. Young's “mind is cautious and well-balanced, quite above any hunt for popularity by means of startling and novel theories.” Dr. R. Lee, of Edinburgh, a scholar of no mean standing, states that he inclines to think that Mr. Young, “as a Biblical Orientalist and philologer, has very few equals, if any, in this country.” Rev. A. R. Bonar, while asserting that “Mr. Robert Young has long been known in the world of letters as perhaps the greatest Hebrew and Oriental scholar of our time,” judiciously closes his testimonial by saying that Mr. Young's revised translation “will afford the best proof of the matured result of his investigations.”

But the testimony of some of the Hebrew professors is more startling, as few know how much Oriental knowledge is possessed by some of the above really valued preachers and divines. Of the testimonials from Hebrew professors we would notice two—namely, those from the Rev. A. McCaul, D.D., Professor in King's College, London, and Rev. D. Liston, Professor in the University of Edinburgh—because the testimonials given by Professor Weir, of Glasgow, Professor Murphy, of Belfast, and the late Rev. Professor Lee, D.D., of Cambridge, are not objectionable, inasmuch as they commend only special publications of Mr. Young, and state that he has long been “an earnest and successful student of the Shemitic languages.”

But Dr. McCaul says of Mr. Young: "I know of no one more eminently qualified for a chair of Hebrew and Oriental languages," and asserts that his knowledge of Hebrew and of the cognate dialects is "extraordinary." Professor Liston similarly testifies that "his acquaintance with the Semitic dialects is indeed quite extraordinary; very few, I believe, have achieved such a command over and power of composing in them. But the best evidence of Mr. Young's accomplishments in this way is to be found in his published works."

And so it is; we thought well ourselves of Mr. Young, though we considered him too much on the "hunt for popularity" until we perused his Song of Solomon, his Book of Job, and now his Genesis. It is really painful to write thus, but we must say we have never read greater caricatures of the Holy Word of God; and it is because we believe that many will be misled by his renderings—the more so on account of the high testimonials he has obtained—that we think it worth while, and even a duty, to enter our protest against such translations.

Before we give a few specimens, we must add here Mr. Young's own opinion of his work; it is set forth in full on his cover—viz.: "One of the first things which is likely to attract the attention of the Readers of this New Translation, is its lively, picturesque, dramatic style, by which the inimitable beauty of the original text is more vividly brought out than by any previous translation."

This is so remarkably like the style of the advertisements which appear so frequently in the newspapers of "Harper Twelvetees' Soap Powder" and of "Holloway's Pills," that we forbear to make any further remark on it, except to note that Dr. Goold has been mistaken when he states that Mr. Young's "character is remarkable" for "the modesty of the genuine scholar."

A few specimens of his translation will be quite sufficient to evidence its "lively, picturesque, and dramatic style:—"

Gen. ii. 23: And the man saith, "This is the step! bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh; on this account it is called Woman, for from man this one hath been taken."

Gen. xi. 8: And they say each unto his neighbour, "Give help, let us make bricks," &c.; v. 4: "Give help, let us build," &c.; v. 6 and 7: And the Lord saith . . . "Give help, let us go down," &c.

Gen. xiii. 12: And Lot hath dwelt in the cities of the circuit, and tenteth unto Sodom; v. 18: And Abram tenteth, and cometh and dwelleth among the oaks of Mamre, &c.

Gen. xv. 8: Abram also saith, "Lo, to me Thou hast not given seed, and lo, a domestic doth heir me;" v. 4: And lo, the Word of the Lord is with him, saying, "This one doth not heir thee, but he who cometh out from thy loins, he doth heir thee."

Gen. xvi. 13, of Hagar: And she calleth the name of the Lord, who speaketh unto her, "Thou, O God, art my beholder;" for she hath said, "Even here have I looked behind my beholder?" [What is the meaning of this?]

Gen. xxi. 1: And the Lord hath inspected Sarah as He hath said, and the Lord doth to Sarah as He hath spoken.

Gen. xxxvii. 10, of Joseph: And he recounteth it unto his father, and unto his brethren and his father pusheth against him, and saith to him, &c.

Job ix. 27, 28:—

Though I say, "I forget my talking, I forsake my corner,
And I brighten up?"

I have been afraid of all my griefs;
I have known that thou dost not acquit me!"

Job xv. 23, 24:—

He wandereth for bread—"Where is it?"
He hath known that ready at his hand is a day of darkness!

Adversity and distress terrify him—

They prevail over him as a king ready for the boaster !

Job. xviii. 15 :—

Drawn away from his tent is his confidence—

And that causeth him to step to the king of terrors !

That dwelleth in his tent—out of his provender ;

Scattered over his habitation is sulphur !

Job xxx. 22—24 :—

Thou liftest me up, on the wind thou causest me to ride,

And meltest me—levellest me !

For I have known that to death thou bringest me,

And to the meeting-house for all living !

Surely against the heap he sendeth not out the hand,

Though in its ruin they have safety !

These are a few samples of a translation which its author dreams may supersede our fine old English version, which, though not faultless, is incomparably superior to all its would-be rivals.

As to the renderings in the above passages, we shall not now disprove them. They are all erroneous. We have previously gone into some details in our remarks on Solomon's Song, to which we would refer our readers. We pass by the critical examination of the above renderings the more readily because Mr. Young's translation of Job has been attacked in the Journal of Sacred Literature, and we fancy the gentlemen who have given Mr. Young the above testimonials will be heartily ashamed of Mr. Young's version.

A word in conclusion. At the end of this first number Mr. Young has given a few specimen leaves of a "Pocket Commentary," which is to accompany his "New Translation." The specimen extends to ch. iii. 21, and yet no defence of the queer and absurd rendering of ch. ii. 23 is attempted. We notice, however, that Mr. Young would render Gen. i. 1 : "In the beginning of God's framing the heavens and the earth ;" on which he remarks that "the ancient Jewish commentator, Rashi, as well as the modern German critics, Bunsen, Ewald, &c., have decided in favour of reading the Hebrew word as a noun (framing) instead of a verb (framed)." We have not looked into Bunsen, but we have into Ewald, and we find that he has not so understood the passage. He considers the whole sentence as a genitive after the words "in the beginning," thus : "In the beginning, when God created the heavens and the earth . . . God said," &c. ; and no doubt Bunsen has done the same. Rashi would alter the verb from being in the perfect tense into the inf. const. As to Mr. Young's notion, that the verb בָּרָא does not convey the idea of creation, we simply remark, if it does not, no other Hebrew word does.

The Life and Times of George Lawson, D.D., Selkirk, Professor of Theology to the Associate Synod. With Glimpses of Scottish Character from 1720 to 1820. By the Rev. JOHN MACFARLANE, LL.D. Edinburgh : W. Oliphant and Co.

A VERY good book about a good man. Dr. Macfarlane has industriously collected his materials, and has arranged them in a manner which deserves all praise. Dr. Lawson was born in Peeblesshire, March 13, 1749, of parents who belonged to the Secession Church. The first chapter gives a pleasing account of his early years, interspersed with notices of men eminent in his early days. He obtained his preacher's licence when little more than twenty years of age, and forthwith entered upon his course as a probationer. As a preacher he proved acceptable ; the Secession Church at Selkirk unanimously called him to be their minister, and he was ordained in 1771. At that time, and indeed through life, he was a "Burgher," or of the tolerant party of his Church. In this chapter, also, Dr. Macfarlane often pauses to contemplate scenes and characters more or less connected with Dr. Lawson and his time. It seems that Lawson was not in haste to marry, and our author says: "It was conjectured that, unless he was prompted in the matter by some kind friend, he might remain a benedict all his days." (With us a benedict is a married man.) However, he did marry; but his wife died within a year of the event. He subsequently married again. Selkirk was for years the centre and scene of Lawson's ministrations, in which he was diligent and faithful, honoured and useful. In 1778 he found his way to London—the only time in his life; but he remained there six months. Of his home life and labours the record is much fuller than could have been expected, and along with it is much that gives us an insight into the time. Some of the anecdotes related are quite amusing, and show that Dr. Lawson was not without his share of odd ways, as when he buttoned up his umbrella under his coat to keep it dry, and when he carried away a student's hat instead of his own Hebrew Bible, or when he rode out on a journey, and let his horse turn round at half-way and bring him back. Others of these little stories are of a more serious and instructive character; but as the author desired to paint the man as he was, he has given us his weak points as well as his strong ones. He was appreciated and loved by those who knew him, and the circle of his acquaintance was by no means insignificant. As a student he was diligent, and as a scholar superior. Enough is told of him here to show that he was a thoughtful man, a reading man, and a proficient in learning; hence his appointment as professor, and his diploma. Possibly he belonged to the old school, but it is no disparagement of him to say this, for that old school turned out men every way equal to the wants of their times, and men who laid the foundations of recent methods of study. As professor, Lawson succeeded the well-remembered John Brown, of Haddington, who died in 1787. But it is impossible for us in this brief notice to follow him through all the labours of his industrious life. For this we must refer to Dr. Macfarlane's pleasant pages. Dr. Lawson's praises are still upon the lips of those who remember him, and of more who have heard of him. He occupies an important place in half-a-century's history of his own Church, not simply as a minister and professor, but also in part as a controversialist. In the course of his life many noble souls adorned the Church he belonged to, but there are few among them who interest us so much as himself. His death occurred in February, 1820. We close this volume with our best thanks to its able author for the excellent manner in which he has performed his task, and urging our readers to read the volume for themselves.

1. The Christian Treasury, 1861.—2. Gold from the Christian Treasury. Edinburgh: Johnstone, Hunter, and Co.

THE Christian Treasury long ago achieved a widespread reputation among the Christian population of Scotland. Although far from standing alone, or almost so, as it once did, it still occupies an honourable place among the cheap religious miscellanies. Articles full of sound divinity, interesting narratives, readings for the young, poetry, and prose pieces of varied character, make up the volume, to which able writers on both sides the Tweed, and of different communions, contribute. The "Gold from the Christian Treasury" is a cheap shilling's-worth from the periodical just noticed.

The Work of God in Italy. Detailing the Revival and Spread of Evangelical Truth in that Kingdom. By the Rev. W. OWEN. J. F. Shaw and Co.

Is the work of the Lord being done in Italy? Who are the workers? Where are they labouring? How may we best co-operate with them, or encourage their labours? These are the inquiries which Mr. Owen undertakes to answer with the aid of a practised pen, a clear head, and a heart full of sympathy with the great cause whose progress he narrates. In the execution of his task he first sketches in outline the history of the Reformation in Italy in the sixteenth century, and its violent suppression; and he then narrates the political changes in Italy, and shows their connexion with the measure of religious freedom now enjoyed there. The Waldenses and the Italian Free Churches are next brought, in succession, under the reader's notice. A very full account follows of the life and labours of Gavazzi. Interesting details are given of Bible distribution and colportage, of the creation and spread of the new religious literature, and of the educational movement. The whole concludes with some judicious remarks on the duty and means of helping the work. The materials of which the book is composed are derived very largely from periodical literature.

An acknowledgment in these cases, similar to that which the author has made in some others, of the specific sources of his information, might have served as a guide to readers who will not know where to look in order to satisfy the appetite for additional and newer facts which, we may hope, will be created by a wide circulation of Mr. Owen's volume. Such a circulation it certainly deserves; and in confirmation of our opinion, we may refer to that of our Florence correspondent, as given in his communication for the present month. A well-executed portrait of Gavazzi appears as a frontispiece.

The Family Treasury of Sabbath Reading. 1861. Thomas Nelson and Sons.

THE experience brought to bear in the conduct of this periodical is very apparent in the attractive character of its entire contents. The selections are judicious, and the original articles bear the names of some of the most eminent occupants of the Scottish pulpit. Reading for the members of families of mature age forms the staple of the work, but in not a number before us do the children appear to be forgotten. The perusal of the Family Treasury will benefit both old and young.

The Earnest Man: a Memoir of Adoniram Judson, D.D. By H. C. CONANT. Edited by JOSEPH ANGUS, D.D. J. Heaton and Son.

THIS volume forms one of a series called the "Bunyan Library," and intended to consist of select works by eminent authors of the Baptist denomination. Hence it is that in this cause the subject, the author, the editor, and the publisher, are all Baptists. The author has done his work very well, and the editor has prefixed an appropriate introduction; the publisher has brought out a very nice-looking book, and Dr. Judson has the honour of being the first, if not the greatest, of Protestant missionaries to Burmah. Dr. Judson was the son of a Congregational minister in Massachusetts, and was born Aug. 9, 1788. After his conversion, in 1808, he resolved to devote his life to the missionary work, and in 1811 came to England to consult with the London Missionary Society, by whom he was received; but on his return home was sent out under the auspices of the American Board. He entered on his work in 1812, and on his arrival in India adopted Baptist principles. The subsequent career of Dr. Judson was a chequered one, but he never swerved from his purpose to declare the Gospel to the heathen.

His labours in Burmah have won for him an imperishable name, and are here detailed in an interesting manner. He died at sea, on a voyage to the Isle of France (or Mauritius), April 12, 1850. Every page of his history justifies his claim to the title given him in this book—"The Earnest Man." He was earnest in his life and convictions as a Christian—earnest in his intellectual pursuits—and earnest in the ministry he filled. The record of his career has afforded us much instruction and encouragement, and we cordially recommend it to our readers.

The Week of Prayer. By Rev. R. OXLAD. Nisbet.

POETRY and prose are here combined. The principal part of the book is an introductory essay; and the latter portion a series of poetical pieces on topics appropriate for the "Week of Prayer." It will not be expected that we should do more than indicate the general character and contents of a small volume, evidently designed more for edification than for criticism. The introductory essay commences with observations upon the Week of Prayer; it glances at the subject of prayer in general, and at several features of modern Evangelical religion, viewed in connexion with the one event of the volume. These miscellaneous remarks are succeeded by a more formal discussion of three points, suggested, it would seem, by the "Essay and Review" controversy. The points are—1. The progress of science; 2. The extent of intellectual excitement; 3. The study of Biblical criticism. Under the first head we have brief indications of the progress of science, and its relation to religion. Under the second head we have various considerations based upon the intellectual activity of the age, similarly viewed in relation to religion. The third topic speaks for itself. The author, however, while he owns the importance of criticism, sees danger in the use now made of it by many. In the opinion of Mr. Oxlad there are three things against which we ought to watch and pray—viz., 1. A close examination of the authority of Scripture, with especial regard to its inspiration; 2. A philosophical inquiry into the nature of miraculous evidence; and 3. Speculation on the essential principles of revelation, as subjected to human opinion. There is much that we approve in this essay, but we think some of the points are pushed too far. Of the poems we will only say, they are written in an excellent spirit; and such is the character of the whole book.

The Unerring Guide; or, Youth Directed in the Journey of Life. By the Rev. JOHN SMITH, of Witheridge, Devon. Second edition, enlarged. W. J. Johnson, 83, Fleet-street.

THIS little volume is ushered into public notice by commendatory notices from two well-known ministers—the Rev. Dr. Campbell and the Rev. J. H. Wilson, Secretary of the Home Missionary Society. To the former it was offered for publication in a magazine, but he recommended separate publication—one ground of that advice being its intrinsic merit. “Starting with the idea of a momentous journey through a dangerous country,” says Dr. Campbell, describing the plan of the author, “he goes on to multiply figure upon figure, and to heap one illustration upon another, till he reaches the close, when his collected sections constitute a harmonious whole, full of truth, love, and wisdom.” This witness is true, but what has struck as much, in glancing over these pages, as even the “figure upon figure,” is the fact upon fact with which he illustrates his theme. Mr. Smith has not only read the Bible, but he has read human nature to the best possible purpose, and here gives the young the benefit of what he has thus acquired. It is such a book as an affectionate mother might with propriety place beside a pocket Bible for a youth, when he quits the paternal roof to start on “the journey of life.”

Tears Shed in Heaven, and how God shall Wipe them Away: a Word of Comfort for the Weeping Bearers of Precious Seed. By the Rev. THEODORE CHRISTLIEB, Ph. D. J. F. Shaw.

REVELATION vii. 17 furnishes a basis for the meditations in this little book, “God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.” Its author alludes to the sorrows which necessarily befall the Christian in this life, because he is not only exposed to trial, but more sensible than other men. The text suggests that they shall have special comforts, and that in the future their tears will all be wiped away. It is Dr. Christlieb’s opinion that tears will be shed in heaven till they are all wiped off by the Divine hand. He admits that they will not be literal tears, although the tears will be realities. The theory is sustained with some ingenuity, and yet we own that to us it seems a too human and earthly view of the Divine and celestial. We cannot discuss the question here, but we will say that Dr. Christlieb writes in a most excellent spirit.

The Great Conflict of the Age; or, Protestantism and Popery Contrasted in their Leading Doctrines: a Manual for the Million. J. F. Shaw.

AN anonymous book, dedicated to the Earl of Shaftesbury. The history of the great conflict, and a general view of the Romish system, are followed by a notice of some leading Romish authorities, and a contrast of some leading doctrines. The concluding chapters are as to how we should treat Romanists; an appeal to Protestants; and encouragements. The author is deeply alive to the false and insidious character of Popery, and he exposes effectually some of its errors and abuses. His explanations are generally clear and satisfactory; and his book may be useful to such as desire a brief and intelligible manual of this great controversy.

Toils and Triumphs; or, Missionary Work in the World’s Dark Places. By HARRIET WARNER ELLIS. Seeley.

MISS ELLIS’S little volume has two merits; it is trustworthy, and it is written in a simple and attractive style. It comprises eighteen chapters, none of which are very long, and most of them describing different spheres of labour. Beginning with Burmah, she takes us to New Zealand, thence to the countries of the North, and to America. From America she conveys us to Polynesia, the Fiji Islands, and to India. These chapters are followed by one on female labourers, after which we pass to Africa, China, and the conclusion. Doubtless the compilation of this work must have cost much patient labour; but it well deserves the illustrations and other attractive accessories by which it is accompanied. We believe it eminently fitted to inform the young and to stir up the missionary spirit in their hearts.

Black Bartholomew’s Day. How shall we Best Commemorate, on August 24, 1862, the Bicentenary of the Act of Uniformity? A Plea for Truth, Peace, and Love. By CHARLES GIRDLESTONE, M.A., Rector of King’s Winford, Staffordshire. W. J. Johnson, 121, Fleet street.

A SEASONABLE booklet, reprinted with additions from Evangelical Christendom, and breathing a spirit of candour and goodwill, which is more admirable than general in any section of the professing Church of the Prince of Peace and God of Love.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

OUR last number was published while we were still in all the agony of suspense on the question whether we were to have peace or war with America. We are heartily and deeply thankful to be now able to record that Almighty God, in whose hands are the issues of all events, has overruled the circumstances that were then so menacing in favour of peace. And to enhance the satisfaction of this event, peace has not been purchased at the cost of any principle, whether of honour or equity, on either side. England asked but for justice; her claim was ratified by the decisions of the whole civilised world; nay, the American statesmen who decided the case admitted that they had no ground on which to withhold our demands; and therefore the prisoners whom we claimed were cheerfully given up. And so the thundercloud which so recently blackened the whole sky has passed away, and the air is clear again. This is not the place to review the attitude and bearing of the two peoples or their Governments during the critical controversy, or to decide whether our Transatlantic kinsmen might not have been more prompt in acknowledgment of the wrong, or more courteous in their mode of affording redress. It is enough that they have made reparation, and that with it many other questions, which might otherwise have led to angry dispute, or even to war, have been practically settled, and that the relations between the two countries are clearer now than they have been for some time past. But while we would not enter into the political causes that have led to this gratifying result, no devout mind will refuse to connect this great deliverance from a national and world-wide calamity with the many and fervent prayers that were offered up, both in public and private, in England, and we trust also in America, that the threatening dispute might be composed, and that the scandal, the shame, and the sin of a war between the two great Protestant nations of the world might be averted.

The call to spend the first week of the New Year in united prayer, which emanated from the Evangelical Alliance, was largely responded to throughout the country. We believe there was no town, and scarcely a village, in the United Kingdom where the invitation was not more or less complied with. We learn from our correspondents that it was also observed in various towns in France and Italy, and we believe we may say wherever there was an Evangelical community throughout the world. In London, especially, the meetings were throughout numerous attended; and the services were appropriate and impressive in a high degree. The conviction that there is a God who hears and answers the cries of His people is becoming increasingly alive in the minds of the Churches; that is to say, not simply believed in as a doctrine, but felt as a real and vital fact. There is great encouragement in the present state of the Churches to persevere in their appeals—greater readiness on the part of God's people to respond to them—and, we may add, greater need on the part both of the Church and of the world that prayers and intercessions should be continued. There are indications, both at home and abroad, that the world is on the eve of a great crisis, which may, and we trust will, issue in a rebaptism of society with the vital influences of God's Holy Spirit. But for this, as for all other blessings, "God will be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them."

The whole question of the now notorious "Essays and Reviews" is before the Court of Arches, brought there by the prosecution of Dr. Williams by the Bishop of Salisbury, for his review of Bunsen's opinions on prophecy. The pleadings of counsel on both sides are finished; and the judge, Sir Stephen Lushington, has taken time to consider his judgment. The speeches of the lawyers on both sides lasted for several days, but their arguments may be compressed into a very narrow compass. On the part of Dr. Williams it was contended that if the Church of England was to be a National Church, then it must make room within its pale for all the theological opinions that might be held within the nation, and that there was nothing in the articles, rightly interpreted, that would narrow them down to a more sectarian view. This, with an attempt to prove by citations from the elder divines that the views of Dr. Williams were substantially held by many men whom the Church deemed orthodox, was all that was urged in his defence. On the other hand, the counsel for the prosecution urged that the Church, as an organised society, was bound to enforce its own laws and discipline, or it would have no claim to the character of a Church of Christ at all. Much depends on the issue of this important trial, which will probably be determined, however Sir Stephen Lushington may decide, by the Privy Council.

Most of our readers are aware that the Nonconformists in England have for some time had it in contemplation to celebrate this year as the 200th anniversary of the ejection of 2,000 ministers from the Church of England, soon after the Restoration. There has been some difference of opinion, however, as to the proper mode of the celebration. The Congregationalists—as the more numerous body of Nonconformists—resolved to act for and by themselves in the affair; and, after a good deal of friendly correspondence with the Baptists, who desired that the celebration should be a Dissenting, rather than a denominational one, they have finally resolved to abide by their original purpose. But it further appears the Independents are not altogether united among themselves. The great majority have resolved to celebrate the event by the raising of a fund to build a central hall in London, and some hundreds of Dissenting chapels in London and throughout the kingdom. A minority object to the pecuniary mode of celebrating the event altogether. All are agreed that it is desirable to have courses of lectures delivered, to enlighten the rising generation in the principles of Dissent—a hazardous operation, and very likely to be twisted into a means of stirring up still further the elements of strife among the Churches. Already 40,000*l.* has been subscribed towards the proposed objects.

The death of the late Bishop of Killaloe has been the cause of a series of appointments that have given great satisfaction to the Protestants of Ireland. The Right Rev. Dr. Fitzgerald, Bishop of Cork, has been transferred to the See of Killaloe; and the Venerable Archdeacon John Gregg has been appointed Bishop of Cork. In an interesting speech the newly-created prelate made at a meeting in Dublin, he stated that he had entered that city as a young man, without money or friends, and that no preferment he had received had ever been solicited by him. The right rev. gentleman appears to be an immense favourites with the Protestants of Dublin, and all sorts of episcopal reforms are anticipated within the diocese of Cork under his episcopate. The revenues of the bishopric are small, but the patronage is large, of which it is expected the poor hardworking curates in the diocese will reap the benefit.

A terrible accident has occurred in the North of England. A ponderous beam of an engine, weighing more than twenty tons, suddenly snapped, fell down the shaft of a coal-pit over which it was suspended, killed five out of eight men who were ascending the shaft, and buried alive 215 men and lads who were in the workings. A more fearful fate can hardly be imagined. We refer to it here, however, rather for the sake of recording an act of Christian heroism that has few parallels in our time. One of the survivors of the eight men was a miner, named Watson, a recent convert from infidelity, and since active in his zeal for Christ. The rush of the iron beam that proved fatal to so many of his companions left him well up the shaft, comparatively unhurt, and in a place of safety. But in that terrible hour, amidst the horror of the event, and the falling of masses of rubbish which were torn from the sides of the pit, Watson could distinguish the cries of his wounded comrades from below buried in the rubbish, and, in the intervals of their groans, calling to God for mercy. His resolution was at once taken. Quitting his place of safety, he grasped a wire that ran down the side of the shaft, and, by its aid, scrambled down by the side of the men, and there, exposed to the danger of the still falling stones, he calmly endeavoured to console his poor mutilated and dying companions, and joined with their last breath in commending them to God through Christ. It is pleasant to know that the Church has not lost its race of heroes, ready to do and bear all for the great love with which Christ hath loved them.

A highly-interesting religious service was held in the course of the past month by the members of the different Presbyterian bodies resident in London. For some time past there has been a tendency to union between the English Presbyterian and the United Presbyterian bodies. Between them there is no practical ground of separation; there is only what may be called the sentimental difference respecting the lawfulness of union between Church and State, which the one body absolutely denies on any condition, and the other would only agree to on conditions that it is certain the State would never grant. As a preliminary step towards a more intimate union, a communion service of the two bodies was held in Dr. Hamilton's Church, in Regent-square. The spacious edifice was completely filled, and the proceedings were conducted alternately by the ministers of the two bodies. It was a solemn and impressive service, and well fitted to be the foundation of a complete union between two bodies who, in all essential, and even accidental, circumstances have long been as one.

FOREIGN.

The contest between Church and State in France still continues, and the two parties come into collision in every conceivable form. It is true the Bishops no longer commit the gross indecency of publicly comparing the Emperor to Pontius Pilate; but the relations between the two parties have not improved. The Minister of Public Worship, M. Rouland, has had his attention called to the abduction of young girls by various monastic orders; and he has issued a circular, warning them that these practices must be discontinued, if the societies would preserve their own legal existence; on which the Bishop of Arras charges the Government with exalting the authority of the parent above that of God. The learned, but intemperate, divine appears to have forgotten that the authority of the parent over the child is expressly entrusted to him by God, which is rather more than can be said for the Church. Another cause of quarrel is the cold suspicion, resulting so often in exposure, with which the civil authorities look upon the pretended miracles of modern saints. On the other hand, we are glad to see that a warm and living evangelism is rapidly thawing the Rationalism which had paralysed so many of the Churches. There is much in the state of that interesting land which would lead Protestants to "thank God and take courage."

The letter of our German correspondent from Frankfort will be found of unusual interest this month. It relates to the appearance of a new sect (if we may call it so), which made its appearance some time ago in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, and is now rapidly rising into importance. The leader of the movement is a Gustavus Werner, and from him it derives its life and energy—to such a degree, indeed, that it may be doubted whether the organization will survive him. This remarkable man, whose simple faith and earnest love remind us in great measure of his countryman, Müller, who has wrought such marvels by his institutions at Bristol, was originally a pastor in the Established Church, and does not appear to have, formally at least, departed in any way from the doctrines of his old communion; but on these he has engrafted much mystic pietism, a tendency to Swedenborgianism, and a proneness to represent in the pulpit visions of the spiritual and unseen world. These extravagances have induced the Church authorities to expel him from their communion, much as the bishops of the English Church expelled John Wesley; and he has consequently been left free to develop his views untrammelled by any authority. His genius, however, lies in action rather than doctrine, for while we do not hear of any other innovation in teaching than that which arises out of the individual peculiarities of Werner himself, it is certain that he has gathered into a Christian community many of the outcasts of the population, has persuaded them to live in a state of society where all work, and none enjoy the fruits of their labour, the profits going into the general fund of the society. It is, in fact, an attempt to revive the first dream of the infant Church, that of having all things common. That dream, we know from the New Testament itself, was soon abandoned by the first Christians; it remains to be seen how much longer Mr. Werner will cling to it; but in the meantime, no one questions his piety, his zeal, or the simplicity of his dependence on God's promises.

The letter from our Italian correspondent is one of profound interest. There are some good Christians in this country who hold that the spread of Christ's kingdom has nothing to do with the progress of civil liberty, and that it is therefore wrong for Christian men to take any part in political movements. We do not remember to have anywhere met with a finer practical refutation of this opinion than the narrative contained in our correspondent's letter of what has lately been passing in the old Grand Duchy of Tuscany. In the first place, it is to be noticed that the unfinished and imperfect political amalgamation of the various provinces of united Italy leaves persecution still possible. The Gospel may be freely preached in

Piedmont, and wherever the Piedmontese code extends. But it happens that Tuscany had a better and more enlightened code, with one exception, than even Piedmont, and therefore the province has been left in possession of its old laws. The one exception to which we refer was the law for preaching or publishing against the Roman Catholic religion, and this law, enacted during the reactionary period of 1849, is worthy of the middle ages. Even this law, however, remained in abeyance till there arose a crisis in the State. All newspaper readers know that there has lately been a difficulty in the Italian Government; parties were discontented; there was a probability that Baron Ricasoli would resign, to be succeeded, in all probability, by a Minister of more clerical tendencies. This was the signal for the activity of the Tuscan reactionists, who showed their bitter hatred against the Evangelical teaching by instituting four prosecutions against Protestants almost in as many weeks, one of the victims being the celebrated Father Gavazzi. But now the Ricasoli Ministry is firmly established in power; both Houses of the Legislature have passed votes of confidence in his favour by large majorities, the voice of faction is for the present hushed, and the consequence is, that it is believed in Florence the prosecutions of the Evangelical teachers will be quietly dropped, and no more be heard of them. So true it is now, as of old, that "the earth helped the woman."

Our correspondent does not anticipate much from the movement of Signor Passaglia, who—from being the bosom friend of Pope Pius IX., and an advocate of the Immaculate Conception—has now become the opponent of the Pope's temporal dominion. Besides the narrowness of his views, he is too philosophical to be popular with the masses; and, indeed, from the deplorable picture of the state of education in Italy which our correspondent gives, we should not anticipate much from his writings. But to move the men who move the masses is no unimportant work; and in the arduous task of regenerating Italy those who pull down are as necessary, in their way, as those who build up. We cannot take leave of Passaglia without referring to an incident in connexion with him which curiously illustrates the tactics of the Papacy. Passaglia owed his escape from Rome mainly to the active exertions of an English Roman Catholic lady, who then—convert as she was—still retained enough of her country's spirit to abhor persecution. But, by force or fraud of some kind or other, the poor lady has been persuaded to publish an expression of penitence for the part she took in the Father's escape, and to declare that Passaglia was wrong, and the Pope altogether right in the matter. Alas, for the downward tendency of Romish training!

In our pages this month will be found some deeply-interesting information respecting the newly-opened island of Madagascar, and the prospects of missionary work there. It will be known to our readers that the old Queen—who for years forbade all intercourse with Europe, and cruelly persecuted the native Christians in her dominions—is at last dead, and that her son, who has ascended the throne, is in all respects the reverse of his mother, and is as eager for the benefits of European civilization as she was opposed to them. There was an impression, some time ago, that he had himself become a Christian; and though the political mission which visited his court from the Mauritius threw some doubts on that assertion, there can be no question that he will d nothing to discourage the preaching of the Gospel. Missionaries have already gone to avail themselves of the opening afforded, and more will follow. But it appears we are not to be left the undisputed masters of the ground. The French are also struggling for influence there; and a Roman Catholic band of missionaries was in the field even before the Protestants. Our brethren have need of Divine wisdom in the critical circumstances in which they are placed. The temptation will be strong upon them to compete with the Roman Catholic clergy to obtain exclusive possession of the King's favour. We trust they will be enabled to avoid the snare. They are no match for their Jesuitical rivals in the arts of finesse and political intrigue; and we should be very sorry if they were. The weapons of their warfare are not carnal; and, while it will be their duty to use all honest, open, and straightforward means to maintain their position in the country, any attempt to enter into court intrigues, to coquet with politicians, to adopt worldly expedients, or, it may be, to use pious frauds in order to gain spiritual results, can only end as it ought to end—by whatever party used—in failure, disgrace, mortification, and shame.

Recent accounts from China convey the gratifying fact that Dr. Lockhart has been allowed to enter the city of Peking, and there to establish a hospital. The presence of a Protestant missionary directly engaged in the work of preaching is not as yet conceded, though the treaty expressly provides that Protestant teachers shall have at least as much liberty as the Roman Catholic priests. Both our Minister and the admiral on the station are exerting themselves to this effect, and under the enlightened rule of the new Chinese Minister, Prince Kung, we may hope that the privilege will not much longer be withheld. We regret to learn that the news of the murder of two American missionaries by the rebels is now confirmed; and, farther, that a native teacher has also suffered martyrdom at the hands of his countrymen. But it is satisfactory to note that in each of these cases the assassins were lawless men, and that there is no suspicion of the Government having connived at their deeds.

THE CONTROVERSY IN THE CHURCH.*

IN the demesne of theology, as well as of nature, it is profoundly true that there is "some soul of goodness in things evil." The exquisitely-adjusted, though mysterious moral government under which we live in preparation for higher destinies requires that "there must be heresies." And with a woe to him by whom the offence cometh there is a needs be that offences shall come. Even in carnal warfare, wicked and miserable though it be, there is much that develops latent virtues, and ennobles often a nation's character. And we entertain no doubt that the present abundant dissemination of infidel questionings will result at last to the true Church of Christ in a beneficial harvest of no mean value. Things that are to be removed may be shaken, but the kingdom that cannot be shaken shall remain. Chaff may perish, but the grain shall be winnowed clean. Rubbish, hay, wood, stubble, may be burned up, but the foundation will be established. Traditions of men may be brought to nought, but the truth of God shall shine out with renewed glory. Many a plant which the Heavenly Husbandman hath never planted may be rooted up, but the "Plant of Renown" shall be seen to flourish as with renovated vigour and immortal beauty. Nor need the men of faith feel otherwise than joyful, as well as confident; for the trial of precious faith can never be other than "unto praise and honour and glory."

Meanwhile the war proceeds. And meanwhile, too, it is obvious to candid and thoughtful minds that something yet remains to be achieved by the vindicators of true religion. Many a speech has been spoken, multitudes of articles, pamphlets, and little books have been written, published, and forgotten. Ecclesiastical courts have echoed, and are echoing, with the sound of a somewhat harsh forensic theology; and clerical convocations have been labouring mightily with portentous gravamina, whose comings to the birth were not so wonderful. But something is lacking yet. Deep down in the public consciousness is it achingly felt, if but scantily acknowledged, that less of noisy bluster, and more of masterly performance, would have been desirable in the present controversy on the Church's behalf. Goliath of Gath is indeed scarcely in the field, but neither, assuredly, have we yet seen David with his quiet and victorious sling and stone. "Septem contra Christum" was a very unwise phrase, whoever coined it; for it lent too much importance to a phalanx of no very formidable force. And since Almighty aid is pledged to those who have grace and faith to wield it in the cause of Christ, sound good sense hearty piety, and manly courage, alike expected and expect no feeble or indecisive issue in such a contest for the championship of religious truth.

Aids to Faith; a Series of Theological Essays. By several writers. Edited by WILLIAM THOMSON, D.D., Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. Second Edition. London: John Murray, Albemarle-street. 1862.

Without, however, unduly disparaging the value of many respectable productions of the teeming press, it is not too much to say that little or nothing not ephemeral had yet appeared. Rifle-skirmishing had been sharp and vigorous, but the heavy artillery and cavalry of the sacramental host not yet had joined in conclusive battle. The promised "Replies" from the High Church champions, led on by the Bishop of Oxford, and the "Aids to Faith" from another quarter, both long announced and at length appearing, were expected to be trenchant, if not decisive. The paraded names, the long delay, the sifting meanwhile discussions, the perfect flood of light thrown variously on all sides of all the questions in issue, had created expectations perhaps unreasonably sanguine. The result is manifestly disappointing in many quarters. Even friendly critics wear but a thin veil of disguise, as they make the best of particular portions, but care not to conceal their discontent with either or both of these books as a whole. "Valuable, but ephemeral." "Sound, but not telling." "Important, but behind the time." "Able, but not adequate to the occasion." "Interesting, but destined not to live—rapidly to be read, and soon to be forgotten." Such are some of the critical utterances, public and private, echoing around us. Nor is it very much to the purpose if here and there a good essay on miracles is lauded as satisfactory, or a keen and bitter argumentum ad hominem leaves token of ugly punishment upon an adversary's visage. The day for satisfaction in this kind of warfare has gone by. The heart and the understanding of the Church of God have been too profoundly moved, too outrageously insulted, and look for something better, something deeper, something nobler, something sweeter than all this. Why have we not beheld it? Are some of Christianity's champions, as well as her adversaries, in a false position? Are there grey hairs upon Ephraim's head? Have erroneous principles, here a little and there a little, been long bedimning the singleness of vision, obscuring the glory of truth, sapping the integrity of doctrine, emasculating the vigour of faith, blunting the edge of the spiritual sword, neutralising the savour of the Church's salt? Or how otherwise? No doubt can be entertained as to the great abilities of the band of writers who have assumed the task of encountering the assailants of the truth. No proposition seems more universally asserted, and generally assented to, than that the productions of the Essayists and Reviewers are below the average in an intellectual, critical, and literary point of view. And we incline to believe that, after the first flush of disappointment, more value will be attributed even to the volumes before us than has been their meed at first appearing. But there must be, and there are, principles involved and sentiments engaged in the present contest which perplex the process of thought, and mar the simplicity of the argument and the decisiveness of its issue. When, in a former age, "the spear of Horsley pierced the shield of Priestley," the feat was recognised as of value to Church and State and society. The administration of the day took up the victorious archdeacon, and he became forthwith a bishop. But Priestley was not a Churchman. He was even outside the pale of scriptural and loyal Nonconformity. Now times are changed. Now, Intra muros versatur. Now Priestley's heresies might seem even mild shades of colour in the harmonious iris of the Broad Church party. Pale heresy deepened to the indigo of Pantheism is here. And difficult would it seem for a Prime Minister to acknowledge that a counter essayist had worthily brought back on point of spear from the pierced and ringing shield of Dr. Temple that dangling mitre so nearly descended on the brows of one who remains a priest of the nation's Church, Head Master of Rugby School, and, if not educator of the world, at least the educator of Britain's youth for theological universities and the ministry of Christ's Gospel. Here is a crippling condition of the present contest. It is internecine. It is not upon subordinate matters. It is not upon even some important doctrines. It is vital. The apple of the eye is touched. The heart's life is assailed. Churchman tells Churchman that miracles are an impossibility, that inspiration is a sham, that prophecy is a humbug, that the Gospel is a myth, and by consequence that man's immortality is a dream, and that God, if existing, is neither personal nor to be known. The shock of all this to our moral perceptions is too enormous to admit of the state of mind required for the right appreciation of a theological tournament. Dr. Wordsworth's tomahawking, for instance, might afford satisfaction to the public, if, on the one hand, the contest were only whether "infant baptism or episcopal government were deducible from Scripture by logical inference;" or if, on the other, he were thus punishing Professor Holyoake, of Fleet-street, instead of Professor Jowett, of Oxford. But as the matter stands, increased scepticism is as likely a result as any other from this process. And herein, we incline to think, and not in defective performance, lies one reason of the felt ineffectiveness of these replies. To do him all justice, the Bishop of Oxford, in his preface, seems to appreciate well this difficulty. He protests openly against any admission that any "new or powerful arguments against the truth have rendered necessary new arguments in its defence." Further, he strongly disallows the notion that the questions in dispute are "open questions, or fair subjects for discussion between Christians, still less between Church of England men." And as a fair consequence of these protests, he honestly declares that in the very first instance there is required "a distinct, solemn, and even, if need be, severe decision of authority, that assertions such as these cannot be put forward as possibly true, or even advanced as admitting of question by honest men, who are bound by voluntary obligations to teach the Christian revelation as the truth of God." His lordship puts this necessity, he tells us, first, "from the full conviction that if such matters are admitted by us to be open questions amongst men under such obligations, we shall leave to the next generation the fatal legacy of an universal scepticism amidst an undistinguishable confusion of all possible landmarks between truth and falsehood."

We have no doubt of the heartfelt sincerity of the Bishop's desire to apply "the firm, unflinching action" of authority, as he tells us, "even before argument." We have, however, the argument first in the field; and whether it be a doubtfulness arising from the lack of the preliminary action of authority, or some inherent discontent with the argument itself, it does not appear that the Bishop's own hopes are very sanguine as to the effectiveness of the present volume. He tells us we need the "calm, comprehensive, scholarlike declaration of positive truth upon all the matters in dispute, by which the shallowness, the passion, and the ignorance of the new system of unbelief may be thoroughly displayed." And then he adds the rather faint aspiration, "that this volume may at least in some measure fulfil these conditions, is the endeavour of its writers, and the hope of him," &c.

Our first impulse is to ask if the Bishop of Oxford had actually read the volume to which he stands sponsor, and for which he expresses such very moderate wishes? But whether his lordship had or had not read the work so faintly prayed for, the effect of such a sentence seems rather damping to the ardour of the reader, and suggestive that he had better, perhaps, wait for something more "calm, comprehensive, and scholarlike" to come. The Bishop, however, advances or insinuates a theory which differs from the opinion expressed in many Evangelical quarters of late, and which will deserve some attention. It has been generally thought and frequently asserted by Evangelical men that the growth of the rationalistic school in Oxford and in this country of late years is in some degree traceable to the well-known tendencies of human opinion to reaction. In other words, that the attempt to re-establish in an age of intellectual light a system of mediæval priestcraft and sacramentalism had revolted many minds; who, seeing that Popery and superstition and bondage of soul were the logical pits into which many unhappy men had thereupon fallen, and who, thirsting for liberty, and disdaining such trumperies, yet not having a firm hold by faith of the pure and power-giving Gospel of God, wandered instead into this sentimental region of unbelief. Such, we confess, is mainly our own view of the matter. But the Bishop of Oxford says no! He says, "Shortsighted men have looked at these things with their narrow range," who have arrived at such conclusions. It would not be graceful to appropriate and repel the charge of being shortsighted, and it is not courteous to retort. But when the Bishop speaks of the "energetic assertion of the truth" as being "itself one consequence of the unbelief with which it was striving," we must examine the matter a little more closely.

It has been, as we said, a prevailing impression that the Oxford Rationalism of this day is in part due to a reaction from that Oxford theology, called Tractarianism, of the day just gone by. And we have also believed that the rise of English Tractarianism itself was due to a deliberate and systematic plan adopted by a few zealous men for the counteraction of German Rationalism some thirty to forty years ago. That plan to which we allude is, we presume, what, in its working out, the Bishop of Oxford intends by the "energetic assertion of the truth." The view of the "shortsighted men, with their narrow range," is that Newman and Pusey, and the rest of them, were, so to speak, a sort of UZZAHs, who thought that the truth of God could not be safe or, at least, effective against Rationalism, without the help of human traditions. The shortsighted Evangelical men foretold, however, the discomfiture of that notable attempt to resist a refined infidelity by the aid of a disguised Popery. They preferred, and they still prefer, that old and simple and glorious Gospel which is the power of God unto salvation. They preferred, and they still prefer, the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, to all the cumbersome armaments of Patristic, mediæval, Romanistic, or Anglican forges. They agree with the Bishop of Oxford when he says that there is "no fear of argument against our faith, though the freest; or of inquiry into it, though the most daring. From these Christianity has nothing to dread. In their issue these do but manifest the truth. The roughest wind sweeps the sky the most speedily, and shows forth the soonest the unclouded sun in all his splendour." To all this we say amen. Let argument then be free by all manner of means. But while Christianity has nothing to dread from argument, we are not so sure that she has anything to gain from the help of "unflinching authority." Many of the shortsighted men imagine that they see, in some quarters, a new peril of reaction, a new attempt to make capital out of the occasion, and to grasp at priestly power, under the pretence, or even haply with the conscientious wish and intent, to crush a heresy. It is not probable that any such attempt will now succeed extensively, though it is difficult to predict the oscillations of human opinion. Horror at infidelity, and love for the Saviour, and zeal for His glory, may temporarily drive some pious persons into impolitic and unwise combinations with High Churchmen lusting after authority; but even already, we think, the first phase of that trepidation is passing away, and the time of calmer search into the real, though concealed causes of existing phenomena is at hand. How far the truth would gain by substituting Transubstantiation for Essayism is a curious question. On what principle a Reformed Protestant Church is to condone an Archdeacon Denison, and lay the arm of unflinching and severe authority on a Dr. Temple, remains, we think, for elucidation. The Bishop of Oxford's glowing imagination accords with "the explanation that sees" in this movement of the human mind "the first stealing over the sky of the lurid lights which shall be shed profusely around the great Antichrist." Believers in certain futurist schemes of prophecy may probably consider this prognosis to be as deep and sound as the language in which it is conveyed is undoubtedly meant to be fine. But as we do not comprehend how "an explanation" is a thing that "sees," nor, supposing an explanation to have eyesight, how anything it does now see is the first stealing of a lurid light, so neither do we quite take in the profuse shedding of the said lurid lights around the great Antichrist of the Bishop of Oxford's apprehensions. Style and mutterings and theology of this calibre may have admirers somewhere, but do not seem calculated to advance a cause with either accomplished scholars, severe logicians, or well-grounded divines. In any case, darkness rather than light, however "lurid," seems the better melodramatic accompaniment of such a poetical personage; and the penumbra of approaching eclipse would more fitly illustrate our supposed present condition. But "explanations" which can "see" mysteries of this kind are, perhaps, not to be too severely criticised, and may be left to indulge their own phraseology, since, we presume, they can speak as well as see.

More to the purpose is it to observe that the Bishop's preface is rather damaging to the volume. Its reasoning and spirit convey palpably an impression that the contest does not really lie between Christianity and infidelity, but between two parties in the Church, one of whom holds a good deal more and the other a good deal less than the pure religion of Jesus Christ. Of the "Replies" themselves, or of some of them, we may take future occasions to speak. On the whole, we do not think the device of writing seven specific answers by seven different pens was a happy one. Few of the original "Essays and Reviews" were worthy of being so answered. One or two of them would have been better dealt with if a whole volume had been devoted to the subject matter of each, and the others left unheeded; or left, at least, to separate handling. The present plan also inevitably involved more of the controversial, personal, and anti tone than seems to have been aimed at or desired by the projectors themselves. The result is felt to be untoward. The essay of Professor Jowett, for instance, on the interpretation of Scripture, touches a subject of vital importance and profoundest interest. The reply demanded by the Christian public to such an essay is a profound and interesting exposition of the true method of scriptural interpretation, informing the understanding, affecting the heart, and glorifying the Word of God. Instead of this, we have a truculent personal assault, a series of cutting tomahawkery, exhausting epithets and metaphors and images and allusions, contemptuous and sarcastic; a nice sample in our days of essential odium theologicum. And as for positive "scriptural interpretation," our readers may be satisfied with a single instance in proof of Dr. Wordsworth's qualifications for that high office. Not to dwell upon his statement, that our Lord's saying to Nicodemus (John iii. 5) meant Baptism, we find him asserting that the "hard saying" of our Lord, as to the general obligation "to eat His flesh and drink His blood," was afterwards explained by the same Divine Speaker Himself when He instituted the supper and said, "Take, eat, this is my body, Drink ye all of this!!"

Such is the loose and easy process by which the sacramental interpretation of Scripture is managed. We remember to have seen this notion elaborated by Dr. Pusey in some of his essays, and we doubt not there is good store of such "interpretation" in Patristic and Popish writers. Nor may it be amiss even here to observe, that our Divine Master has Himself sufficiently explained His own "hard saying" in a very different manner. Whoever eats His flesh and drinks His blood, He says, "hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. As the Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. This is that bread which come down from heaven, not as your Fathers did eat manna and are dead; he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever." (John vi. 54—58.) So much for the positive; and the negative is stated by our Lord with equal plainness: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." (John vi. 53.) On the hypothesis that our Lord speaks here of "the sacrament," there would be no difficulty in establishing the "opus operatum," and not much in establishing "Transubstantiation." Every one who does eat is saved—"has eternal life." No one who does not eat has life. The bread, too, comes down from heaven. Ergo. Q. E. D. But Evangelical divines, on the other hand, assert that as the sacrament was not yet instituted, there is no proof that it is even alluded to here. They assert, too, that our Lord explains Himself as using a figure when (in verse 63) He says: "It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing, the words that I speak unto you, they are the spirit, and they are the life."

If, then, the sacramental interpretation of Scripture be proposed as the alternative for the Jowettian (whatever that be), if essential Popery versus Rationalism be the elements here in collision, there is a need for caution on the part of the children of God, who have their Bibles and the Spirit of Truth for their guidance. The natural repugnance of the unrenewed human heart to the self-denying holiness of Christ's pure Gospel, is one thing; the determination of the half-enlightened intellect to resist the bondage of superstition, sacramentalism, and priestcraft, is another. Both may be sometimes combined; but sometimes the heart-aversion to holy truth leads to the love of spiritual lies, which gendereth bondage. In the combination and conflicts of these rival elements may be found the true solution of many phenomena of ecclesiastical and theological history. Old, almost, as the Gospel is the attempt to amalgamate Moses and Christ, circumcision and grace. And the light of the middle of the nineteenth century itself has seen the notable device of Pio Nono and his court to stem the march of liberty and intellect by the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. Not essentially different in principle is the work of priestcraft in any age—even in the Church of England in our own. Whether Rationalism be destined here to reproduce and extend a modified superstition and a debased national religion, or whether the latter shall foster still more the advancing leaven of infidelity, time alone, perhaps, can reveal.

Of the other volume ("The Aids to Faith") we must speak on another occasion. Its contents seem very unequal in value. And of both and either of these volumes it must be said, that they demand cautious and critical examination, and cannot receive the unqualified approval of spiritually-enlightened men. Meanwhile, it is competent to the children of God to stand fast in the glorious liberty wherewith the light and the love and the truth of Christ have made them free indeed. The Word of God without, and the witnessing Spirit within—be these our watchword, polestar, compass, and helm. Precious and glorious realities, which neither Rome nor Germany can nullify!

THE NATURAL AND THE SUPERNATURAL.*

ONE of the reflections forced upon us by recent and pressing controversies is, the poverty of language—its inadequacy to convey accurately the distinct and precise shades of our thoughts—and its consequent liability to fail of its end, and to excite the assaults of other thinkers against us. We have been told, indeed, that the German tongue possesses certain capacities and flexibilities of a superior character. For instance, that at least four distinct words variously express four mental modes, for which we have only the one term, "idea." Whether much real addition to knowledge, or a much clearer apprehension of things, be afforded or not by this richness of tongue, we shall not stop to inquire. If our neighbours enjoy the advantage, it is only proper that they should vindicate their right to adopt their own modes of thought and speech on theological questions, as Dr. Dorner did in his reply to certain observations of Bishop Fitzgerald, who, perhaps, had manifested a little of the usual spirit of John Bull. And possibly we manifest a little of the same spirit, when we still retain some doubt whether our German friends do really always perfectly understand each other or themselves. But the inherent imbecility of language to which our observation refers is not comparative, but absolute. It belongs to the nature of our limited being—limited, but still endowed with something which pants after the illimitable.

* The Supernatural in Relation to the Natural. By the Rev. JAMES McCOSH, LL.D., Author of "The Method of the Divine Government," "Intuitions of the Mind," &c. Cambridge: Macmillan and Co., and 23, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London. 1862.

Nature and the Supernatural, as together Constituting the One System of God. By HORACE BURNELL, D.D., Author of "The New Life," "Christian Nature," &c. Edinburgh: Alexander Strahan and Co., and Sampson, Low and Co., London. 1862.

When we speak of "Natural and Supernatural," for instance, how simple and plain, at first sight, to an unsophisticated mind, is the meaning of the terms and the boundary of the things intended. But look a little more closely, or talk a little learnedly, and you soon learn how obscure the affair can easily be made. Thunder and lightning are natural phenomena to the intelligent man—to the ignorant, they are the voice and glory of a God. Hence an irreligious mind takes easily the rapid step to the therefore that there is no supernaturalism—no, not even a God distinct from the order of nature or the law of existences.

We are indebted to the distinguished author of the "Method of the Divine Government" and "The Intuitions of the Mind" for an exceedingly interesting treatise upon this subject of the natural and the supernatural. We had finished the book before we read the preface, and had felt some sense of its incompleteness, as well as a certain impression of its hurried finish left upon the mind by the perusal. In the preface, however, the author tells us he had all along intended that his work on the "Method of the Divine Government, Physical and Moral," should be followed by another on the "Method of the Divine Government, Supernatural and Spiritual." The present essay is the first part of that contemplated work, and we are sorry to see that no precise promise is made as to the forthcoming of a second part. While, therefore, we regret the non-appearance of the entire work, and the apparent hurry of the present portion of it, we cannot regret that the author has given it to us as it stands, rather than risk contingencies and delay. We have read no publication relative to existing controversies with so great pleasure. And though there be one or two points to which we may venture to take exception, we think it impossible for any one to study the book without intellectual and spiritual profit. Standing out in strong relief from the majority of controversial writings, there is a spirit of goodness and kindness and beauty pervading it throughout which will not fail to leave something of its delightful influence upon the reader's mind. And if heresy were to be thus always dealt with, and controversy baptized into this spirit, we need not much dread the one or deprecate the other.

Dr. McCosh starts his subject with a striking picture of man discovering the uniformity of Nature, and yet observing certain irregularities interfering with Nature's constant order. To the man of devout and well-instructed mind each of these classes of objects will appear as the work of a Divine Being. To the man who, on the contrary, is disposed to keep God at a distance, what is regular and settled is easily termed Nature, and what is irregular is Chance. We are much struck with the way in which, throughout this book, Dr. McCosh applies this simple principle. Experience and Scripture both confirm its truth. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness." "An evil heart of unbelief" is that which "departs from the living God." Proud men may disguise this matter in a maze of learned-looking language, but ungodliness is a moral as well as an intellectual taint. And the foolish body who says in his heart, "Tush! no God," is, without doubt, corrupt at core.

But the piously-inclined man, uninstructed in the true character of existing physical agencies, is liable to the mistake of attributing certain startling phenomena to direct acts of God, and overlooking His constant presence in those operations which are less striking. He sees God in lightning and thunder and storm and disease, but not in health and the gentle breeze and the mild sunshine and the quiet growth of the grass and flowers of the field. Here there is therefore a tendency to superstition and Polytheism. In this sense the atheistic sentiment of the Latin poet has some truth in it—

A perception, therefore, of the uniformity of Nature, as Dr. McCosh observes, forms an effectual natural means of upholding the unity of God. But this, again, is no safeguard against ungodliness; for the corrupt human heart, when the enlightened intellect has rejected superstition and Polytheism, will adopt Pantheism instead. So that in the same country we may behold, side by side, Polytheism, the religion of the multitude, and Pantheism, that of the philosophers and priests.

The application of these views to man in every stage of progress, and even in our own times, is facile. Geology, astronomy, chemistry, and every other science, physical or mental, present themselves to minds, devout or un-devout, with similar results, as in the rudest times of knowledge. The irreligious man will see nothing but uniformity, law, and order. The religious man will see God in that law and order also. Science will teach the former nothing about God, because his heart is astray. But the same science will enable the latter more clearly to perceive how God does act in Nature; it will correct superstition and other evils of ignorance. To him that hath shall be given.

Dr. McCosh next defines "the natural"—describes in what the natural system consists. There are substances endowed with certain properties; these are all correlated and distributed so as to produce a general and obvious order; and there is a large, yet limited, body of objects and powers constituting nature and performing its functions. "No human power—no natural power—can add a new substance to nature, or destroy any existing substance." And not only so, but "it is beyond all natural power to create or annihilate force."

A short chapter on the mental principles involved in our conviction, as to the uniformity of nature, deserves close inquiry. Dr. McCosh is of opinion that this conviction is not necessary or intuitive, but the result of a large and long experience; yet he thinks also that there are certain original principles of the human mind which incline us to look for, though they do not compel us, apart from experience, to believe in, Nature's uniformity. And he then rises to the further conclusion, that these same principles compel us to go on to a belief in a supernatural power and activity. This leads to the necessary explanation of "how much is contained in the natural," a chapter of very great interest. FIRST, in Physical Nature we have—(1) Order, (2) Order as a mean towards an end, (3) Beauty, (4) Fitness, (5) Final Cause, (6) Nature's Respect to Man, (7) Special Providence. SECONDLY, in Nature there are Souls with High Endowments, Intellect, Free-will, Conscience, Immortality. THIRDLY, there is in Nature Sin. And FOURTHLY, there is in Nature Moral Government.

The mere enumeration of these particulars is enough to attract the thoughtful reader to the subject, and we are assured that his attention will be richly repaid; but our space will not permit us to say more on this part of the subject. Before entering upon the second book, which treats of the supernatural, we have ten short theses upon "the natural as a manifestation of the supernatural," or groupings of "some of the truths picked up by us in the lower fields of the natural." In these Dr. McCosh beautifully brings out (what we have already alluded to) the impressions which nature makes on the religious and irreligious man respectively, and vindicates the superior wisdom of the religious mind, as well as shows, in a very beautiful and striking manner, the insufficiency of nature without God to fill the void of our spirits.

In the second book, on the Supernatural, we have its precise nature defined. Natural powers, as before defined, produce natural effects, though it be God who works in and by them. But an event properly supernatural is that which cannot be brought about by natural agencies. The defender of miracles must be therefore prepared to show that they are "beyond the capacity of natural agency." This principle also enables us to distinguish "between the higher moods of the natural man and the inspiration of God." We regret our want of space to give our readers an exquisite passage upon this last topic. Dr. McCosh goes on to rebut the objection of Baden Powell and others, that a miracle can never be proved, as it is beyond the capacity of man to tell what powers are in nature. It is certainly curious that an answer should be required to so silly an objection; for though we cannot tell what powers there are in nature, we certainly do know that there are certain things which are not in nature. And when a man who had been dead and in his grave several days, and already decomposing, is called by a word out of his grave, and restored to life; or when another man really dead and buried raises himself, we have no sort of difficulty in concluding (the facts being granted or proved) that we are in the region of the supernatural.

While we are upon the point of miracles (though the precise topic occurs rather at the end of the work), we shall take occasion to refer to a subject which has always appeared to us of considerable importance, and on which we are compelled to differ from Dr. McCosh, as well as from Dr. Chalmers and other distinguished men. We allude to the question as to whether a miracle has ever been permitted, or could ever be permitted by God, to be wrought by evil agency. And this question connects itself with a second—viz., as to whether a miracle is in any degree to be tested by the goodness of the doctrine propounded by its alleged performer.

We are of opinion that it is reasoning in a circle to make the miracle a proof of doctrine, and then to make doctrine a proof of miracle. Doubtless, these are concurrent testimonies to the mission (for instance) of our Lord. And doubtless, also, we should have little difficulty in denying the reality of any alleged miracle purporting to be wrought in order to establish a palpably false or wicked proposition. But we maintain that the miracles of the New Testament must be established as facts preliminary to our reception of any doctrine whatever from their alleged workers. If Jesus raised Lazarus and Himself, we are prepared and compelled to receive any revelation He makes us, to obey any commands He gives us. If He did not, His apostles and their writings are not trustworthy. The miracles are fundamental—we must believe for their sake.

Accordingly, we think that Scripture itself arrogates to God exclusively and very plainly the prerogative of miracles, and denies true miracles to any other. We hear of false miracles, lying wonders, wonders of a lie, indeed; but, if our views and reasoning be correct, these must be mere frauds, juggles, and deceptions.

First, then, as to Scripture. In Psalm lxxii. 18 we read: "The God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things." And again Psalm cxxxvi. 4: "To him who alone doeth great wonders."

In both these passages the Hebrew words so convey the exclusive prerogative of God to do a miracle, that we can safely say it would be impossible to express that idea if it be not here expressed. The phrase לְבַדּוֹ is the same which in the one passage is rendered only, and in the other alone. And we could multiply texts without number, whose accepted meaning would be entirely nullified if this view be not admitted. For instance, Psalm lxxi. 16: "I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only." Again, Exodus xxii. 20: "He that sacrifices unto any God, save unto the Lord only, he shall be utterly destroyed." Again, Psalm lxxxiii. 18: "Thou whose name alone is Jehovah art Most High over all the earth." Again, Job ix. 8: "Who alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea." These instances are sufficient to this point, and unless their exclusive character be admitted there is an end of criticism. Now in all these passages the Hebrew phrase is precisely the same.

In the next place, it is to us very like a self-evident proposition which is asserted in these passages of Scripture. Admitting nature and the supernatural, admitting God the Maker and Governor by laws of His own ordaining, it seems contradictory to allow that those laws can be suspended or altered, except by His own act. And it seems to us as contrary to His moral character to admit that He would permit those laws to be tampered with by an evil being in any such manner as would implicate Himself as the doer. If it be impossible for God to lie, it is equally impossible for Him to permit an acted lie, which we conceive a miracle wrought by an evil spirit, for a deceitful purpose, would be.

It is, however, objected by some persons that in Scripture there are statements of real miracles having been actually wrought by evil agency; and on this ground some students of prophecy look for real miracles to be performed by a coming Antichrist. It would require a volume to go into the details of this argument; but if our former statement of the scriptural assertions be correct, this objection is already disposed of. It is impossible for Scripture to contradict itself. And there is no assertion as to the performance of such alleged miracles in all Scripture which will stand a moment's comparison with the passages quoted containing the absolute arrogation to God of alone doing wonders. "Wonders of a lie" are not miracles at all. In whatever manner, for instance, the magicians before Pharaoh produced certain appearances, there no statement or proof that the appearances were miraculous ; and the historian only records the simple fact of those appearances. As to the wicked one (in 2 Thess. ii. 8—11) and his "lying wonders," not a few sound theologians consider that prophecy applicable to the Papacy, which has perpetrated a sufficient quantity of such juggleries in all ages. And it remains to be proved, either that another wicked one is to come, or that his wonders will be any more real than those of Rome, if he do appear. It is with reference particularly to this last subject—involving no unimportant considerations as to the interpretation of Scripture, the meaning of prophecy (fulfilled or unfulfilled), and the evidences of the truth of the New Testament—that we think it of great moment to resist the notion that God would permit any real miracle to be wrought, except to authenticate a Divine communication. In the words of Bishop Douglas : "If, in a matter of this kind, human reason can arrive at any certainty, there seems sufficient foundation for asserting that God will never vest men with a power of working miracles, unless that power be vested in them for this one end—to satisfy the world that they are really under a supernatural influence, and are to be looked upon as teachers from Heaven."

We cannot pursue this important and interesting subject here, but may have another opportunity of doing so, and we must draw to a close our observations upon Dr. McCosh's very interesting book. Indeed, while we have contravened an opinion which he seems to give in to (in pages 312, 313), he contradicts, we think, himself in his own definition of a miracle (146, 147). In the last-mentioned place he says : "We would confine the word 'miracle' to those events which were wrought in our world as a sign or proof of God making a supernatural interposition or revelation." And he rightly distinguishes between supernatural and miraculous : "We must ever view creation as supernatural, but we do not speak of it as miraculous. We look upon the incarnation of the Son of God as supernatural, we do not employ it as a sign or wonder for evidence. We believe the conversion of the sinner to transcend all the natural efforts of the corrupt heart of man, but we do not advance it as a miracle for proof, though it may carry strong conviction to the man himself, and produce an impression or prepossession on those who were cognisant of the former man, and now mark the change wrought upon him."

We have felt particular pleasure in following Dr. McCosh in his descriptions of the different degrees of the natural, and how it rises to the supernatural, yet is distinguished and divided from it by a marked line—the mineral, the plant, the animal, and man ; then man, not as an "upper brute," nor yet as an "anomaly," or as an "exception," but as the continuing link binding together the natural and supernatural. In the latter he discovers a system analogous to, though not identical with, that of nature. There are relations, means conducing to ends, series of events; times and seasons, correspondences, gradual advance, and connexions of systems—all having reference to one object, "Jesus Christ, in His incarnation, His life, His death, and ascension. The supernatural dispensation has respect throughout to God, to His law, and His glory, on the one hand ; and to man, to his sins, and his restoration to peace and holiness and communion with God through a Mediator, on the other."

In unfolding these views, Dr. McCosh has advanced some things upon the "typical system of revelation," which we regret that we have not had time thoroughly to examine nor space here to discuss. We have always been accustomed to attribute much more to the typical teaching of the Bible than he seems to think is generally done. But we cannot clearly make out to what length exactly he himself does go. We believe that archetype and type more nearly express the truth than type and antitype in most cases. And perhaps the principle is much more extensively applicable, as he suggests, than has been usually considered. But that there are typical events, typical ordinances, and typical men, we have never seen questioned by any recognised expounders of Scripture. How far the prefigurative types are to have their meaning carried, is a subject worthy of deep consideration. And while there may be some danger of "fanciful" expositions in this region, we are apprehensive that the danger of being accounted fanciful has restricted the profitable use of this portion of the instruction of revelation. We think it is Vitrunga who has advanced the notion that in some cases types primarily applicable to the personal Lord Jesus Christ are also applicable to members of His body mystical; and we have always felt that here was a field of inquiry, to say the least of it, worthy of more consideration than it has received.

The appendix contains two papers of an interesting character. The first bears upon the controversy as to the possible knowledge of the Infinite, and shows the danger of the ground adopted by Hamilton and Mansel in their nescient schemes. This subject we may take occasion to refer to hereafter. The other paper contains a touching account of an interview which Dr. McCosh had with the late Chevalier Bunsen, in 1858. Of that remarkable and somewhat inconsistent character Dr. McCosh had spoken in the body of his work, as follows: "It was not right in Dr. R. Williams to use the name of Bunsen without apprising us that that distinguished man has not had, for the last ten years, the least influence in Germany, as a thinker or a divine—however much he has been revered and beloved for his genius, his literary ability, his attachment to religious liberty, and his noble personal character as a man and a Christian." The appendix account of the interview, and this testimony from such a man, is valuable, in confirmation of the correctness of our views, amidst much vulgar clamour, some time ago.

But we must conclude. What we miss in this book of Dr. McCosh is the supernatural as now in action in the living people of the living God. A most interesting subject. Perhaps this is what he will give us his views about in another volume. We have named a book at the head of this article in conjunction with that of Dr. McCosh, simply because the title is so similar, that we wish to prevent our readers from being misled by the similarity. We have not had time thoroughly to examine Dr. Bushnell's work, which seems a strange composition, and confounding all true demarcation of the natural and supernatural. He also advocates the theory that miracles and spiritual (? miraculous) gifts are not discontinued in the present day, whereof he adduces alleged instances not a few. We are rather sorry that such a work as this should appear with a name so similar to that of Dr. McCosh, and we do not know which has had the priority. Perhaps Dr. McCosh may think fit to resume his original plan, and give to the world his whole work, under the title, "The Method of the Divine Government, Supernatural and Spiritual." Meanwhile, we cordially welcome, and recommend to our readers, the present volume, as certain to afford them delight and edification.

REMAINS OF ANCIENT BABYLONIAN LITERATURE,

ONE of the subjects that are now under discussion by scholars is the genuineness of certain books said to contain some relics of the ancient literature of the Babylonians, and to give indications of a literature reaching to 3,000 years B.C. These remains have been discovered in Arabic translations which bear the date (at least the principal one of them) of A.D. 904. The Arabic texts which profess to contain these very remarkable relics of antiquity have not yet been given to the world. Dr. Daniel Chwolson, Professor of Hebrew in the University of St. Petersburg, has, however, published the result of his investigations in two remarkable works—first, his “Ueber die Ueberreste der Altbabylonischen Literatur in Arabischen Uebersetzungen” (on the Remains of Ancient Babylonian Literature in Arabic Translations); St. Petersburg, 1859; and, secondly, in his “Ueber Tammâz und die Menschenverehrung bei den alten Babyloniern” (on Tammâz and the Hero-worship among the ancient Babylonians); St. Petersburg, 1860. His works, especially the former, inasmuch as they tend to upset many received opinions on points of ancient history, and put forward such startling theories, have been reviewed, more or less, unfavourably, by many journals on the Continent, as by Ewald in the Göttingische gelehrten Anzeiger, Spiegel in the Das Ausland, Renan in the Revue Germanique, von Gutschmid in the Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft. Nor has the discussion been confined to the Continent. An able review of Chwolson’s first-named work appeared in the Christian Remembrancer for April, 1860, and of the latter work in a later number of the same journal. Two very able and interesting articles have likewise appeared in the Saturday Review for Sept. 22 and 29, 1860, from the pen of a distinguished orientalist. The articles in the Christian Remembrancer and in the Saturday Review have been in favour of Dr. Chwolson, the final judgment on the question of the writers of those articles being reserved until the appearance of the Arabic texts. The Times, however, in an article in the number for Jan. 31 of this year, takes up the side of Renan against Chwolson, and assigns the date of the originals, from which the Arabic translations have been made, to the third or fourth century after Christ, instead of, at latest, to the commencement of the thirteenth century before Christ; which is the view that Chwolson advocates. Of this review we would only remark that it is too onesided, as it passes by the arguments which Chwolson has adduced in favour of his views, and holds that distinguished scholar up to ridicule, on account of his asserted credulity. The writer, too, is mistaken in imagining that either M. Renan or himself will be allowed to have the last word in the discussion, as, so far from Dr. Chwolson having “perceived his error, and desisted from the idea of publishing the voluminous materials which he has collected,” that scholar is busily engaged in the preparation for publication of the texts alluded to, though, we fear, still some considerable time must elapse before they will be published. Till then it is probable he will permit his antagonists to retain possession of the field, and exult in their imagined triumph.

We will now proceed very briefly to lay before our readers some of the results which Chwolson supposes he has obtained. We must premise, however, that it is too soon to attempt to reconcile any of these views with Scripture history, or even to say that they are irreconcilable. The chronology of ancient events is always a difficult subject, and one as yet very imperfectly explored. Let such subjects as this regarding Babylonian literature be thoroughly discussed by scholars, and some fixed results obtained (which are generally unattainable at first), and then it will be time enough to examine the relation which these subjects bear to the Scriptures of truth. Much injury has been done to the Bible by the attempts made to reconcile its statements with each of the opinions of geologists, as they, one after another, successively advocated different theories. It is as injurious to Evangelical truth as it is unphilosophical and absurd to raise the cry of "Rationalist," "Neologian," and "Infidel," on every occasion against the scholar who puts forward any opinion differing from that popularly held. Such an outcry does not prevent the discussion of the obnoxious tenet, and serves only to bring into undeserved contempt the doctrines of the Gospel, by means of the folly of its injudicious defenders.

That the Babylonians had an ancient literature is a matter of high probability, although no mention is made of such by any of the Greek or Roman writers who speak of Babylon. But there are distinct allusions in Scripture to such a literature, for Daniel speaks of the learning of the Chaldeans, and Solomon, who, we are informed (1 Kings v. 30—33), composed a great work on natural history, is said to have been wiser than all the children of the East in such matters, which would lead us to suppose that similar treatises were written by individuals of other nations earlier than the age of that monarch.

The ancient Babylonian writings, which are supposed by Dr. Chwolson to have come down to us from a like remote antiquity, are: 1. "A Treatise on Nabathæan Agriculture;" 2. "The Book of Poisons;" 3. "The Book of Tenkelushā the Babylonian;" and 4. "The Book of the Secrets of the Sun and the Moon."

The name of Nabathæans was given to the inhabitants of Babylonia as far down the Euphrates as Wasit and Basra. Nabathæans dwelt also in Arabia Petræa, and this once mighty nation have left interesting traces of their existence in the rocky ruins of Petra. Quatremère supposes their settlement there not to have been older than the era at which Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judea. They were probably descendants of Nebāyōth, a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13, Isaiah lx. 7), and the name, according to Josephus, was given to all the descendants of Ishmael who occupied the country from the Euphrates to the Red Sea. In general, it may be said that the name Nabathæan was synonymous with Chaldean and Syrian.

Ibn Wahshiya, the Arabic translator of the above books, was moved to commence his work in order to show that the despised race of Nabathæans (of whom he was one) once possessed a high degree of culture, when other nations were steeped in barbarism. There was great danger to be feared from this undertaking, and the work had to be performed in secret, and the translations were not published until after the death of Ibn Wahshiya, when they were brought forth to light by a pupil of his own. They bear unmistakeable marks of being faithfully made from the original Chaldee, and the translator candidly avows his ignorance of several points contained in the MSS. from which he translates. But, like all, or most, Oriental books, the work has been more or less interpolated or corrupted by its transcribers; and, until the whole is published, it is impossible to judge whether the appearance of such names as Agathodaemon does not entirely disprove the antiquity assigned to these works by Dr. Chwolson, as M. Renan thinks.

The "Nabathæan Agriculture" was the work of one Kūthāmī, and it is from its internal evidence that Chwolson arrives at the conclusion that he must have lived not later than the fourteenth century before Christ. He, at least, pretends to be a native of Babylon, living under a Canaanitish dynasty, who had subdued Babylon beneath their rule, but, as Chwolson believes, at some time subsequent to the conquest of Canaan by the children of Israel. He makes mention of the great temples existing in Babylon in his time, alludes to religions now utterly unknown to us, and never once to Judaism or Christianity. Ibn Wahshiya, indeed, ascribes this book to a much more remote date than Chwolson, but there is no doubt but he was mistaken in this opinion. This Kūthāmī speaks of ancestors, of a certain Yanbūshādh, who was engaged in similar studies several hundred years earlier, of Daghrīth earlier still, who, in his turn, alludes to other sages in such a way as to show that they lived even much earlier than himself. Thus we have indications of a very early literature, which, if we were to implicitly believe these writers, would reach to a considerable period beyond the received date of the Creation. However, it is not yet clear that, even if we admit the early date of Kūthāmī, that writer might not have been misled on these points by those before him. Until, however, the Arabic texts have been published, with notes and a translation, it would be in vain to endeavour to separate the facts from the fictions, or to give any opinion worth anything as to the date of these curious remains. We meet with the Biblical names of Adamī (Adam), Ishithā (Seth), Achnōchā (Enoch), Anūhā (Noah), Sāmā (Shem), Numrūdā (Nimrod), and others, but the accounts respecting them are quite dissimilar to those in the Bible, and they may not refer to the same personages at all.

With one curious point we must conclude this very brief sketch; it is with respect to Tammūz. In Ezekiel viii. 14, among the abominations which the Lord showed that prophet to have been committed by the Israelites, was that of "women weeping for Tammūz." The hitherto most approved explanation of this passage has been that Tammūz was identical with Adonis, who, classical authors tell us, was loved by Venus, and torn in pieces by a wild boar, sent against him by Mars, but afterwards changed into a flower, and yearly lamented on the anniversary of his death. No proof, however, was given of the correctness of this identification beyond the opinion of Jerome, and others like him. Dr. Chwolson seems to have cleared up this difficulty, and shown, from these MSS., that Tammūz was the first to preach the worship of the stars and to die a martyr to his opinion, and that it was his sad fate which succeeding generations were wont to lament over; an opinion not differing much from that of Maimonides, the great Jewish scholar, but generally esteemed hitherto as incorrect.

OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS RESPECTING THE ROMAN QUESTION.

Following the example set by England, the French Government has adopted the practice of communicating to the Chamber of Deputies, and publishing, the principal official documents which it has indited in the interval of the legislative sessions. Consequently, we are now made acquainted with the notes sent to M. de Lavalette, our Ambassador at Rome, by M. Thouvenel, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and with the answers of the representative of France. The perusal of these documents has strongly awakened public interest.

A first point has been clearly demonstrated—namely, that the Emperor and his counsellors are weary of the perpetual obstacles which impede the solution of the Roman question. This state of uncertainty cannot remain for an indefinite period. The French garrison at Rome entails a heavy cost on our national treasury. Italy is discontented and disturbed. Napoleon III., in return for his services, has reaped only the menaces and the plots of the Jesuitical party.

This is decidedly too much for endurance. M. Thouvenel requested the Marquis de Lavalette to demand from the Pontifical Court if it can indicate any solution whatever to the problem now at issue between the Papacy and the Italians.

A second point is proved with the same certainty by these official documents—namely, that the Pope and his Ministers obstinately persist, in the most absolute manner, in not making the least concession for the conciliation of the contending parties. Cardinal Antonelli has replied to M. de Lavalette, in curt and brief terms, that neither Pius IX., nor his successor, nor the College of Cardinals, nor any ecclesiastical authority, can enter into any negotiations, under any form whatever, with the spoilers of the domain of the Papal Church.

This is the position of affairs: Our Government, during the last year, has lost rather than gained ground at Rome. The opposition of the Pontifical See is more categorical; it embraces the future as well as the present. All the liberal journals, even the most moderate, agree in counselling our statesmen to abandon useless attempts at arrangement, and to leave the Pope to his own strength, or rather to his own weakness, by recalling the French garrison. Well-informed persons assure us that Napoleon III. inclines more and more towards this course.

DISCOURSE BY THE ABBÉ MARET.

Your readers will, perhaps, remember the name of the Abbé Maret. He unites to deep piety elevated and liberal sentiments. Moreover, when the Emperor, one or two years since, appointed him to the episcopal see of Vannes, Pius IX. refused, on the most false pretences, to confirm his nomination.

The Abbé Maret, therefore, has remained simply a Professor and Dean of the Faculty of Roman Catholic Theology at Paris, this office not requiring the ratification of the Pontifical authority. He opened his recent course by a lecture on the situation of the [Roman] Church. "This Church," said he, in effect, "is passing through one of the most important and difficult phases of its history. Men's minds are now handed over to their own keeping—with freedom of conscience, of worship, and of the press. The State no longer intervenes in the domain of individual belief. These new views constitute the public opinion and the common right of France. The Church, in the serene region of principles, cannot condemn these ideas, or these social and political laws, without denying the spirit of its own doctrines or of Christianity. Reactionary movements, exclusive theories and violent language, only furnish weapons to the enemies of religion. Let us beware of creating an impassable gulf between the Church and modern tendencies! The world can be saved only by a complete renovation of the Evangelical spirit; it can only be saved by the spirit of Jesus Christ. Now, this is a spirit of self-denial, of justice, and of love. The priesthood ought to show its self-denial by renouncing its privileges and its political power. It ought to show its justice by endeavouring to harmonise all rights—to reconcile the claims of liberty with those of authority—the rights of the State with those of the Church. It ought to show its love by manifesting its affection towards all men, and even to its adversaries."

Certainly this is pious and excellent language. If the majority of Romanist priests were to express such sentiments, it would become easy to offer to them the right hand of fellowship. But the Abbé Maret is considered by the Ultramontanists as a betrayer of the good cause, and almost as an apostate.

LETTER OF THE BISHOP OF MONTAUBAN.

M. Doney, Bishop of Montauban, has long since acquired an unhappy celebrity for the narrowness of his opinions, and his fanatical intolerance.

He has just published in the Monde newspaper a letter in which he seeks to prove that religious liberty is the greatest error and the gravest fault of modern times. According to the convictions of this honest prelate, Roman Catholicism has a Divine origin, founded on the most complete evidence, in such sort, that the heretics are inexcusable in refusing their adhesion to its teachings. Heresy deserves no indulgence, because it is always an act of wrong faith—a consequence of evil works. More than this, the State is charged with the protection of the truth—that is to say, of Popery. The chief mission which God has entrusted to the princes of the earth is to maintain the holy cause of the [Roman] Church, and to prevent the manifestations of error! When the secular power strikes the infidel or the heretic, it fulfils its duty! The misfortune of our epoch is the impossibility of practising these maxims; but it is to be hoped that better days will come! You must note that M. Doney is a favourite of Pius IX., who has conferred upon him the title of Roman Count.

The Charivari—a sort of Parisian Punch—has seized upon M. Doney's letter as an inexhaustible source of sarcastic epigrams. It pretends that this amiable bishop has the intention of lighting up eighty-nine funeral piles on French soil—one pile for each department—and that on these he will burn, to the singing of litanies, all the Protestants, all the Jews, all the disciples of Voltaire, all the pamphleteers, all the journalists; and that, after this auto-da-fé, our country will present a spectacle of perfect felicity!

MANDATE OF THE BISHOP OF TARBES RESPECTING AN APPARITION OF THE VIRGIN.

A peasant girl of thirteen or fourteen, living in the little town of Lourdes, and named Bernadette Soubirons, fell, some time since, into a state of ecstasy, and declared that she had extraordinary visions. She retired into a grotto, at the gates of the town, and there entered into communication with supernatural beings, in particular with the Virgin Mary. She pretended that the Virgin had appeared to her under the aspect of a beautiful woman, with a white robe, a blue girdle, and shoes decorated with yellow silk; and that she had addressed to her a long discourse. Bernadette repeated its sentences, word for word.

She was, without doubt, in a state of mental aberration. The poor young girl, who was simply foolish, and not guilty of premeditated fraud, ought to have been handed over to skilful physicians, who would have administered to her suitable remedies. But most of the inhabitants of the ancient province of Bearn are still very ignorant and superstitious. They ran together in crowds to the entrance of the miraculous grotto, and listened with avidity to the recitals of this idiot. The vicar of Lourdes, and the priests of the neighbourhood, instead of employing their influence to disabuse the deluded population, favoured pilgrimages to the grotto, and very shortly the visitors were numbered by thousands.

The public functionaries endeavoured to put an end to these demonstrations, which disturbed public order, and shocked good citizens. They made the parents of Bernadette responsible for the conduct of their daughter, and published police ordinances, prohibiting pilgrims from visiting the grotto. But what followed? When superstition is inflamed, of what avail is the authority of magistrates? Bernadette continued to describe the appearances of the Immaculate Virgin, joining to these accounts the most shocking or the most grotesque details, and the number of pilgrims was not diminished.

Now, M. Laurence, Bishop of Tarbes, has sanctioned, by a solemn act, this ridiculous monument of folly and credulity. "To respond," says he, in his mandate, "to the legitimate impatience of our venerable chapter, of the clergy, of the laity of our diocese, and of so many pious souls who have long called for a decision by the ecclesiastical authority . . . desiring also to satisfy the wishes of several of our colleagues in the episcopate, and of a large number of distinguished personages; after having sought the illumination of the Holy Spirit, and the assistance of the Holy Virgin, we have declared, and now declare, as follows: We are of opinion that the Immaculate Mary, Mother of God, really appeared to Bernadette Soubirons on the 11th February, 1858, and two following days, to the number of eighteen times, in the Grotto of Massavielle, near the city of Lourdes; that this appearance presents all the characteristics of truth, and that the faithful are warranted in giving to it implicit belief. . . . We authorise, in our diocese, the worship of Our Lady of the Grotto of Lourdes." In fact, on the 2nd of last February, the Bishop of Tarbes, accompanied by a grand cortège of priests, and followed by an immense multitude, repaired to the Grotto of Lourdes, after having celebrated the communion in the church of that town. Thus, the silly reveries and hallucinations of a little peasant girl have been declared by a bishop worthy of belief. What the authority of the magistrate had blamed and prohibited, as an occasion of disorder, the ecclesiastical authority approves and consecrates. This is a second edition of the miracle of La Salette. The priests will sing masses, distribute rosaries, sell miraculous water, perform all sorts of wonders, and fill their purses, at the expense of the credulous pilgrims.

EJECTION OF A RATIONALISTIC PASTOR.

A very significant fact has recently occurred in the [Protestant] Church of Cette, near Montpellier, in the department of Herault. At Divine service last Christmas, a young pastor of the negative school, M. Campredon, having taken for his text those words of our Lord, "I and my Father are one" (John x. 30), attacked and repudiated the doctrine of the personal divinity of Jesus Christ. He said that the unity attested in the text was simply a unity of sentiment—of love towards men, and not in any sense a unity of nature or of essence between the Father and the Son. M. Campredon attacked, at the same time, the idea of a supernatural revelation, and the miracles narrated in the Bible.

This sermon, which would have scandalised even the ancient Socinians, aroused deep indignation in the Protestant congregation of Cette. Many of the hearers left the church before the conclusion of the service. The Presbyterian Council, which was soon afterwards convoked, requested the young pastor to send in his resignation, and the latter dared not refuse what was thus required of him; but having reconsidered the matter, and consulted with some of his friends, M. Campredon withdrew his resignation. What was the result of this? First, the elections for the re-appointment of a part of the Presbyterian Council were entirely unfavourable to this young pastor and to his friends. Then, when M. Campredon next essayed to mount the pulpit, all the assembly rose up as one man and left the church, so that it was impossible to celebrate Divine worship. After this expression of public feeling, he felt that he must leave immediately. This is a serious warning for other Rationalistic pastors.

SPAIN.

THE PRISONERS FOR THE GOSPEL IN GRANADA.

We have hitherto felt it our duty to abstain from all reference to the mission to Madrid on behalf of the imprisoned brethren at Granada. The reasons for this silence having ceased to exist, we now give the statement upon the subject issued by the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance. The committee, we learn, are of opinion that, though this effort has not been crowned with immediate success, the facts afford ground for hope that their earnest wishes will ultimately be fulfilled. They state that already there is good reason to believe that, by what has been done, religious liberty in Spain has been greatly promoted.

GENERAL ALEXANDER'S MISSION TO MADRID.

Major-General Alexander, who, at the request of the British Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, and as the representative of the Conference of Christians of All Nations, held a few months since at Geneva, visited Madrid, to endeavour to obtain the liberation of the Spaniards imprisoned for reading the Bible, has just returned from his mission.

The object of the mission was not to excite public agitation, or to adopt any course which might wear the appearance of foreign interference with the laws of Spain—a point on which the people of that country are proverbially sensitive—but simply to seek for an act of Royal clemency towards the prisoners, especially towards Matamoros, Alhama, and Trigo, who have, solely on the ground of their religion, been condemned to the galleys, the first two for seven years, and the third for four years.

Through the kindness of several distinguished persons in this and other countries, the cordial, though unofficial, services of the Ambassadors of England, France, and Russia, were enlisted in this work of mercy. The Prussian Ambassador, though a Roman Catholic, had already made representations to the Spanish Government. Other valuable aid, Spanish and foreign, was also obtained. At the request of Sir John Crampton, Captain-General O'Donnell favoured General Alexander with an interview, at which he entered fully into the subject of the General's mission.

At that interview the General frankly stated the circumstances under which he was deputed to lay before his Excellency the expression of the principles and sentiments of his co-religionists, not in England only, but in France, Germany, Sweden, Holland, Switzerland, and other countries; that, although the arrangements for his mission had been made by a particular society, the cause was common to all Protestants.

General Alexander then presented to Captain-General O'Donnell a written statement of the object of his mission, and of the pleas adduced to obtain from the clemency of her Majesty the Queen of Spain the pardon of men who stand acquitted of all political and criminal offences, but who are condemned to the galleys for taking the sacred Scriptures as their rule of faith, and acting according to their conscientious convictions.

The Prime Minister was most courteous in his reception of General Alexander. He received very cordially the statement above referred to, together with a translation of a minute on the subject of the Spanish prisoners adopted by the Geneva Conference in 1861, and of lists of the nationalities represented at that Conference, and of many persons of note in Europe, known to be interested in the fate of men now suffering for conscience' sake in prison, and over whom impends the dread sentence of labour in the galleys.

The Duke of Tetuan, while stating the obstacles to General Alexander's object, expressed his satisfaction with the manner in which it had been sought to promote it, and promised to submit the papers presented to him to his colleagues in office. He made some remarks upon Spain being less intolerant than was generally supposed; adding, that though she would allow nothing like dictation or foreign interference, still her Government was considerate of moral influences and of fair representations that came properly before them. He observed, that though he could hold out no hope of an immediate favourable result, yet, if the object was to be gained, the course adopted was the best that could have been pursued for the purpose. In the course of his remarks the Captain-General alluded, in a gratifying manner, to his own Irish origin, and spoke in very complimentary terms of the army to which the General belongs, and of the Sovereign whom it is his honour to serve.

The final result of this interview will be anxiously waited for by Protestants throughout Europe and America.

General Alexander took occasion to lay before the Prime Minister a copy of the British memorial, signed by most of the Bishops and men of high standing in both Houses of Parliament, to the Protestant Government of Sweden, petitioning the Crown to remit the punishment of exile then recently inflicted on persons who had become Roman Catholics, and to change so barbarous a law. The prayer, it is well known, has been complied with.

It cannot but be hoped that this mission has already had its effect. The prison doors are not yet opened; but a nation and Government like the Spanish will not be indifferent either to the respectful manner of the application, or to the universal anxiety with which the issue will be expected. The recent rapid progress of Spain is before Europe. The liberation of Matamoros and his fellow-prisoners will be a guarantee of its solidity and its permanence.

The following is the substance of a letter addressed by Manuel Matamoros to the committee of the Evangelical Alliance at Paris. The letter is dated "Prison of the Audiencia, Granada, December 30, 1861 :—

LETTER FROM MATAMOROS.

After fifteen months of harassing detention, and continued and inhuman espionage, the sentence of the Inferior Tribunal has just been notified to me; this sentence awards the penalty of seven years of the galleys, and of perpetual civil disability, with costs. My companion in captivity, M. Albama, has been also condemned to seven years of the galleys, and my other companion to four years of the same penalty. The others against whom the Public Prosecutor demanded the penalties of four and seven years of the galleys have been acquitted and dismissed, without costs. Several others who have fled have been also condemned for contumacy to four years at the galleys; but some among them being in the United States, and most of them having assumed other names, the sentence cannot affect any of them. The crime for which I am condemned to seven years of the galleys is that of attempting to abolish or change, in Spain, the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion, an offence provided for in Article 128 of the Penal Code, which is conceived in these terms :—

"Article 128.—The attempt to abolish or change in Spain the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion shall be punished with temporary imprisonment, and perpetual banishment if the culprit is a public functionary, and commits the offence in abuse of his authority. In the contrary case, the penalty shall be imprisonment mayor, and, in case of repetition of the offence, perpetual banishment."

You will see, honoured brethren, the second part of this article is applied to me, for the seven years of the galleys to which I am condemned are the minimum of the imprisonment mayor, which is applied to the extent of seven to twelve years. The penalty of perpetual civil disability and the payment of costs are added.

Dear and honoured brethren, . . . If this misfortune, which weighs down my country, deeply affects and saddens me, it is not thus, my dear friends, with the sentence which has fallen upon me. No, our enemies doubt it, perhaps, but I tell you, that you may tell the whole world, if you like, that this sentence causes me ineffable joy; that it is to me one of the most glorious facts in the poor history of my life; and that this joy, this glorious satisfaction, will increase in proportion to the share which falls to me of the sufferings of Christ. (1 Peter iv. 12, 13.)

. . . My penalty, in consequence of my delicate health, will be to me a penalty of death; but, my dear brethren, if I had, not one, but a thousand lives, I would sacrifice them all with Christian tranquillity on the altars of the holy cause of Jesus our Divine Redeemer. The perils which surround, or may yet surround me, are a small matter to me, who am only aspiring to the forgiveness of our Heavenly Father, following the way which His almighty hand has traced for me by means of His Son Jesus; the danger which my life incurs is for the good of my soul, and if, to manifest to wanderers the way of eternal life, I am to suffer punishment from men, that punishment I make nothing of, for the reward offered by our gracious Father is the only one true and certain. (James v. 20.)

The Spanish Christian prisoners will not be forgotten, we hope, in our English prayer-meetings.

ITALY.

Florence, February 18, 1862.

THE ANSWER OF THE ITALIAN NATION TO THE PLEA OF THE POPE.

Greek has met Greek in Italy, and the tug of war goes forward. The nation has resolved that the temporal sovereignty of the Pope shall cease. Antonelli and the Court of Rome have determined that the Papacy shall not bate one tittle of its pretensions, nor yield one square foot of its patrimonial domain. A great deal of shuffling and trickery has hitherto entered into the diplomacy of the civil and the Jesuitism of the ecclesiastical combatants; but now the arena has been narrowed; the foes are face to face and hand to hand; and the struggle draws to a close. "No concession!" is the motto of either party; so that momentous events are looming in the distance. The Government has strengthened its position, by submitting this perplexed question to several of the leading universities, obtaining from all of them the reply that the monarchical powers of the Pope are in no sense necessary to his position, dignity, and influence, as spiritual head of the Church

The Pope, on the other hand, under cover of the canonization of twenty-three Japanese martyrs, has called to Rome in May next the bishops of the Catholic world, in order, it is said, to raise the "temporal power" to the place of a dogma—sacred and superior to all discussion—in presence of which every true believer must bow the knee in respectful adoration. Whatever may be the final resource of the nation, this is to be the last resort of the Pope; and it will over-ride all such paltry arguments as precedents which may be cited touching cessions of territory by previous occupants of the chair of St. Peter. Though Antonelli enjoys a most unenviable fame, one cannot but admire the firmness and vigour with which, even at the eleventh hour, when every hope of aid has fled, he repeats the famous dictum, "Non possumus." . . . The position of the parties has been made clear by recent occurrences. The Marquis Lavalette, the French ambassador at Rome, lately received very definite instructions to urge the Pope to solve the Roman question, which threatens to involve the peace of Europe. He courageously discharged his mission at the Vatican, and was answered by Antonelli, who, despite his antecedents and character, has in his hands at this critical moment, strange to say, the interests of the most unscriptural, persecuting, and pretentious hierarchy the world has ever seen. The defiant reply substantially was: "We cannot. The present Pope cannot, nor can any successor of his. No more can the College of Cardinals, nor any general council. It is true we are not at one with the Cabinet of Turin, but we are in excellent harmony with Italy. The Pope is an Italian, and the first of Italians, and the Italians are with the Pope." The Cardinal Secretary of State doubtless hoped that this subtle fallacy would not see the light, at least until the poison it contained had done its work. Fortunately, the details of this interesting interview were published to the world, and the people gave an immediate and unmistakable refutation to the falsehood, that the "Italians were with the Pope." There is not a town or village throughout the length and breadth of the Peninsula which during the last fortnight has not had its demonstration. Residents in Italy have been accustomed for two years back to processions, and flags, and national music. But this last eclipsed all former ones by its spontaneity, respectability, unanimity, and entire absence of Government interference. The people of Italy have stood up as one man to re-echo, with brazen throat and stentorian lung, the watchword on their streaming banners, on their hats, on the walls of the towns, 'Long live Rome, the Capital of Italy! Down with the Pope-King!'

A PROBABLE ISSUE OF THE PRESENT CONFLICT.

But there is another question quite as important, which the Government and people seem to have answered in a way satisfactory to themselves, without submitting it to the decision of any learned men—Can the King and Pope live together within the walls of the Eternal City? Will the spiritual and temporal jurisdictions co-operate peacefully for the welfare of Italy? Is it possible for the Papacy and civil liberty to go hand in hand, or even to co-exist and make progress in the same country? Not a doubt of it, say the rulers and the ruled. I fear the Colleges of Germany and England would give a very different response, were their judgment consulted on the matter. The page of history has been writ in vain, if anything beyond a temporary pacification can take place between Rome and freedom. Does not the Papacy, with all its glaring inconsistencies and external accommodations, retain now, as ever, its essential characteristics? and do we not foresee that the troubled future of Italy will but furnish one other proof of the fact? How can the liberty of the subject be secure, or the respect for law be maintained, if the Pope and his cardinals, and all their minions, are not to be made amenable to the tribunals of their fellow-men? Will the Pope obliterate all the allocations pronounced against the Bible Society, quietly abolish the Index Expurgatorius, and see the Romans buying, selling, and reading the Word of God? Is it supposed that Rome, by the law of the land, can be barred against the entrance of heresy? Or is the Holy Father mildly to look from his windows at the Protestant churches, and cordially to tolerate his former subjects, who throng their gates, without fear of prison or petty persecution? Impossible! say the sons of Britain, who have some experience to guide their decision, and who now look on Italy as the most interesting of mission-fields, because of this pending conflict. So inimical are the interests of Pope and people, and so heartily is each party embarked in the struggle for its sovereign rights, that issues of far greater magnitude than have yet appeared must arise from the contest. The Lord's work may be a short one in Italy, or half a century may elapse ere the victory is declared; but our conviction is strong that either the Pope will once more, by force or fraud, regain his former sway, at the expense of the patriotic aspirations of young Italy; or, with God's blessing, the civil and religious liberty of the land, rooted in the hearts of the nation, will sweep away every vestige of Papal authority, spiritual as well as temporal. It is in prospect of such eventualities that a silent, but steady, preparation is taking place among those who are on the Lord's side here, and that appeals for strong support find their way across the English Channel. The work of God in Italy has been truly wondrous in our eyes for some time back, but it needs no prophetic gift to see that we are on the threshold of a series of events, of which the present crisis has been but the prelude and note of warning.

THE GOVERNMENT OPPOSING PROTESTANTISM.

In pursuit of its aim, the Government is strong in its opposition to Protestantism. Rome is the only city which all parts of Italy will recognise as capital; and it must be had at any cost. The orders from Turin, which permeate the rank and file of liberal leaders of the masses, are to quell every riotous proceeding, and show that right is might, and also to abstain from all anti-Papal sentiments in religion, so as not to afford the slightest ground of murmuring on the part of the Pope. This was the policy of Cavour, who only tolerated Protestantism as a logical necessity, as one of the indisputable elements of constitutional freedom, and who was highly displeased with the Waldenses for leaving their valleys and exercising their newly-accorded rights in evangelizing the fertile plains and populous seashores of the South. Though often appealed to do so, as a means of bringing the Pope to terms, and providing a subsistence for honest and liberal priests, Cavour never would sanction the scheme for alienating the parochial revenues of the Church, and leaving to the parishioners the choice of their priests, who should enjoy undisturbed all the emoluments of the benefice. Almost every act of Garibaldi, when conquering Dictator at Naples, was ratified, at whatever expense, by the Cabinet in Turin; but Gavazzi was turned out of the large Church of the Jesuits—freely granted to him—and in which he thundered his thrilling eloquence, and the hated Jesuits were restored to place and influence. And at this hour there are from 400 to 500 liberal and reforming priests in Naples alone, for whom the Government and King, though often pleaded with, will do nothing to keep them from starving. These are only a few out of many cases which show the anxiety and sincerity of the Government in its proposals to the Pope, which are about to be renewed by Ricasoli in a still more acceptable and definitive form.

The other subject of frequent discussion, as to the probable loss or gain of the Papacy—when shorn of temporal power, and confined to the exercise of spiritual functions—does not much concern us; for it does not appear that the Papacy ever will submit to be so restrained. The present bearing of Pio Nono is aut Caesar aut nullus. Doubtless any skillfully-arranged combination would cause wide Italy to rejoice exceedingly, as the feigned liberal schemes which inaugurated the present pontificate were hailed, when even the Jews in large numbers believed the Messiah had at last appeared, and proposed to send deputations to express their delight and submission. No doubt a thrill of sympathy and acquiescence would quicken with gladness the pulse of Christendom, and the chains of superstitious might, for a time, be rivetted faster than ever, and the Evangelical cause have to struggle with a tide of most untoward influences; but with the departure of the worldly power, which has so long bolstered up the spiritual, the sway of the Pope over the head and heart would speedily weaken. When police, and prisons, and excommunications, were no longer dreaded, religious thought would be free of all restriction, and the slavish reverence for the "Man of Sin" would cease. At any rate, the tenacity with which the Pope clings to his temporalities seems to argue that he is of the same opinion.

THE PROSECUTIONS AGAINST GAVAZZI AND OTHERS.

With regard to the four prosecutions mentioned in my last letter, you will hear with pleasure that the colporteur, Rocchiccioli, after suffering five days of imprisonment, has obtained permission to sell Evangelical books outside of the Palazzo Riccordi, in a central thoroughfare of Florence. The suit against Gregori, at Lucca, is not now likely to be carried on, as the legal time within which a second citation should be issued has elapsed. No more has been heard of the process against Gavazzi, who has boldly published, with a stirring preface, the three addresses which formed the gravamen of the charge. The topics are very inviting: "The Canonical Power of the Papacy," "The Spiritual Power of the Papacy," and "A Free Church in a Free State." Signor Gavazzi is about to resume his meetings, having relinquished the idea of going to Naples, in prospect of a Garibaldian enterprise in the North in spring. It is deeply regretted by many friends of the Evangelical work that Signor Gavazzi should not be able to see his way to abstain entirely from all political allusions, and employ his acknowledged ability in preaching the Gospel of Christ, which in late years he has heartily espoused. No greater service could be rendered to the cause of truth than the flying visits of such an expounder of Bible truth and Papal unrighteousness to all the great centres of thought and commerce in Italy.

Mr. Ribet, in Leghorn, has been condemned to five days' imprisonment, but has appealed to a higher court, where the judgment is likely to be reversed, as I strongly hinted, owing to the altered political circumstances. With unfeigned gratitude we hear that the bigoted Governor of Leghorn, Biscossi, has been removed from his post; and we earnestly trust that a liberal magistrate, representing the spirit of the present movement, will be appointed in his stead. His dismissal arrived on the very day that he had caused to be seized, under priestly instigation, seventy copies of a beautiful picture, at the Evangelical dépôt, drawn up by Napoleon Roussel, representing the Church of Rome judged by the Word of God, and referred to in your January number. As this print has been more than three months in circulation, no legal step could be taken against it. Hitherto, no reprisals have been made on the priests by the Evangelicals; but a young man of good position, who has recently joined Mr. Ribet's church, burning with shame at the onesidedness of all the seizures and prosecutions, went, on his own responsibility, and informed against a certain priestly pamphlet, which had neither author's nor printer's name attached, and yet was being vended in the streets with impunity. He judiciously went to a liberal magistrate, who at once ordered the seizure of every copy, and has thrown consternation into the enemy's camp.

PROTESTANT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

The Evangelicals can now boast of two "schools of the prophets." The first is the Waldensian, removed from La Tour to Florence eighteen months ago, and occupying the Salviati Palace, obtained as a free gift through the great exertions of Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, among liberal friends at home. Dr. Revel and Mr. Geymonat are the Professor's men, of whom any Church of Christ might be proud. The former devotes himself to Church history, and the latter to dogmatic theology, while teachers of elocution, singing, &c., join in preparing the twelve students for their future work of organising and conducting meetings with ability and success. There are five young men from the Valleys in attendance, two Neapolitan priests, and two natives of Leghorn, one of whom is a converted Jew.

The other Theological Academy has been recently opened at Genoa, under the care of Dr. De Sanotis and Mr. Mazzarella. A programme of the course of study is shortly to be printed. There are at present five students under instruction, one of whom is a thoroughly-trained scholar, fitted for town labour, another is an humble countryman, destined, after receiving a suitable education, to preach in the rural districts. The other three are the firstfruits of Dr. De Sanotis' Bible-schools, already so flourishing in Milan, Turin, and Genoa, and which is purposed to extend over the country, as the rapidly-increasing funds of these well-known and popular schools will allow. Dr. De Sanotis takes the branches of Church history and doctrinal theology, while Mr. Mazzarella is occupied with exegetics and criticism. Let us hope that from these two seminaries a large band of preachers will go forth to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation.

THOUGHTS OF UNION BETWEEN THE WALDENSES AND THE ITALIAN FREE CHURCH : OBSTACLES IN THE WAY.

A very strong feeling has been expressed in several quarters lately in favour of a union between the Waldenses, who in such a case would drop their historic name, and the Free Italian Church. It must be admitted that union, which merely for its own sake is not desirable in Protestant countries, would be very much so here, owing to the bitter prejudice which Roman Catholics have against a divided Protestantism. Men who are well inclined to a reform movement in Italy express openly their surprise that Christian men, among whom there is no real difference, but a most thorough concord on all essential points, cannot unite their scattered forces in the present important juncture of affairs. It would also be very gratifying to committees and private Christians in England, who desire to aid the cause of our Saviour here, but who cannot appreciate the differences, nor enter into the petty rivalries of the various parties at work. The most weighty argument is certainly the case of an increasing number of men in Naples, and other towns, whom God has led into His service, and who are doing, each in his sphere, a good work, who would willingly rally round the standard of a United Italian Evangelical Church, but will not attach themselves either to the Waldensian Church or the Brethren. Apart, however, from mere personal feeling (for both Dr. De Sanotis and Mr. Mazzarella at one time joined the Waldensian Church, and afterwards left it), which in course of time would pass away, if it has not done so already, there are other obstacles towards such a consummation. As the Waldensian Church existed long before the Reformation, and is not, therefore, a Protestant Church, no difficulty exists on the score of the name, which is such a bugbear to Italian Christians. It is admitted by them that they protest even more strongly than English Christians ever did, and that the name Protestant was not chosen, but fixed, volens volens, upon the Reformers and their friends, so that at last they felt obliged to adopt it, as the Italians, unable to escape from the designation, will likely some day do. It is admitted that the feeling against the name is a mere prejudice, raised for their own ends by the priests, and that it is but a generic title, which requires the addition of "Evangelical" properly to express the standing of Bible Christians, and yet the term is eschewed and scouted both in written and spoken addresses, with a vehemence and speciality which, to an English auditor, are unintelligible. Nor is the real difficulty in the way of union that the Waldenses, as supposed by some, are foreigners, for geographically they are on the Italian side of the Alps, and in every breathing time of liberty they have carried the truth over the land as far south as Calabria, and are withal so ancient, that, other things being equal, the Italian of the midland or southern parts might rather be expected warmly to espouse the cause of a persecuted Evangelical Church, and to justifyable pride in unfurling everywh her old and honoured banner. The real obstacle to union is the ecclesiastical form and the Calvinistic teaching of the Alpine Church. The "Brethren," long burdened with a grievous bondage of forms, entertain a very natural repugnance to a fixed Church government; and thus have laid themselves open to the charge of disorder and Plymouthism, though they have deacons and elders, both teaching and preaching, in every congregation, and are gradually consolidating into a united body. They also feel that anything like a confession of faith would for the present be premature, and love to contrast disparagingly, to the no small amazement of English Christians, the theology of the schools with that of the Bible. In these circumstances, the dictate of good sense and Christian prudence is, to leave to time and kindly intercourse the healing of any breaches of friendship which have taken place, and to pray God abundantly to bless all labourers in the Italian vineyard, and to show them more and more the vast field of twenty-six millions of souls open for evangelization, and the comparatively feeble and divided agency which is at work against the common enemy, and for the attainment of the common aim. The Waldenses will certainly never be ignored by Christendom. No more will the labours of the Free Italian Church be unrecognised wherever the cause of God is at heart. Should the desire for union not spring up and mature among themselves in course of years, no external pressure or persuasion can ever avail. There is no reason why Italy should not have her various faithful churches of Christ, any more than England or Scotland. Should a violent rupture take place in the relations of Pope and King, there is every likelihood that an Episcopal State Church will be created (as at the Reformation in England), and there are even now abundance of priests—liberal and, in some measure, reforming—who would gladly join her communion. Instead of union, we may possibly hear of further disunion among the brethren in connexion with the establishment of the Genoa Theological Academy, unless, as we hope, the deservedly great influence, personal and doctrinal, of Dr. de Sanctis and Mr. Mazarella should succeed in overcoming the scruples of those who object to training for the ministry, in establishing sound views on the Sabbath question, and in eliminating certain erroneous views as to the impeccability of Christians, which have crept in unawares into the Churches.

PROTESTANT "MUTUAL HELP" SOCIETIES.

In several Italian congregations "Mutual Help" Societies have been recently formed. This is another evidence of progress. To help oneself is the sure course to ensure the ready support of others. In Florence the society is like that of the "Protestant Sou" at Paris, for $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-week is the contribution levied by collectors from each member. In Leghorn the weekly payment is 1d. The Popish calumny is that each Evangelical is paid so much a-day, and doubtless some have been attracted from this belief, and found out the untruth. . . . And yet it has been very difficult, discriminatingly and irreproachably, to dole out the charitable offerings of the liberal. That there have been many cases of men and women who, as soon as they were known to frequent the Bible readings, were thrown out of employment, or might as well have shut their shops for all the business they were able to do, has been well known, while it is not possible to deny that a mean, dependent spirit has been, in other cases, fostered among some who had no claim to share in the funds provided for the genuine poor. These Mutual Help Societies, for a trifling weekly sum, ensure a good allowance in time of sickness or loss of employment, as well as the attentions of an excellent physician. Friends who wish to relieve distress among the converts will be able to give their donations through the medium of the "Mutuo Soccorso" Society, and to know that their benevolent intentions are carried into effect.

PROGRESS OF EVANGELIZATION.

Every week brings us tidings of some new station happily opened for evangelization, such as Cecina, on the coast, or Modena, in the interior, the details of which would be tedious, but which prove the advancing character of the work. The Lord speed the day when Christian worship shall be established permanently in every town and hamlet, and when truth shall possess the whole land! . . . The old stations send good reports of progress. Mr. Appia, after public and private discussions, tumults and threats, still keeps his ground in Palermo. In Naples, the evangelists Albarella, Cerivini, and Cresi, have large audiences. The interest awakened in the Gospel has not lessened in the little island of Elba, where, last summer, it had such free course. The valley of the Arno is well watered, the congregations in Florence, Pisa, and Leghorn, holding on prosperously. In addition to the large Waldensian Church, there are about 400 communicants among the Brethren in Florence, who meet in two large halls for worship. The hearers of Mr. Meille in Turin abound in every good work of Christian and benevolent activity. At Milan, Mr. Turin, of the Waldensian, and two evangelists of the Free Italian Church, Logomarsino and Bassele, continue to have three very large réunions, though the clergy of the town, and of Lombardy generally, as in olden times, are on the popular side in the "temporal power" controversy. The Bible and religious book depôts are also in readiness for the hour of Venetia's liberation. At nearly all these places there are English or Scotch ministers, who aid most serviceably the enterprise. Ancona will shortly possess one in the person of the Rev. Theodore Meyer, a converted German Jew, and missionary of the Free Church of Scotland. There are other two central points as yet unoccupied, of extreme importance for evangelization purposes, whither, I trust, the steps of two godly, devoted, energetic young men of our home churches will speedily be directed—namely, Palermo, with the whole island of Sicily, as populous as Scotland, and Bologna, still the first university town of Italy, lying midway between Turin and Ancona, on the Italian Central Railway, and shortly to form the half-way station on an interesting line from Florence to Venice. Bologna is the leading town in the Marches, the immense plains stretching from the Apennines to the shores of the Adriatic, and is surrounded, at short distances, by a cluster of towns of ancient note, Parma, Modena, Reggio, Ferrara, Forlì, and Ravenna, where a considerable number of foreign merchants are ready to welcome the occasional visits of a minister of the Gospel.

EVANGELICAL LITERATURE.

Evangelical literature increases daily on our hands. A beautiful edition of Leighton, on the "First Epistle of Peter," has just been published by the Geneva Society. The Letture di Gamiglia, a periodical started in Genoa lately, on the model of the Leisure Hour and Sunday at Home, in order to supply a healthy popular literature, continues its career of usefulness. The Dialogues of Dr. De Sanctis issue weekly from the Florentine Evangelical press. The early numbers are full of promise. No. I., on "Change of Religion," is admirably put, and meets a phase of Italian character which a stranger cannot appreciate. When every other opposition to truth fails, the impregnable citadel is resorted to, "Well, but I won't change my religion. Only vile people will sell their souls and disgrace their ancestry." It is not saying too much to assert that, in all fair reasoning, De Sanctis brings the proud fortress to an unconditional surrender. The "110 Considerations of John Valdes," a Spaniard who lived in Naples three centuries ago, and was the leader of a small, but influential band of noble Evangelicals, has reached us, printed in Saxony. The work is worthy, from its matter, antiquity, and curious history, to be placed alongside of Paleario, on the "Benefits of the Death of Christ," but for the Spanish phraseologies which blemish its style, and the erroneous doctrine of the Sixty-third Consideration, in which an excellent parallel between the Spirit and the Bible is carried to such extremes, that the plenitude of the Spirit in the believer is said to relieve him of the need of Bible teaching, as the entrance of sunlight into a room removes the need of candlelight.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, February 15, 1862.

AGITATION OF PARTIES.

The agitation of parties in Germany goes on increasing in a manner which would be fearful, if we did not see in it a sign of life, a promise for the future, which will one day be fulfilled, under the wise and powerful guidance of Him who directs all things—who holds the hearts of all men in His hands, and “turns them as the rivers of water are turned.” All questions, political, social, religious, theological, ecclesiastical, are debated in their respective organs with a constantly-increasing ardour; and (which in Germany is new) all these contested questions tend rather to escape from the domain of systems and of speculation, to be produced and realised upon the soil of actual facts and practical life. Thus, as your readers may have perceived from some of my recent letters, the popular reaction against clerical and absolutist tendencies in the Church is embodied in new ecclesiastical constitutions, which secure to the members of the Church a legitimate share of influence in its government. But as all reactions are liable to overshoot the mark, there is danger lest this reaction should, with the same aversion, confound the excesses of spiritual despotism with the sacred truths of the Gospel itself. It is further to be feared lest, in seeking to emancipate the Church, the chiefs of this movement should throw it into the hands of the masses, who will seek to fashion it according to their mind, which is far from being the mind of Christianity.

DR. ROTHE.

It is to allay these fears, and to justify his own share in framing the new ecclesiastical constitution of the Grand Duchy of Baden, that one of the most profound theologians of Germany, Dr. Rothe, a Professor in the University of Heidelberg, has just published a very remarkable work in one of our theological reviews. Dr. Rothe is known and held in high estimation for his noble character, his moderation, and his sincere piety, no less than for his learning and the profundity of his intellect. His new work, moreover, will make a profound impression in Germany; its object is to demonstrate that the small orthodox minority within the Church possesses not the requisite elements for the Christian regeneration of the people, inasmuch as it presents itself before them with formularies of another epoch, which they do not comprehend, pronouncing unbelievers all who do not admit these formulas, and thus constantly deepening the abyss which now separates between the nation and the Church. Dr. Rothe wishes that, instead of offering to the people an antiquated system, the Pietist party (of which he speaks elsewhere with much respect), would present to them Jesus—the living Jesus, full of compassion and of love—the Jesus of the Gospel—being convinced that we should then see many prejudices fall, and witness the development of many germs of piety which now lie torpid, without their needful aliment, in the recesses of men's hearts. But to do this, they must learn to condescend to approach these men as men and brethren, with the sympathy of charity, and not with clerical authority, which sees in them only adversaries.

These sentiments, and many others which I cannot analyse, will find a deep and universal echo. I deceive myself: the party which sees itself reproved by these verities has already maltreated Rothe in its journals, and will do so again, for Rothe is not orthodox, although profoundly Christian. It is even possible that this excellent man may, to some extent, deceive himself respecting the results of his views, all of which I am far from sharing. But his illusions are generous ones—the illusions of a pious heart; and if he errs on some points of doctrine, the spirit of which he speaks is assuredly more Evangelical than that which animates the polemics of his adversaries.

DR. HENGSTENBERG.

Amongst these adversaries, one of the most earnest and of the most respectable, as shown by the long struggles which he has maintained on behalf of the orthodox doctrine, against the errors of Rationalism, is Dr. Hengstenberg, of Berlin. Since he has thrown himself entirely into the arms of the ultra-Lutheran party we see, with deep regret, that he shows himself incapable of comprehending and of appreciating with justice the grand characteristics of the kingdom of God beyond the pale of that party. The Vorwort (preface) of his Evangelical Gazette, published at the commencement of this year, supplies ample proof of this. From the general retrospect which he makes of the events of the preceding year, I will reproduce some of his opinions. This is the best means of giving some idea of the tendencies of a party.

Naturally, the assemblies of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, one of the most notable religious events of the past year, are here brought up for judgment. Let us say, with reference to the language of Dr. Hengstenberg, that in general he has spoken on this subject with less bitterness and injustice than he showed respecting it on the occasion of the assemblies at Berlin. This is an advance of which we must take account. Nevertheless, he has not learned to see, in the spirit of the Alliance, that characteristic, so purely Evangelical, of combined truth and charity, embracing in the same love all who are "born of God," to whatever nationality and section of the Church of God they may belong. He can see only "hatred" in those who have deplored those narrow, exclusive, sectarian tendencies which still manifest themselves in the Church. He can see in that religious liberty which the Alliance so pre-eminently advocates only connivance with the revolutionary spirit.

The civil war which desolates America furnishes the Professor of Berlin with an opportunity of severely blaming the Christians of the United States and of England, on account of their efforts for the abolition of slavery. He justifies from the Scriptures this abominable iniquity, believing that we must patiently await its end as the result of the progress of a Christian spirit amongst the masters and the slaves. He affirms that emancipation, where it has taken place, has produced only ill results!

The events of Italy inspire him only with a malediction pronounced in the language of the prophets against those who extend their frontiers. Certainly, no Christian approves revolutions in themselves; those who bring them about will render account to God of their motives. But ought we not to look much higher than men and their passions, and see in such events the just judgments of God, who accomplishes the purposes of His eternal wisdom by these great conflicts of the nations? If He wishes us to respect the rights of princes, why should He have no concern for the sufferings of millions of their subjects, degraded, body and soul, under a yoke which has kept them in darkness for so many centuries? Must He for ever allow His Word to be extinguished beneath superstitions, and men's consciences to be oppressed by the most violent persecutions? Where would be His justice and His mercy if the blood of His saints, shed in torrents for centuries, should never find retribution? The Lord reigneth!—this is the true commentary on the events of history; and, after all, if we descend again from these heights of the Divine government, to regard only the actions of men, and to pronounce a malediction on them, what dynasty is there in all Continental Europe on which that malediction would not fall, if called down by its extension of frontiers? Whence comes the kingdom of Prussia itself? Why does it possess Silesia, and its own share of Poland and other provinces? Will time alone justify that which is unjust? The Lord reigneth!—this is the sovereign response. I will not insist on other opinions of the Berlin Professor which have arrested my attention, because these are the opinions of an entire religious party. I will only say further that the ecclesiastical events of the Grand Duchy of Baden, and all who have taken part in them, are condemned with a bitterness which does injustice both to those who yield to it, and to those who are its objects. This is not the spirit of Jesus Christ.

SIGNS OF A RETURN TOWARDS MORE MODERATE VIEWS.

For the rest, we must allow that there are, in the extreme party of the Lutheran Church designated by the title of Confessional, signs, by no means equivocal, of a return towards moderation and towards Evangelical truth. Thus the professors of theology of the University of Erlangen, who are amongst the most powerful supporters of this party, are also now the foremost in combating its semi-Catholic tendencies. In the last number of the Zeitschrift (a theological review), which is published by these professors, there is a long article, the object of which is to refute, point by point, these errors of German Puseyism. The weight and authority which their learning, their piety, and their position in the Church, give to these men, will exert an immense influence in a direction at which one cannot but heartily rejoice. It were impossible that the noble Evangelical Church which bears the name of Luther should allow itself to be led astray by a party into paths so opposed to the salutary teachings of the Reformation.

And this is not the only sign of the times which confirms this conviction. There are in Prussia certain associations (Vereine), the object of which is to break the union of the two Churches (officially connected since 1817), and to re-establish the Lutheran Church in its primitive condition, under the triple relations of doctrine, of worship, and of constitution. Nothing can be more legitimate in itself. The union ought never to have been established by a Royal ordinance without the consent of the two Churches. In seeking to unite, the Government of that day has disunited them. Unhappily, the spirit of this disunion prevails too much in the efforts of the associations of which I have spoken; and this fact has stamped them with sterility. They have a journal, edited by the Rev. Pastor Wangemann, which, at the commencement of this year, published an article full of the most melancholy lamentations respecting the total want of activity, devotedness, and liberality, in these associations. It charges them with unwillingness to make any sacrifice for their cause; and it pronounces on the other sections of the Church judgments much more moderate, more mild, and more fraternal, than those to which we have been accustomed! Here, too, light is spreading, and it is the dawn of the day when "truth in love" shall prevail.

Elsewhere, too, this day is appearing, although under features less gratifying. There have been, for many years, several small Lutheran communities separated from the National Church, and separated in virtue of their principles, which they had the courage to put into practice, because their consciences would not permit them to remain in the United Church. We must respect all who obey the dictates of conscience, even though it be deceived. Unhappily, the clerical tendencies which prevail in these communities, and especially in its Consistory, which holds its sittings at Breslau, have not been slow to produce their fruits. The pastors and their flocks have had to complain of the spiritual despotism of the Consistory; and, after several skirmishes, a separation within this separated body has been effected with éclat this last year. We cannot but regret this, for we are assured that some of these communities possess vital godliness, notwithstanding the narrowness of their view. But when certain principles produce their natural results in open day, there is always an advantage gained for the truth. God makes use of all things for the advancement of His Church towards the ultimate end whither He is conducting it—namely, the realisation of that promise, "They shall be one flock, under one Shepherd."

PRUSSIAN DIPLOMACY AT CONSTANTINOPLE AND AT MADRID.

I will conclude by reference to two facts of a nature altogether different, and which also have their lessons. A chapel has just been inaugurated at Constantinople for the use of the Prussian Legation, and of a small German community in the same city. The pastor who preached at the opening of this chapel—the Rev. —Pischou, who is both chaplain to the Prussian Legation, and minister of this little church—thought fit to conclude his discourse by exhorting his hearers, beginning with his Excellency the Ambassador himself, to attend more regularly on public worship. His language, which is before us, was, undoubtedly, very direct and personal, but in no way unbecoming. However, the Ambassador, Count Goltz, was offended at this exhortation (of which, it seems, he stood in need), and complained of it to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, by telegram, ordered the deprivation of M. Pischou. The Ambassador directed him to leave immediately, in the depth of winter, notwithstanding his protests that he was subject, not merely to the Ministry of State, but to the superior Ecclesiastical Council, which was the authority to which he was more directly and immediately amenable. It remains to be seen what this latter body will do for the protection of a faithful minister of the Word of God, who may, perhaps, have been wanting in prudence, but who was far from having merited this ignominious treatment. This fact has produced a deep and painful sensation in Germany.

The correspondence from Berlin, which gives this narrative amongst many others, and quotes the very words of the pastor, appends to it the following considerations, of which every one will feel the justice and the force:—

“How much, in the interests of the Evangelical Church, the choice of certain personages in Prussian diplomacy is to be deplored, may be seen in Spain, where the condemnation to the galleys of the Evangelical martyrs calls for the energetic intervention of the greatest Powers of the Continent. Our Ambassador there, Count Galen, is not only a Catholic, but an Ultramontanist. He takes part, with ostentation, in processions, and maintains friendly relations with the same ecclesiastical dignitaries who provoke these judgments against the heretics. Let us hope that the European Powers, who have intervened, with perfect unanimity, on behalf of two men who are traitors to their country, on account of a violation of the laws of nations (Mason and Slidell), will conclude by protesting also against the conduct of a Government which tramples under foot both the principles of Christianity and those of all civilisation. We expect from Prussia, in particular, that she will demand, without delay, the pardon of these condemned Spaniards, and the repeal of the laws in virtue of which they have been condemned. And if this demand, made in the interests of Christianity and of humanity, should be rejected by the Spanish Government, we trust that Prussia will immediately suspend her diplomatic relations with a Power which acts upon principles which the Grand Turk himself no longer tolerates.”

INDIA.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER AT MADRAS—THE NEW BISHOP—PROGRESS IN THE WORK OF MISSIONS.

Madras, December 28, 1861.

The “Missionary Conference” at Madras have adopted the proposal of the Evangelical Alliance for a Union of Prayer, on the second week in January; and a committee from the Conference, with three clergymen of the Church of England, and one of the Established Church of Scotland, have prepared and published a plan for the services of that week in this city.

There is to be a General Convocation for Prayer, on Monday evening, at the Banqueting-hall, and another for thanksgiving at the same place, on Saturday evening. The bishop presides at the first meeting. There are also to be meetings in different localities, convenient for the English-speaking population, on each of the intervening days. At these various meetings ministers of all denominations are to take part.

There are also to be daily meetings through the week, in Tamil, for the native Christians in different parts of the city and vicinity. At the closing meeting of these convocations, in the principal vernacular of the Presidency, the Bishop is also to preside.

We have great reason to be thankful that the Lord has sent to this Presidency a bishop willing to attend such meetings. For some time, about the period when t appointment of a bishop was to be made, it was an occasional subject of prayer at the "Union Weekly Prayer Meeting," under the general direction of the Missionary Conference, that a truly good and godly man might be put into the office. I do not doubt it was a subject of much prayer in England also.

There is real progress in the work of missions in India, though we cannot often say here that "the kingdom of God cometh with observation." It is in most parts of this great country but seed time at the best; but in some places the harvest is beginning to be gathered. There was a good work of the Spirit in some parts of Tinnevely the last year (though somewhat marred here and there by the enemy, who sowed tares), and many souls were brought into the kingdom. In some places the work has been continued to the present time. The same Spirit has wrought savingly, also, in different villages of the Madara district, and in Travancore; and with real power, if less manifest, at nearly all the mission stations in the Presidency.

Still, the Preparatory Work, by Education and Itineracy, is more important, perhaps, than that of actual conversion, so far as yet manifested! There is a "preparation of condition" for the coming of the Spirit, by the means mentioned, and the free circulation of the Bible and tracts, which must tell wonderfully when that blessed "Spirit is found out from on high."

Yours most truly in the Gospel,

M. WINSLOW

AMERICA.

DR. BAIRD ON THE TRENT DIFFICULTY.

The following extracts are from a letter by the Rev. Dr. Baird, dated "New York, January 15, 1862," and laid before the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, February 13. The extracts exhibit the view taken by the writer and others in America of the affair of the Trent; and express the gratitude of our Transatlantic brethren at the course adopted by the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance with reference to this matter:—

... You may be interested to learn that I have given public lectures on the great Conference of the Alliance at Geneva, in many of our important cities (including New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Hartford, Norwich), and several smaller ones, and often to large assemblies. And I hope to repeat this account of that Conference in ten or twelve more places before the spring, if possible. Whilst at the Conference, and afterwards whilst in Europe, I wrote full accounts of it for several of our most widely-circulated religious and secular papers.

These letters have been copied into many other papers; so that never before has our religious public been so extensively informed of the nature and importance of this great Evangelical movement.

Since I came home I have written some brief sketches of the personnel of the Conference, in two letters to the Presbyterian, one of our best religious papers, published at Philadelphia.

... But enough of my doings. Let me speak of more important things. Within a week after my return the unfortunate affair of the Trent occurred. In common with many others, I saw that Captain Wilkes had committed a great mistake, in not bringing the ship in, to have her examined by a proper court—a procedure which our Government has for sixty years maintained ought always to be followed, for the simple reason that the captain of a ship ought never to be entrusted with so much power as that of searching a vessel and taking out of her men and things, as contraband of war, or for any other purpose. Indeed, too often, the captains of war-ships do not know enough of international law to decide on such difficult and delicate subjects. Our President and Secretary of State saw at a glance that Mason and Slidell, and their secretaries, must be given up, if England should demand it. And the thing has been done, and the nation entirely acquiesce cheerfully in the wisdom, as well as the necessity, of the act, instead of making a riot or a mob, as predicted would be the case, if the President should decide to give up the men.

... Let us be thankful for this interposition in the present exigency. I admire the noble course which your friends of the Evangelical Alliance have pursued, in calling on British-Christians to "besiege," if I may so speak, the Throne of Grace, that war might be averted. Be assured that this will never be forgotten by Christians in this land. Nor will the noble speeches of Newman Hall, Mr. Cassell, and many others (among them the Duke of Argyle), be forgotten.

... And now that this difficulty has been gotten over, let the Christian people on both sides of the Atlantic be more resolved than ever to do their utmost to repress future ill-feeling, as far as it may be in their power.

... Our hope is in God. Of one thing I am confident: by no possible reconstruction of our Government can slavery be made to have such an influence as it had in years gone by. For myself, I can only pray that this war may be so overruled, and brought to an end in such a manner, that the best interests of humanity and Christ's kingdom may be most effectually promoted. O! how blessed is the assurance that "the Lord reigns!"

I remain, as ever, yours very truly,

(Signed)

R. BAIRD.

A NEGRO CLERGYMAN ON THE AMERICAN CRISIS.

A negro clergyman of the American Episcopal Church, who graduated at Cambridge, writing to an English clerical friend, says:—

I understand well your feelings in England concerning this war. You want a moral element to be thrown into it. You would like to see some evidence that this nation has eyesight and insight enough to recognise God's hand in their afflictions. But you must remember that it is but seldom in history that national reformation and repentance are as prompt and punctual as you require. How often is it the case that the blow of God's wrath has been struck, and the remembrance of its infliction almost forgotten, ere a people have come to see its significance and teaching. Nations and people have to be educated up to a clear recognition of the punishment aspects of all sin. Just such is the education this nation is now receiving, and it is doing it good. The nation is improving. Upon the question of human rights there is a great advance. First, the rendering up of fugitives is now at an end. Second, the orders to the fleet are that no fugitives are to be sent back. Third, in the event of any military crisis or hazard, slaves are to be enrolled and turned into the ranks, and employed against the rebels. Fourth, all over the North the cry is "Down with slavery!" "If slavery is in the way of the Union, away with slavery!"

As things now stand, I go for the Government. I am anxious for the success of the Government. I pray the victory for the Government. Recognising as much as you do the shortcomings of the Government, yet at the same time tolerating human weakness and imperfection, I feel thankful for the progress already made. I fall back upon the measure of anti-slavery principle to which the Government was pledged, in its partisan character, on the eve of election, and I look forward with confidence to the deeper workings of those truths, which, since the war broke out, have become more and more pronounced and effective. And I regret very much that our English friends cannot take this view of the matter—a view which is essential to order, good government, and spiritual progress on this continent, for at least half a century to come. For while indeed thoroughly convinced and satisfied that a Government that is as a unit between the Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, and between the Atlantic and the Pacific, as a perpetual thing for the future, is a mere chimera; yet, on the other hand, nothing but chaos can be the result of a present actual disunion, cutting up the United States into three or four nationalities. If I were in England now I should surely preach and proclaim this everywhere, and strive to secure acquiescence in it as a black man's faith and hope and desire.

AUSTRALIA.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE—WEEK OF PRAYER—EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Our readers are aware that the great religious awakening has extended in some degree to the Antipodes. One indication of the fact is found in the existence, at Melbourne, of a periodical, small and unpretending indeed, but animated by the right spirit, entitled the Revival Record. From the number for December 16 we quote an extract—our readers will doubtless peruse with interest. The reference in the opening paragraph is to the Melbourne Evangelical Alliance:—

hour together for prayer and reading the Scriptures, on the morning of the first Wednesday of every month. After praise, the reading of a portion of God's Word, the offering of prayer by the brother presiding, and a few comments made from the chair in order to present suggestive and profitable topics, a free conversation takes place on the points mentioned, or on others that may suggest themselves. Controversial points are studiously avoided, and those that conduce to the cultivation of devotional and brotherly feeling are dwelt upon. The service is concluded by praise and prayer. A refreshing and improving influence pervades the meetings, and it is found to be a good and pleasant thing to meet together in unity. The presence of God has been often sensibly realised, and substantial benefit enjoyed.

No small amount of good, it is believed, has been accomplished through the instrumentality of this Christian brotherhood. If nothing more were done by its influence than smoothing asperities, drawing closer the bonds of holy fellowship, exciting to higher attainments in grace, magnifying the great principles of the Gospel which are common to all evangelical denominations, and bringing honour and glory to Christ Jesus, by a manifestation of the essential oneness of all the people of God, it would be no small cause of rejoicing. Besides these important results, this Christian Alliance originated the Union Prayer Meeting which has been held every week uninterruptedly in the Protestant Hall, for a period of two years. The fact that this meeting has passed into other management does not detract from the honour which belongs to the Alliance in giving it birth and sustaining it for a considerable time. The Alliance also arranged for the week of special prayer in the beginning of the present year, a season which will be long remembered for its hallowing and refreshing power. During the past year, a course of public lectures on religious subjects was also carried into effect. And now it has set on foot arrangements for assisting to follow out the proposal of the Alliance at home, to have another prayer-meeting all over the world during the week beginning the 5th January, 1862.

To this proposal we would earnestly direct the minds and hearts of our readers. Let every Christian, whether able to join in the public assembly or not, whether in the city or in the bush, be found earnestly wrestling with God in believing prayer at the throne of grace, that there may be a universal concentration of desire among all Christians throughout the colony and the whole world for spiritual blessing.

It is worthy of mention in connexion with the subject of successful prayer, that it was stated incidentally at a recent meeting of the Alliance that the only surviving explorer of the great Australian continent, King, had been made the subject of constant prayer in public and in private, during the period of his absence. His sister had made his preservation the subject of incessant supplication, and had also secured the intercessions of others on his behalf. At first sight it seems extraordinary that one who had no superiority to the others, either in point of strength or courage, or the treatment he received, should survive while they fell. Upon the principle that God hears and answers prayer, the explanation becomes easy.

NEW ZEALAND.

STATE OF RELIGION AT NELSON—CHRISTIAN YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATION—EFFORTS TOWARDS CHRISTIAN UNION—PROSPECT OF FORMATION OF AN EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

A correspondent at Nelson, New Zealand, writes under date of Dec. 12, 1861, as follows :—

I am happy to say that, through the blessing of our Heavenly Father, we have succeeded in building a room, 30 feet by 25 feet, for the Young Men's Christian Association, and opened it some little time since, free of debt, at a cost of about 120*l*. We have a good Bible-class Sabbath afternoons, with an average attendance of twenty-four to thirty-two, and we are not without evidence that the Lord is working with us—one young man especially having given himself to the Lord, and has joined the association; and other members have had their souls profited by the union and communion of various bodies of Christian brethren; and I hope before the end of 1862 to be able to report to Evangelical Christendom that we have an Evangelical Alliance in Nelson; we need it much, to unite the different bodies to each other. There is a better feeling than there was twelve months since; we have it in contemplation of holding a week of special services, as recommended by the Evangelical Alliance, commencing January 5, 1862. Should it take place, I will send you a report next mail. True religion is very low here; money-getting is the bane of all, both men of the world and men of the Church; but we are looking for the promise of the Spirit. Our prayers are continually going up to the Lord for the outpouring of His Spirit, and in due time we shall reap, if we faint not. Will you ask the prayers of the Christian readers of Evangelical Christendom for the Nelson Young Men's Christian Association, and for the people of Nelson, and you will greatly aid us in our efforts to do good in the cause of our blessed Redeemer?

TERCENTENARY MEMORIAL TO CALVIN.—A circular upon the subject has been issued by Dr. Merle d'Aubigné and other ministers at Geneva, calling attention to the resolution respecting it adopted by the Conference held in that city last September. They say: "You remember, we are sure, dear Sir, that one of us having spoken on Friday, Sept. 6, on the character of Calvin, the speaker reminded his audience that in two years and a-half (viz., May 27, 1864), the third centenary of the death of the great reformer would occur; and it was proposed that on that occasion the blessed work of the Reformation in the 16th century should be called to mind, and that to celebrate it some monument should be erected to the memory of the great doctor who did so much to restore the pure light of the Gospel to the Church. The nature of the monument was not determined, but the general proposition was agreed to by the assembly with cordial unanimity. It is because they would not forget these days of deliverance that our brethren united with us in voting a memorial to the reformer, and we should be happy to see you, dear Sir, and many other friends, here on the 27th of May, 1864, to celebrate with us the day on which (as is simply and nobly expressed in the registry of the Geneva Consistory) 'John Calvin went to God;' this short notice being the only mention made in that document of his death. The commemoration of Calvin's death should not, however, consist only in a meeting of Christian brethren. We contemplate something of a more durable character, and which might be a means of lasting good to future generations. A committee has, therefore, been formed of ministers and laymen, belonging partly to the National Church and partly to the Free Church, with the view of carrying out the resolution of September last, and this committee has commissioned us to write to you, dear Sir, to ask you to assist us in this work. We wish, in the first instance, to have your advice as to the kind of memorial which it would be well to erect, and also as to the use to which such an edifice should be assigned. . . . Our idea would be to erect, in some central situation, a hall for public meetings, and which might also be used for preaching the Gospel to the working classes. Ground-rent being high at Geneva, it is proposed to take advantage of the lower story for school-rooms, to accommodate week-day, Sunday, and evening schools. The building would thus become, with God's blessing, an instrument of evangelization in the district were it would be erected. The hall would occupy the central and principal place: above there might be committee-rooms, or smaller lecture-rooms, to be hired by some of our religious societies at a moderate charge. The site of this building would probably be on the Rive Gauche, at a short distance from the lake; it is the part of the town most in need of such a place of meeting. On the façade we propose having an inscription, something like the following: 'Salle de la Reformation. Elevés à la mémoire du Réformateur de Genève, JEAN CALVIN, par des Chrétiens Évangéliques de toutes nations, conformément au vœu exprimé dans les Conférences tenues à Genève en Septembre, 1861.'" The circular concludes by inviting advice and contributions on the part of those who are willing to co-operate in the work.

DEATH OF DR. DWIGHT, OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

—With profound regret we record the death, by sudden accident, of our highly-esteemed friend and correspondent, the Rev. H. G. O. Dwight, missionary of the American Board to Turkey. Dr. Dwight was killed on the Troy and Boston Railroad on Saturday, January 26. The Troy Budget of January 27 says: "A terrific gale swept over the town of Shaftesbury, Vermont, on Saturday morning, carrying everything before it. The Troy and Boston train, which left this city at 11:15 A.M. on Saturday, encountered this gale, which the engineer and conductor of the train say was the most terrible they ever experienced. As the train was about six miles above Bennington, in the town of Shaftesbury, and while passing over a piece of road that lies along an embankment thirty feet high, the wind actually detached a passenger and baggage car from their couplings, and precipitated them down the embankment. One passenger, whose name and residence were ascertained from papers on his person—the Rev. Dr. Dwight, of Boston—was instantly killed. Dr. Dwight was crushed in the chest, and had both arms broken when discovered. He had been connected with the American Board of Missions since 1832, and was much respected. He leaves three young daughters and two sons, chaplains in the Federal army." Dr. Dwight was born in Conway, Mass., Nov. 22, 1803; graduated at Harvard in 1825, and at Andover in 1828. He embarked, Jan. 21, 1830, at Boston, for the island of Malta, whence he went to Turkey, and spent nearly two years exploring the country, endeavouring to find the best spot to commence his labours, and on the 5th of June, 1832, he reached Constantinople, where he has since been located as a missionary of the American Board. He has been married twice, but at the time of his death he was a widower. He returned from Constantinople to his native land a few months ago, and expected, after completing twelve months stay there, to return to the field of his labours. After leaving the Mission, and before starting for America, Dr. Dwight made an extensive tour into the wildest portions of Persia, and went to localities very seldom visited by Europeans. His reports of the results of his observations during this journey, and of the progress of Christianity since he first travelled over the same country, nearly thirty years ago, are highly interesting and encouraging.

THE LATE REV. RICHARD FLETCHER, OF ST. KILDA.—Melbourne advices have brought the intelligence of the death of the Rev. R. Fletcher, for many years pastor of a Congregational Church in Manchester. In 1853 Mr. Fletcher accepted the invitation of the Colonial Missionary Society to proceed to Australia. In doing so, he had two objects in view—namely, to form a congregation and to found a college. He accomplished the first at St. Kilda, and laboured among his people with much acceptance and success. Some time after his arrival, the Congregational Union of Victoria appointed him to be tutor to any students who might desire to prepare themselves for the pastoral office, and it was in furtherance of his second great object that he was just about to revisit England. He is described by the Melbourne Christian Times as having, from his age, experience, and practical wisdom, been ever regarded by his brethren in the ministry "as a father—a true Christian bishop—primus inter pares. Yet, though thus honoured and stamped, he was perfectly unassuming, gentle, patient possessing the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit." Mr. Fletcher deemed it to be his duty, when the colony received its constitution, to take part in the movement which was directed against the continuance of State grants of money to the religious denominations, that were willing to receive them. We state this fact in order that the full significance of a pleasing incident relating to the Bishop of Melbourne which we quote from the deceased's funeral oration, by Rev. R. Connabee, may be appreciated: "Profound and universal was the respect with which our departed friend was regarded, in illustration of which I mention that, on the day after his departure, I stood with several members of his family gazing on his features, beautiful even in death, when the Rev. Dr. Perry, the Bishop of Melbourne, noiselessly glided into the room. He stood beside us, and, as his eye rested on the calm and happy face of the dead, he observed, 'Truly we may say. "He is not here, he is risen."' He spoke loving words of peace and consolation to the sad and sorrowing group, and then, all kneeling round the couch of mortality, in tones of sweet and holy affection, he commended the widow and the fatherless to the care and blessing of Heaven. He adored the riches of that grace by which the pastor, the husband, and the father had been enabled, through a long and consistent life, to adorn the doctrine of God his Saviour in all things, and to be instrumental in bringing many sons to glory."

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN NEW YORK.—The Christian Intelligencer, in reporting the observance of the week of prayer at the Fulton-street prayer-meeting, after detailing the proceedings in the earlier part of the week, says: "On Thursday the subject of prayer was the Church of God and the Christian ministry. Prayer was earnestly offered for the increased spirituality of the Church, and its more decided separation from the world; for more of the brotherly love and union of apostolic times; for a higher type of piety, and a higher state of spiritual life; for more holiness of heart and life in the ministry and in the Church. An Episcopal clergyman said that he had a rejoicing experience to speak of, and he was sorry he had only five minutes in which to tell all the Lord had done for his soul. . . . The meeting was exceedingly moved and melted with this experience, coming from such a source. All felt that the words of the speaker were honest and sincere." Friday's meeting is mentioned, and the writer adds: "The spirit of the meeting had become more and more intensified from day to day all through the week. The place of prayer had been exceedingly solemn and awful, by reason of the presence and power of the Spirit all through the week. But no days had been as the last, and it was felt that we had come into the very presence-chamber of the Most High. . . . On Saturday the meeting was led by Rev. Stephen Tyng, Jr., Episcopalian. This was the great day of the feast. The burden of prayer was the Lord's-day, that its Divine institution may be recognised, and its sanctions and demands be obeyed at home and abroad. It was said by a Christian merchant of Philadelphia, that he had that morning, and but a few minutes before coming to the meeting, received a letter from General McClellan; and he wished the meeting to feel that we had one great cause of gratitude to God that we had a man set over our armies who had done all he could, and would do all in his power to promote in our army the proper observance of the holy Sabbath. We shall have no more military reviews on God's holy day. . . . There have been many private prayer-meetings held daily in these cities through the week—we mean union prayer-meetings held in private houses. Besides these, prayer-meetings have been held nightly in halls and lecture-rooms in various parts of the city of New York, and also in Brooklyn."

REMARKABLE MOVEMENT IN THE NORTH-WEST PROVINCES OF INDIA.—The Committee of the Church Missionary Society report a fresh spontaneous movement towards Christianity amongst heathen natives in the North-West Provinces. The Rev. T. Hörnle thus writes from Mirat, Sept. 24 last: "There was at Azwanpur, a village about twenty miles west of Mirat, a man who had become acquainted with the Gospel and the leading truths of Christianity; how I have as yet been unable to ascertain. This man, by name Sahiba, and of good report among his heathen and Mohammedan neighbours, used to collect as many as he found willing, impart what knowledge he had of the truth, and whilst still a heathen hold Christian worship with them. This seems to have gone on for some time, and, at least on Sahiba's part, was done with an intention to embrace our holy faith as soon as an opportunity should offer. But, before this came, the famine with its hardships overtook them, and soon reduced them, as many others, to starvation and misery." Sahiba died. They gradually sold their cattle and household property to procure food, and having nothing more, were compelled to leave their houses and go abroad in search of subsistence. After much wandering about, "they at last came to the Roman Catholic establishment at Sirdhana, where the priest received them, and gave them food and work in the fields of that mission. Their sufferings were now at an end; still they did not feel satisfied. They had gone there, as they expressed themselves, in the hope of finding not only nourishment for their bodies, but the bread of life. This was not given them, although they applied for it." They therefore determined to leave that place again, and to make their way to Mirat, where they hoped to have their hearts' desire fulfilled." The missionary advised them to return home to Azwanpur, and provided them with a trustworthy native Christian to instruct them. A few of the inquirers withdrew, but the rest remained steady; "having," adds Mr. H., "before the Tasildar and Zamindar and others, publicly declared their determination to become disciples of Jesus Christ their Saviour. Other families have since joined; so that, as Alexander [the catechist] wrote in his last letter, 'a dear little flock of Christ's "other sheep" (John x. 16), of about forty-seven souls, is ready to enter into His fold.' They have begun regularly to attend Divine worship in a shop hired for the purpose, as no other place large enough was available, and are, besides, under instruction for baptism." A later letter, dated Nov. 15th last, describes Mr. H.'s subsequent visit to the spot: "As I arrived a band of happy boys and girls ran up to me, making their salaams. On my asking for their names one said his name was Joel, another David, a third Johannes. A girl said she was called Martha, another Rachel. Mistrusting my ears, and taking it for a corruption of heathen names, I asked again and again, but the children distinctly repeated the above Christian names; adding, with happy smiles, that their names were given them by their teacher, Alexander, in anticipation of their baptism. By-and-bye their fathers came from their fields to greet me, when it was arranged that on the following morning all the inquirers, ready for a confession of their faith in Christ by receiving baptism, should assemble in my tent, for a distinct expression of their purpose, and for solemn dedication to the Lord by prayer. They came—men, women, and children—and a happy meeting it was; all the adults declaring their determination to forsake idolatry and to follow Christ, and confirming their words by pressing (one after the other) my right hand to their foreheads. In taking down their names I found there were fifteen men, heads of families, seventeen women, and nineteen children, being fifty-one souls, ready to enter the fold of the Good Shepherd. And how was this remarkable light kindled in the midst of heathen darkness? I can only reply, by the Lord Himself; He has done it, not man. The means were the famine and its hardships."

A NEW WESLEYAN CHAPEL AT PARIS is in course of erection. One of the parties to the preliminary negotiations was the Rev. William Arthur. He writes: "When we came to sign the contract we insisted on a clause forbidding Sunday work, on which the contractor declared that it would rob him of his profits, and finding us resolved, submitted, saying, 'C'est une clause vilaine pour nous.'" (It is a villainous clause for us.) But, by virtue of this "villainous clause," the building, in its very progress, will preach to contractor, workmen, and spectators, the blessings and duties of a Sabbath day."

BAPTISM OF NEARLY TWO HUNDRED AFRICANS.—A Cape paper says: "For three months past the Africans at Rupert's have been receiving instruction from the Lord Bishop of St. Helena, assisted by the Rev. H. J. Bodily, through an interpreter. At eleven a.m., on the 3rd ult., all were assembled in the garden near the station. The Bishop read the Baptismal Service, and, having addressed the candidates on the solemn undertaking about to be entered into, they were arranged around the temporary fonts, when, with the assistance of the Rev. H. Whitehead and the Rev. H. J. Bodily, his lordship proceeded to name and baptize them. The behaviour of the catechumens was thoroughly attentive and devout. The number baptized was 192. If Bishop Mackenzie at the Zambesi follows up the new idea of baptizing large numbers in this way, Africa may be soon Christianised and regenerated."

CRUEL SCENES IN WESTERN AFRICA.—A native Wesleyan missionary on the coast of Western Africa writes: "On Monday, the 23rd September, the only brother of King Darku Yaw was lost in the forest, and the whole people rushed into the forest seeking after him, till last Sunday, the 29th, when they found him quite dead. Just as they brought the corpse home, two persons were seized, a nice-looking woman, and her own son, of about sixteen years of age. The woman was taken into the street, her hands tied behind, and her cheek was stabbed through with a knife. They placed her in the sun from eight o'clock in the morning to twelve at noon; and then her head was cut off. Tuesday, the 1st instant, the King killed another woman. About one o'clock at noon, Nabla, one of the chiefs, also killed one woman. Towards evening, the poor boy above-mentioned was also taken to the place where the remains were going to be interred; there they squeezed and broke his neck, and shoved him into the grave."

PROTESTANT AND ROMISH MISSIONS TO MADAGASCAR.—Advices received since our last confirm the favourable intelligence already given from Madagascar. An interesting letter is published, in the Missionary Magazine, from some of the native pastors at the capital to the Rev. Mr. Le Brun, while on his way thither. They write: "A general disposition to join us seems to take hold of the people. . . . Everybody here scrambles, as it were, for the Word of God; so ardent is the desire expressed for it, that they throw themselves upon any portions they find! French Roman Catholic priests have already reached Antananarivo, and use every means to instruct the people in their religion. Pray ardently to the Lord that He prevent any of us who are Protestants at heart from being tempted to listen to their teachings. Everybody, young and old, are eagerly learning to read. All the Christians who were in bonds have received their liberty, and are living at the capital." It will be remembered, that we mentioned, in our last number, the arrival of Mr. Le Brun at the capital; no communication, however, has yet been received from him at that place. A letter from the Rev. William Ellis, however, written on board the mail packet for Mauritius, and dated Aden, December 12th, states that among his fellow-voyagers were six Catholic priests and four lay assistants, who were, as it was understood, proceeding as missionaries to Madagascar.

Literature.

Australia, with Notes by the way on Egypt, Ceylon, Bombay, and the Holy Land. By FREDERICK J. JOBSON, D.D. Hamilton, Adams and Co.

THIS is a very sketchy, readable, and pleasant book, and would be more so to the general reader, were it not for a somewhat strong flavour of Wesleyanism and egotism which occasionally vulgarise the narrative. It is a pity that men setting out on voyages of so enlarging and ennobling a character cannot manage to leave these pettinesses of sectarianism or "denominationalism" behind them. Such traits are ever unpleasantly reminding us of the blight of schism which has fallen upon the one body of Christ. So far as our experience goes, or our observation can be relied upon, the parties which, in general, savour least of this "denominational" taint, are the English Evangelical clergy and laity, the Scottish United Presbyterians, and the Independent Congregationalists. And in a book of travels through ancient and modern lands of such varied and intense interest as Egypt, Ceylon, India, and Australia, it is tiresome to have the Wesleyan nosegay perpetually popped under your nose.

With this occasional abatement, however, we have followed the narrations of this volume with pleasure and profit. The reverend doctor seems to have an eye in his head, and a power of conveying his first impressions with force and clearness. Mrs. Jobson was travelling with him, or we might have been inclined to comment, indeed, upon the somewhat more than artistic gusto of his graphic delineations of the females of many lands. The "Spanish ladies, arrayed in graceful black lace mantillas, and closely-drawn veils, from under which they dart piercing glances," made us rather tremble for the doctor; but then we were relieved by the succeeding words—"As we read in the old stories." So all is safe again. Maltese women, too, "kneel in black mantillas," but we don't hear of "glancing" eyes again until Alexandria, where we find the Egyptian ladies "glancing eagerly out of the large wrappers with which they were enveloped to the eyes." So in Cairo we have a fuller description of ladies who were "clothed in a hood-like mantle of black, yellow, or white, and no part of their person was seen but their dark eyes, rimmed with khol, glancing lustroously out from two holes in the front of their head-dress." The females of the lower class here show something more than eyes, however, for "their faces were only partly covered; and our observant friend did not fail to note "their scanty dresses falling down upon their bare legs, revealing too fully the outline and symmetry of their forms." O fie! How greatly disgusted our traveller must have been with another specimen of the female genus may be imagined from the description: "Among these were old women, who, under the fierce heat of the Egyptian sun, had been burnt and dried till their skins had become shrivelled and hippopotamus-like, and they were truly hideous." This is reassuring again; the observations are purely and impartially scientific. And in the light of this observation we may read the more nude pictures of the Ceylonese girls, as well as that of the Mohammedan women aboard ship from Alexandria to Palestine, who, "curtained round in one upper bedchamber-like apartment, had Nubian guardians, but whenever we looked towards them, we could see their bright dark eyes peering at us from behind the curtains."

But our author's descriptive powers are by no means confined to female objects—everything else, down to mosquitoes and rats, are vividly identified. We share in his decided aversion for the latter animal, and could shudder with him as he "awoke in the night, and saw huge black rats in the cabin; so got no more sleep, though I left my berth on the floor and climbed up into a higher one, having an instinctive horror of rats."

We find a good deal of interesting information as to the state of the missionary work, and of the heathen religion in Ceylon. Mr. Gogerly, missionary there, is represented as the best Singalese scholar on the island. He has carefully studied the works of Buddha, and mastered that system, in order, out of their own standards, to refute its votaries. To us the Ceylonese sketches are the most interesting in the book, but we have not space for further notice of these, or of the Australian scenes; and we have no doubt but that travellers to those regions, as well as travellers on paper, will not regret the time devoted to the perusal of Dr. Jobson's journals and observations.

Memorable Women of the Puritan Times. By the Rev. JAMES ANDERSON. Two vols Blackie and Sons.

MR. ANDERSON presents to us, in this work, a continuation of the series of biographical sketches commenced in his "Ladies of the Reformation," and "Ladies of the Covenant." In adventuring, as he now does, on the times of the later Puritans, he runs greater risk than before of doing violence to particular political and ecclesiastical predilections, in the minds of many of his readers, but he thus obtains access to materials admirably suited to his purpose, and is enabled to narrate facts in such detail, and with such precision, as add, in most cases, both to the liveliness of the picture and the import of the lesson it is designed to teach. The copious accounts we possess of the period in question are also rich in incidents illustrative of domestic life. These teach us that there was eminent devotion to the public interests in the Puritan era, because there was private virtue, and that of that virtue woman was the devoted guardian in such sense as she can only be where the dictates of revelation are known and revered. How greatly female excellence has contributed to our national well-being is, of course, a question which is necessarily elucidated but in part, and in an indirect manner, in these pages; but it suggests itself again and again, when not formally mentioned. The lives are twenty-five in number. They commence with a carefully-written sketch of Lady Vere, followed by another of the wife of Sir Robert Harley. Then come four women renowned for their connexion with New England, to which they emigrated from this country—one of the number being Mrs. Winthrop, wife of the first governor of Massachusetts. The mother, the wife, and the four daughters of Oliver Cromwell, are among those that succeed. The story of Lucy Hutchinson is again told; so is that of the wife of Lord William Russell; as they will both continue to be while the language lasts. There are other celebrities whom we shall not attempt to name. It would be easy to point out some omissions, or to question the accuracy of the principle upon which the selection of the characters sketched has been made. We shall not do either; Mr. Anderson has evidently executed his task in a conscientious and painstaking manner, and though we cannot pronounce his work free from minor blemishes, will add to his reputation, among thoughtful persons, as a useful writer.

Proceedings of the Geneva Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, held in September, 1861. Edited by the Rev. GAVIN CARLYLE, A.M. Strahan and Co., Edinburgh; Hamilton and Co., London.

THE copious reports which several months ago appeared in two numbers of Evangelical Christendom, of the proceedings of the Geneva Conference, obviate the necessity of our devoting to the examination of them, in this collected form, the space they might otherwise demand. Our readers are aware of the rich array of consecrated talent, learning, and genius, which found expression at that memorable gathering. The fact is, however, that owing to circumstances which we explained at the time, the addresses, which were intended to be the principal feature of the Conference, were, in many cases, very imperfectly heard, or not heard at all, by the audience. Whatever of most importance was thus missed is supplied in these pages, and we do not hesitate to affirm, that if they receive the justice which is their due, the publication of this reliable body of facts and statements—of these profound disquisitions, and these fervent and loving appeals to the Christian conscience—will be regarded as one of the most salutary results of the meetings at Geneva. Amid the many "reports" and speeches delivered, the task of selecting those which should be given to the public was far from easy; but it has been most judiciously performed. The addresses of Professor St. Hilaire, on "The State of the Working Classes;" of M. Ernest Naville, on "Scepticism;" of Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, on "Calvin and the Reformation;" and, on other subjects, of Dr. Guthrie, Dr. Thomson, Dr. de Pressensé, Dr. Grandpiere, Professor Gausson, Professor Mazzarella, are among those which are given in full. Professor Godet, on "The Lord's Day;" Dr. Meile, on "Italy;" Dr. Dorner, on "Individualism," and a number of others, are given in substance, with copious extracts. The preface presents an interesting sketch of the circumstances under which the Conference was held, and introduces a discriminating estimate of its special characteristics, by Dr. Cairns, and at the close of the volume we have from the same master-hand a critical sketch of two pieces of pulpit oratory by Drs. Guthrie and Krummacher. The whole is presented in a well-arranged and readable shape. Sixteen miniature portraits form a frontispiece, which adds to the attractiveness of the volume. Valuable in its contents, elegant in appearance, yet inexpensive in price, it deserves a wide circulation; and this it will doubtless obtain.

The Practice of Hiring Wet Nurses (especially those from the Fallen), considered as it affects Public Health and Morals, &c. John Churchill, New Burlington-street.

The Comparative Properties of Human and Animal Milks. A New Theory as to Grasses, and a New Interpretation of some Physiological Facts, &c. By M. A. BAINES. John Churchill, New Burlington-street, &c.

THESE two pamphlets, by the same authoress, deserve attentive consideration. The former of them was read before the Social Science Association at Bradford; the latter before a medical audience in the Hanover-square Rooms in London. We believe it rarely happens, if it ever happens, that the moral laws of the Divine Ruler can be systematically violated without inducing physical evil. Sin is the source, not only of moral corruption, but of bodily death to the human race. Of the hideous moral consequences of some branches of wet nursing we have been long convinced. These are only cursorily glanced at by the authoress. But if half the physical evils enumerated ensue, a knowledge of the truth ought to have a decided effect in abating a social nuisance. The subject of the second pamphlet is of a more directly scientific character, and we are incompetent to discuss it. The authoress holds that the difference in quality between human and animal milk can be made up or supplemented by farinaceous additions. The whole subject is full of interest to the benevolent, as well as to the scientific, and has a decided moral bearing.

The Resurrection and the Life; or, Lazarus Revived. By JAMES CULROSS, A.M. Third Edition. Nisbet and Co.

A STRIKING and pleasing homily on John xi. But in his preface the author, on the subject of miracles (so important a topic just now), confuses and weakens the true argument. Dr. McCosh, in his new work on the Supernatural and the Natural, has well observed that it is a mistake to suppose either the miracles of Moses or of Christ were meant merely to show the Divine power, or to act as evidences of the truth of religion. No doubt, they serve many other and important purposes. But the same author has also remarked: "There is a loose and empty style of speaking in our day about miracles being, after all, referable to a higher law, which either has no definite meaning or may be misunderstood in a misleading sense . . . or the impression may be left that they are like meteors or like mesmerism, simply mysterious," &c. The writer before us does not quite adopt this view, perhaps, but he looks as if he goes nigh to it. He seems to view miracles rather as a natural manifestation, so to speak, of our Lord's supernatural character; and, in exalting the moral goodness of Jesus, he seems to depress the special value of miracles as evidential of His Divine commission. It is to be observed, that when Jesus was, to the apprehensions of the Jewish rulers, altering or annulling the Divine institution of Moses, they were not in the condition in which we are of judging that, as our author says, "The spirit of the worker was manifestly true." And we cannot agree with him that this character of Jesus is "the highest and most satisfactory proof of the reality" of His miracles. The apostles had not the advantage of the same perfect moral and supernatural character as their Lord; but their miracles, if true as facts, authenticate their mission and establish the Divine revelation. To us, the character of Jesus and His disciples, and the doctrines they taught, are elements in the proof of the facts of the miracles recorded in the New Testament, and concurrent evidences of the truth of the revelation. But if doubt be ever permitted or disparagement allowed as to reality of the facts, the foundation is overthrown.

Voices from the Valley Testifying of Jesus. By the Rev. FREDERICK WHITFIELD, A.B., late Curate of Otley, Yorkshire, now at Kirby Ravensworth, Yorkshire. London: J. F. Shaw and Co.; Richmond, Yorkshire: Bell.

Sacred Poems and Prose. By the Rev. FREDERICK WHITFIELD, A.B., Curate of Otley, Yorkshire. Second Edition, enlarged. Otley and London: Walker and Sons.

The Treasure in Earthen Vessels. A Sermon preached in the Parish Church, Otley, Yorkshire, before the Clergy and Congregation, on the occasion of the Meeting of the Deanery, Oct. 3, 1860. By Rev. FREDERICK WHITFIELD, A.B., Curate.

MR. WHITFIELD informs us that the reason why he has designated the first work in the above series "Voices from the Valley," is because it consists of sermons and lectures delivered at various times in the valley of the "Wharfe" during his ministerial labours in that locality. As, however, now republished, they do not appear in the form of sermons, but rather in the form of essays on the various topics treated of. To those who like the perusal of such works as Macduff's "Memories of Gennesaret," and Winslow's "Midnight Harmonies," we can heartily recommend perusal of this unassuming volume. The author's style is good and pointed, and he sounds an earnest note of warning against the unnatural connexion which so often is attempted to be made between the world and vital Christianity. The doctrines of the Gospel are treated forcibly, and the book breathes a spirit of earnest and manly piety. The style of the book is simple and clear. The "Voices from the Valley" are accordingly suitable for lending among the poor, and we are much mistaken if this work will not find its way into many a parochial library, as we trust it will also be blessed to arouse some who are still slumbering on "the enchanted ground."

We have been acquainted with "Sacred Poems and Prose" for some time. We are glad to see that it has reached a second edition, which is considerably enlarged. Two or three of the hymns in this little collection have in a separate form obtained a wide circulation, and a well-merited popularity. Several may, no doubt, be acquainted with the pretty hymn on the name of Jesus, the first verse of which is—

"There is a name I love to hear,
I love to speak its worth,
It sounds like music in mine ear,
The sweetest name on earth"— which commences this little volume. We advise such to make themselves acquainted with the complete collection, as both the "poems" and the "prose" deserve perusal.

The sermon on the "Treasure in Earthen Vessels" is good and Evangelical. The author informs us that he had no idea of committing it to the press when it was originally delivered, but has been induced to do so in accordance with the wish of the clergy who were present on the occasion. We have heard that these works have been made useful in many cases, and we trust that they may be still more extensively blessed.

The Home of Poverty made Rich. By Mrs. BERT, Author of "Tracts on the Parables," "Old and New Testament History," &c. Wertheim, Macintosh and Hunt.

THIS volume well deserves a circulation among the poor, and not only among them, but among those in a better rank of life. Associations for the purpose of impressing mothers especially with their great responsibilities, and the importance of their training little ones up in the fear of God, cannot be too highly recommended. There is a work for women to do in the Church of Christ, not to associate themselves together, as so-called "sisters of charity," or to wrap themselves in some assumed garb of humility, which is in reality but a garb of vanity, but to go forth and speak earnestly, if they "have so learned Christ," to ignorant women also "the words of truth and soberness." To promote such efforts this work is well adapted. It speaks of the solemnity and importance of marriage, of the duties of the wife, and how she may influence her husband, of the mother, the daughter, the home, the servant, in a very simple, interesting way. There are plenty of anecdotes and much practical advice given. A clergyman's wife, Mrs. Selwyn, is supposed to instruct these various classes, and she speaks kindly and affectionately to each. The Bible is ever referred to, and the love of Jesus pressed home to the heart. In the story which is told at the end of the book, of "Nelly Freeman," the practical evil of the rich often giving to the poor unsuitable garments is exhibited. The authoress, in the course of her tale, presents the following striking remark on this commonplace, yet important subject:—

It is a great mistake in ladies thus to dispose of their worn-out silks and muslins. They complain, and with reason, at the way wherein their style of dress is imitated; but is not the fault traceable to themselves?—to their ill-judged liberality? They want to get rid of their superfluous wardrobes, and therefore give them to their servants, never reflecting upon the evil they produce. Were the mighty thought of influence more dwelt upon, we should have fewer soul-murderers and murtheresses.

Hymns of the Christian Life. By OSWALD ALLEN. Nisbet and Co.

A SWEET volume of meditative and experimental poems, which we can heartily commend to the perusal of all lovers of the pious and the poetical. The latter element is perhaps inferior to the former in these hymns, but this is a defect on the tolerable side; and there are many of them breathing true poetry.

Historical and Statistical Sketch of the Slavonic Protestants in the North of the Austrian Empire. By A. H. WRATISLAW, M.A. Bell & Daldy.

A SHILLING pamphlet, which tells, in perhaps the fewest words possible, the story of centuries of brave resistance on the part of the more enlightened inhabitants of Bohemia and Moravia to the corrupt doctrines and tyrannical pretensions of the Church of Rome. Incidentally, we are thus presented with an account of the origin of the Church of the United Brethren. Appended to the "sketch" is an interesting narrative of a residence and captivity in Turkey, in the days of our own Queen Elizabeth, translated from the Bohemian of Baron Wenceslas Wratislaw.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

PARLIAMENT assembled on the 5th of last month. It has been usual that the ceremony should be inaugurated by the Sovereign in person; but her domestic sorrow rendered this impossible. Indeed, it was not till towards the close of the month that Her Majesty was able to rouse herself so far from her overwhelming grief as to take carriage exercise, accompanied by her daughter. The opening of the Houses brought out, in a very striking manner, the extent to which the nation at large sympathises with the sorrow of the Sovereign. The surrender of the prisoners by the Federal Government, and our own happy release from the horrors of war—though then in its first freshness—was but a secondary topic. The question which filled all hearts and occupied all tongues, was the loss which the Queen, the nation, and the world at large had sustained in the death of the Prince Consort. There was something more than conventional loyalty in all this. The speeches of the leaders—we may especially refer to those of Lord Derby and Lord Russell—came from the fulness of the heart; and Lord Dufferin, who moved the address in the Upper House, was felt at once to have struck the right key when he quoted the exquisite lines of the Laureate, addressed to Her Majesty:—

May all love,
His love, unseen, though felt, o'ershadow thee;
The love of all thy sons encompass thee,
The love of all thy daughters cherish thee,
The love of all thy people comfort thee,
Till God's love place thee at His side again.

The affair of the Trent, however, was not forgotten. On this topic, too, Lord Dufferin took the lead; and though we cannot commend, or even defend, the good taste of his scriptural allusions, in describing Mr. Seward's "still small voice" as hushing the storm which the capture of the Southern commissioners had raised, we are still further from joining in the cry which some of the religious organs have raised against him, as if he had indulged in gratuitous blasphemy.

It is with great satisfaction we observe that our beloved Sovereign feels herself strengthened to come forth from the retirement into which she was compelled by grief for her husband's loss, and to take up again that burden of State which he for so many years did so much to lighten for her. The memorial which the metropolis proposes to erect to the Prince, and the design for which was referred to her, she has decided to be in the form of an obelisk, with designs of bas-relief sculptured on the different sides. Along with the letter announcing this decision Her Majesty caused another to be written, signifying her desire to be allowed to take part with the nation in this memorial of "the husband of her youth." With that womanly sympathy and tender care for her subjects which has endeared our beloved Sovereign to her people more than any of her predecessors, she states that though it may hardly be usual for a wife to join in erecting a memorial to her husband, yet there was no impropriety in a Sovereign joining with her subjects in honouring one who ever laboured for their welfare; for "who has a dearer interest than the Queen in the welfare and happiness of the people?" and "no one can know, as the Queen knows, how his every thought was directed to the country;" These are sentiments which few will read with unmoved hearts, or without the mental prayer that the Father of all mercies may comfort her in her much and bitter sorrow.

At the meeting of Convocation, which always asserts its right to assemble with the Parliament, some important questions were mooted. The Bishop of Oxford chafes at the restraint which is put upon the legislative powers of the assembly, and is anxious to make another appeal to the Government for power to enact new canons. The Government will be in no hurry to accede to the request. A point of much more practical import was mooted, in a plan for securing, to a greater extent than has hitherto been done, the services of lay agents in the work of evangelization. Some of the more forward spirits were in favour of restoring the order of the diaconate to the laity, as it is now among the Dissenting Churches; but a committee to whom the matter was referred thought that the order of deacons had now become so embedded in the clerical order in the Church, that it would not be possible now to separate them; and they recommended instead that the ancient, but not primitive, order of readers should be revived, and that pious and intelligent laymen might be employed, under the sanction of the bishop, on the recommendation of the parish clergyman, to go about populous parishes, read the Scriptures, and otherwise assist the clergyman. Nor are the new agents to be confined to the male sex. The order of deaconesses meets with increased favour; and is likely to be introduced as a permanent order in the Church. There seems no good reason why, if managed with ordinary discretion, Protestant sisters should not be found as efficient in the Church of England as in the Protestant Churches of France and Germany.

The same theological questions which annually occupy the bye hours of Parliament have this session commenced early. There are three bills on the subject of Church-rates—one for simple abolition, one for voluntary commutation, and one to allow landlords to make the rate a rent-charge on their estates. Then we have the ever-recurring Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, which is made this year to apply to both Scotland and Ireland, and which was read a second time in the House of Commons by a narrow majority.

The case of Dr. Rowland Williams has not yet gone out of the Court of Arches, when another of the "seven" is introduced. The case against the Rev. Henry Wilson commenced on the 22nd ult., and those who know the dilatory proceedings of ecclesiastical courts will not anticipate its very early settlement. We perceive it is announced that Dr. Williams has resigned his vice-principalship and professorship of Hebrew in the Welsh College of Lampeter. We suppose this resignation is compulsory, for there is no reason for his voluntarily resigning his post at the college which would not equally apply to the parish.

Among the losses which the Church has sustained during the past month, we may notice the deaths of Dr. Dwight, American missionary at Constantinople (one of the correspondents of this journal), and to whom the rising Churches in Turkey are largely indebted for the liberty they now enjoy; of the Rev. Thos. Hartwell Horne, the author of the extensively-popular "Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures;" and of the Rev. Mr. Sherman, for many years pastor of Surrey Chapel, and more lately of Blackheath. Coming to Surrey Chapel as he did, immediately after the death of the venerable Rowland Hill, there were many apprehensions that he would not be able to sustain the interest which that servant of God had awakened. We need not say how completely these fears were dissipated. It is no exaggeration to say that Mr. Sherman was one of the most successful ministers in the work of conversion that this generation has produced. When the infirmities of age rendered him unfit for the arduous duties of his large church congregation, he retired to a smaller charge in Blackheath, where he laboured to the extent of his strength.

The United Presbyterian Churches have recently been making a noble effort to provide for the wants of those members from Scotland who are called in the course of their worldly avocations to London. Three new congregations have been lately formed in different parts of the town, and all with fair prospects of success. The congregation at Islington has been in operation for some time, and its prosperity, under the Rev. Dr. Edmond, seems to be assured. Another chapel in Westbourne-grove, where the Rev. Dr. King has commenced his labours, was opened in the course of last month; and within a few days of its opening the foundation-stone of another was laid at Clapham, by John Henderson, Esq., of Park, who, it may be noticed, had previously laid the foundation-stone of the Chapel at Westbourne-grove. This care of the United Presbyterians for the spiritual welfare of those who go forth from among them might well be imitated by other denominations.

FOREIGN.

The letter of our French correspondent is more than usually interesting this month. It seems the powers of light and darkness are every day coming more decidedly into collision in that interesting country. The Roman Catholic authorities divide their occupations into the double task of abusing, and, as far as they have the power, of persecuting Protestants and lending their countenance to the most absurd stories of miraculous visions. One such case is graphically narrated by our correspondent, where the secular power seems to have more good sense and a deeper insight into religious truth than the ecclesiastical. Among the Protestant Churches, too, it is gratifying to find the stirrings of the new life that begin to palpitate within them, showing itself in the healthy action of throwing off dead and rotten members. Altogether there are indications that a religious crisis is at hand in that country.

The affairs of Italy remain much in the same position; but there is an increasing conviction in all minds that they cannot last much longer. All eyes are turned towards the ruler of France; and he hesitates to break with the spiritual power that first helped him to his throne, and might still have influence enough to shake it. The absolute refusal of the Pope to concede a single point embarrasses the whole of Louis Napoleon's policy, and leaves him still balancing undecided between the opposing forces of spiritual despotism and a free conscience. It is now apprehended that no further steps will be taken as long as the present Pope lives; and men the rather incline to this, as it is said that the health of Pius is in a critical state. So far as the interests of Protestantism are concerned, there is no need to wish that this event may be precipitated. The Pope is serving the cause of truth in a much r effectual manner than his deposition could do. His attitude, as the one obstacle to the union of Italy—on which Italians have set their souls with all the energy of their southern passions—is daily alienating their minds from a Church which is thus opposed to the temporal interests of the people. And it is gratifying to learn that the circulation of the Bible is proceeding to a great extent among the subjects of the Pope, and within the walls of his capital. So far has this gone, as to attract the notice of the correspondents of those newspapers that are more devoted to the chronicling of political events, but which say they cannot refrain from noting this circumstance, which meets them everywhere, as a sign of the times. One of those correspondents says that, in a conversation he held with a young woman, she, under promise of its being kept secret from the priests, showed him a Bible, with every mark of delight in possessing it; and, in answer to his further inquiries, she gave him to understand that the book was a familiar object to large portions of people in her class of life, adding, at the same time, that if the priestly incubus were once removed, there would be an outburst of Protestant feeling among the Romans which would surprise the world. These anticipations may be over-sanguine; but they testify to the reality of the feeling.

At the same time, we must warn our readers against expecting too much from mere political agencies. We have more than once pointed out that the Italian rulers have no love for Protestantism, as such—their quarrel is with the political, and not with the religious aspect of the Papacy; and they would gladly compound with the Pope to-morrow for the suppression of all religious schism throughout the Peninsula, if they could thereby win him the more easily to assent to their plans. The letter of our Italian correspondent brings this fact out in a very striking form. The Italian ministers tolerate Protestantism, indeed, because it is the natural upgrowth of civil freedom; and they cannot uproot the one without fatally injuring the other; but they make no secret of their aversion to this insurrection against spiritual authority as an interruption to and a thwarting of their plans. What they wish is that the Pope, retaining his power over the Catholic world, should become the first and highest subject of the King, and thus bend the arm of the spiritual power to elevate Italy into the first position among all Catholic States; and a schismatic and divided people would therefore be as distasteful to the King and his ministers as to the Pope. Hence the number of petty persecutions to which the members of the Free Italian Church has been subjected. Hence the desire to put down Gavazzi and all other outspoken champions of the truth. All is done with a view to conciliate the Papacy; but happily, the Papacy refuses to be reconciled. While, therefore, as politicians, we may wish that Italy should be united, yet, for the sake of the struggling Protestants there, whose position must ever be improved by delay, and even perhaps as a means of tempering the political character of the people, there is no need to be impatient for such a consummation.

The letter of our Frankfort correspondent for the present month is more than usually interesting, showing, as it does, a new phase of that conflict between human reason and faith which has for so long, and with so many curious alternations, gone on in Germany. It has often been said that our English Rationalists deck themselves out in the cast-off clothes of the German philosophising divines, and that we are now suffering from the inculcation of heresies which in the country of their birth have long since passed away. If so, we must bear them as we may; and we are thankful to say that the healthy state of religious life in England has already gone far to expel the poison. For Germany we must needs anticipate a happier future, as the latest development of a departure from strict orthodoxy comes, as we learn from our correspondent, in a much milder form than any preceding manifestation. M. Rothe, who has taken the Churches to task for their adherence to conventional forms—a too idolatrous adherence to which, indeed, has always been the besetting sin of the Church since the Church had a history—is, says our correspondent, “not orthodox, though profoundly Christian;” and we cannot doubt that the man who exhorts preachers to present to the people “a living Jesus, full of compassion and of love,” cannot be very far wrong. It is gratifying to find, indeed, that all the angularities of that subtle and reflective people are gradually softening down, and that there is at present more of the spirit of tolerance among the different sections of the Protestant Church than was ever known before. Thus the Ultra-Lutheran, or Tractarian party, though still wrapped up too much in their High Church delusions, speak with less bitterness of the proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva than they did at Berlin. A check has also been put upon the Romanising tendencies of the party, and some of their journals rebuke in firm and manly tones the semi-Catholic spirit of some of their members. Nor do we regard the efforts making towards the separation of the King-compelled alliance between the two sections of the German Church. That was a union which would never come to good, because it was imposed from without, and the irritation thus produced prevents the growth of that true union which can only proceed from within.

It is with much satisfaction and pleasure we direct attention to the narrative, which will be found in another page, of the result of General Alexander's mission to Spain on behalf of the persecuted Spanish Protestants there, as well as to the affecting letter of Matamoros, the one that is best known in this country. There is some ground to hope now that the punishment of this modern confessor for Christ may be materially shortened. It will be seen that the Spanish Minister, General O'Donnell, received General Alexander with all courtesy, and while he dealt only in general professions of good will, frankly explained the obstacles in his way of making more explicit declarations. It must not be forgotten that in these days neither monarchs nor ministers are all powerful in their own dominions; and further, that the people whom they govern are in general more fanatical than themselves. This is pre-eminently the case in Spain; and we can well understand that the Minister who would permit the free preaching of the Gospel in that country would run great risk of being torn to pieces. It is satisfactory to know that the heart of the Minister is on the side of toleration; and we in England must give him credit for choosing the most convenient time for manifesting this disposition.

It is with some satisfaction we see that these cruel persecutions endured by the native Protestants in Spain are attracting the attention of the French press. This, of course, ensures the scandal and the shame of the persecution making a greater noise throughout Europe, and causing more indignation against the system which inflicts them than we could possibly expect so long as the denunctions were confined to our own insulated and heretical journals. Already, indeed, the publication is bearing fruit, for it has provoked the Ultramontane journal, the Monde, into defending the abstract right of the civil power to suppress heresy; but even that unscrupulous journal will not commit itself to the particular kind of persecution in which Spain indulges. We, of course, can have but one wish, that the controversy should go on till all Christendom becomes interested in it, being sure the result will be that Spain will be shamed out of her fanatical cruelty. It may even now be observed that persecution fails to accomplish its purpose, for the bishops have just been complaining to the Queen of the attacks that are daily made against religion, and calling for more repressive measures. To which a Spanish paper quietly replies, that they had better first appeal to the ordinary tribunals.

The latest news from America is wholly favourable to the Federal cause. There has been no movement in the main armies opposite Washington, and the naval expeditions along the coast have accomplished nothing in comparison with the effort expended in them and the results expected from them; but in the Western Border States—in Kentucky and in Tennessee—the land forces and the river gun-boats have achieved successes which bid fair to attach both those States to the Union, by the same tenure by which Maryland is held—that is to say, by the right of conquest. The South is so hemmed in by blockades, that news from that quarter is rare and unreliable; but we know enough to be satisfied that they are in want of most of the luxuries, and many of the comforts of life, and that they are very deficient in the munitions of war. The North also suffers, though not to the same extent. Coined money is fast disappearing, but the Legislature has passed a bill making Treasury notes a legal tender. Whether that will supply the want of bullion, or whether the contractors and others will be induced to bring forward their goods in return for these paper promises, remains to be seen. In other respects we regret to say that the termination of the war seems as far off as ever. The only redeeming feature in this calamitous strife is, as our correspondent, Dr. Baird, expresses it, that whether it end in reunion or in final separation, it is impossible that the slave influence can ever be so powerful again as it has been.

From various places abroad we receive reports showing the universality with which the invitation to "the week of prayer" has been responded to all over the world. In countries near at hand we have interesting details of the manner in which the meetings were conducted; in those more distant we have notices even more interesting of the preparations that were making for the event. In Madras, for instance, we have the pleasing fact recorded that the new Bishop of the diocese takes part in the movement, and is otherwise giving satisfaction to good men of all denominations. We may notice, in connexion with this, that on the death of the Rev. R. Fletcher, a leading member of the Independent denomination at Melbourne, in Australia, the Right Rev. Dr. Perry, Bishop of Victoria, visited the bereaved family, spoke to them in earnest and loving words, and, kneeling down, commended them to God in prayer. These are pleasing indications of that great union for which all these Christians pray. •

Evangelical Alliance.

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS ON THE ECCLESIASTICAL CONTROVERSIES OF 1862.

THE following ADDRESS TO THE MEMBERS OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, "urging upon their prayerful attention the fundamental principles of their union, and the duty of watchfulness over their own spirits, especially in reference to the ecclesiastical controversies of the times," has been prepared in conformity with a resolution adopted at the Annual Conference, held in London, November 20, 1861 :—

The Council of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance, at the present time, when questions have arisen on which the judgment of British Christians differs widely, desire to offer to the members of that Alliance a few words of friendly counsel and brotherly admonition. They feel it right, at such a season, to remind them of the special obligation which rests upon them to "follow after the things which make for peace, and whereby they may edify one another."

In the first Conference of the Alliance its great object was thus defined: "To aid in manifesting, as far as practicable, the unity which exists among the true disciples of Christ, to promote their union by fraternal and devout intercourse, to discourage all envyings, strifes, and divisions, and to impress on Christians a deeper sense of the duty of obeying our Lord's command, to love one another." It was further declared to be one of its objects "to deepen in the minds of its members, and, through their influence, to extend among the disciples of Christ generally, the conviction of sin and shortcoming in this respect; that, humbling themselves more and more before the Lord, they may be stirred up to make full confession of their guilt, and to implore the forgiveness of their past offences, and Divine grace to lead them to the better cultivation of brotherly affection." At the same time, in order to guard against misconceptions, it was distinctly declared that "no compromise of the views of any member, or sanction of those of others, on the points wherein they differ, is either expected or required; but that all are held as free as before to maintain and advocate their religious convictions, with due forbearance and brotherly love."

The Council of the Alliance feel it wise, after fifteen years, to remind its members once more of those fundamental objects and conditions of their union, when circumstances have arisen, and are likely to arise, which bring peril to the cause of Christian peace. They desire to "stir up the pure minds" of all their brethren "by way of remembrance," and to recall to their memory the special obligations under which they are laid by their public adherence to these resolutions of that Alliance. They venture, then, to offer them a few remarks on the scope and practical significance of the engagement they have solemnly made.

It is the main object of the Alliance, distinctly proclaimed from the first, to discourage all envyings, strifes, and divisions among real Christians. Such strifes and divisions, however, are the inevitable result of contradictory opinions and convictions on important subjects of religious faith and Christian practice. Hence the declaration clearly implies the duty of every member of the Alliance to follow after the truth in love, to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of Christ," and to seek a clear perception of the will and truth of God on all questions wherein the disciples of Christ are now at variance. Their aim ought not to fall below the apostolic standard, that they should be "of one heart and of one mind," and be "perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment."

While, however, this high standard of Christian aim and effort is clearly implied in the great object of the Alliance, the discouragement of all envyings, strifes, and divisions, still its direct efforts are confined within a narrower limit, or the enforcement of the Apostolic rule—"Whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing." Contradictory judgments and convictions among Christian brethren, since they render strife and division inevitable, are deeply to be deplored, and their removal to be sought by continual prayer for fuller light from the Spirit of God. The Alliance, however, is a practical work for the present, and not an Utopia for some distant future. It is a partial union of imperfect believers on earth, and not the full communion of just men made perfect in the kingdom of God. It assumes that differences do and will exist, and that an attempt to stifle conscience, while they exist, is not the right way to remove them. And therefore it lays down the rule, that all its members are held free to maintain and advocate their religious convictions, even on the points wherein they wholly differ; and only enforces one weighty caution, that it must be done "with due forbearance and brotherly love."

The first duty, then, of seeking after fuller degrees of light and wisdom, so that strife and divisions may wholly cease by their causes being removed, is admitted and implied in its constitution by the very nature of its object; but it is, and must be, a secret work in the hearts of believers, and the Alliance makes no formal provision for its fulfilment. But the sacred duty of conducting controversy among Christians, whenever it may arise, in a Christian spirit, is one main purpose for which the association was formed. Christian believers in general, and members of the Alliance, by a further and special obligation, may and ought to admonish each other, when there are open deviations, or even when there is especial risk of deviation, from this golden rule. Practical failure on this point would be a virtual dissolution of the Alliance. Unless it succeeds in averting, at least from its members, rashness, asperity, and bitterness, when differences of judgment arise among them, the salt itself will have lost its savour, and there seems little hope that the Church or the world should be seasoned with holy lessons of peace and love.

Three questions of grave importance are likely to arise in the course of the present year, in which British Christians differ not a little in their judgment, and where controversy, from the importance of the issues involved, is in danger of causing no slight amount of discord and alienation.

The first of these is the question of National Education. There is here a fundamental difference of judgment amongst Christians on the lawfulness and expediency, in the abstract, of Government aid in the education of the people. There is a further question, likely to be much debated among the friends of Government help, on the merits or demerits of the pending proposal for the introduction of an entirely new code. Where the question involves the welfare of two millions of Christian children, which may be advanced or retarded by a right or wrong course of action, and where the convictions of nearly every main body of British Christians, whether Churchmen or Dissenters, enter into the discussion as vital elements, it is plain that earnestness on either side may soon degenerate into acrimony, and the importance of the issues at stake may easily betray the friends of education, of various schools, into language discreditable to their Christian professions, and injurious to the cause of peace and mutual love.

The second question, of which a renewed discussion seems almost certain, is the long-debated controversy on Church-rates. The risk of alienation and bitterness is here, if possible, still greater. While many Churchmen view the issue as involving the principle of a public national subjection to God, and its surrender as an act of public apostasy, in deference to mistaken scruples, or even selfish clamour; the great majority of Dissenters look on Church-rates as an unjust imposition, dishonouring the cause of religion, mischievous even to the Church, and directly oppressive and injurious to themselves. Where the diversity of view is so great, collision of judgment cannot fail to have painful results. Charges of envy and selfishness on one side, and of injustice and pride on the other, are weapons of controversy which come easily to hand; and pious Christians, and even members of the Alliance, if they enter the field of such a discussion, need to set a watch over their heart, as well as their mouth, and to keep well the door of their lips; or they may easily be betrayed into the exhibition of a temper and tone of thought wholly at variance with their general duty as disciples of Christ, and their special obligations from the public object and professions of that Alliance.

Again, this year is the Bicentenary of the Act of Uniformity, and of that ejection of two thousand clergymen from the National Church, which greatly strengthened the Congregational body, now so numerous, and which contains so many members of the Alliance, as well as so many sincere and earnest disciples of Christ. It is their design to celebrate the recurrence of that anniversary by special services, in which the questions at issue between the Church of England and Dissenters, or Nonconformists, will be discussed, and brought under public notice from their point of view. The revival of such recollections, however natural and inevitable, will be likely to assume the form of vehement, and possibly even of bitter controversy. The humbling lessons which a calm review of the sins of our forefathers should impress on the hearts of their children, the sense of common humiliation, and common thankfulness for the Divine wisdom, which brings good out of evil, may easily be exchanged for a mournful series of mutual reproaches and proud recriminations.

It is not the province of the Council of the Alliance to offer any judgment on these three main controversies, which are likely, more or less, to characterise the present year. They would simply invite the members of the Alliance to consider prayerfully their own engagements, and to apply them to every new temptation to strife and contention which may arise. A few thoughts may perhaps assist them in their task, and help them to secure a part in that promise of their Lord and Master, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

First of all, there cannot be "due forbearance" in Christian controversy, where there has not first been due care, patience, thoughtfulness, and prayer, in the formation of our judgment on the questions in debate. Conscience is a poor excuse for haste and rashness, for pride or self-conceit. "With the lowly is wisdom." Divine truth does not germinate easily, except in the soil of a devout and humble spirit. Due forbearance in controversy with fellow-Christians must imply much more than a mere abstinence from imputing false motives or making calumnious assertions. It requires us to forbear from condemning them, even in our hearts, as guilty of serious error, and ignorant opposition to the will of God, until we have examined the subject with modesty and self-diffidence, and with simple and earnest prayer for the teaching of that Spirit, who is able to guide His people into all truth.

And this is not the whole obligation naturally included under the promise. It implies further, even when convictions have been slowly and prayerfully ripened, a deep unwillingness to enter into controversy, especially with Christian brethren, until there are clear indications that the benefit to the cause of truth and righteousness will outweigh the mischief of a new stumbling-block to the enemies of the faith, and the risk incurred of destroying peace and love.

Still further, a due forbearance in controversy not only implies the exercise of caution, humility, and watchfulness, in forming our own convictions, but also a serious and deliberate effort to understand the arguments, appreciate the motives, and enter into the position of those with whom we may have to contend. There is an ignorant and impatient zeal, to which the bare attempt to understand both sides of a controverted question is felt as an intolerable burden. Yet this is plainly the only full security against the occurrence of hateful suspicions and ungenerous imputations. There may be some danger, perhaps, to feeble minds, of general indecision and dimness of faith, if they strive constantly to place themselves in the position of an opponent, and to study every debated question on both sides. When clear convictions have once been gained on the leading facts and truths of the Gospel, it is neither safe nor wise to be ever laying the foundations anew. A diseased candour towards unbelievers may be only one symptom of an evil heart of unbelief. But in all those questions on which pious Christians differ widely, and have differed from generation to generation, there is far more danger from rash precipitance than from undue caution. A prolonged effort to understand the reasons, which have led many Christians to an opposite view to our own, is more likely to deepen our modesty, and improve our candour, than to involve us in any real sacrifice even of secondary truth. Christians engaged in controversy, where both are in error, are like two patients attempting to cure each other, while both are ignorant of medicine, and each is unaware of his own disease. Where one contends for truth, and the other alone is in error, it is like a physician attempting to prescribe for a sick patient, when that patient mistakes himself for a physician, and ventures, without knowledge of medicine, to prescribe for an imaginary disease. In such a difficult case the physician is doubly bound to make himself acquainted with the symptoms of the malady; since it is only by this means that his treatment can be successful in curing the sick man, and freeing him from the delusion under which he labours. It is usually those who rush into controversy without previous thought, and in whom blind self-confidence in their own feelings or instincts replaces solid thought and careful deliberation, who infuse into it the worst elements of strife and passion, and render the Church of Christ a byword by the fierceness and fury of theological debate.

Finally, the Council would affectionately remind the members of the Alliance that a noble standard is committed to their keeping, in days most eventful to the cause of Christ. The words ought to come down to them with a thrilling power through long ages since they were first uttered, "Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to the other?" The infidel exults when pious Christians publicly disagree, and most of all, if words of bitterness and reproach mingle with their disputations. The nations are feverish and disquieted. Civil war has broken out among those who are our own descendants and kinsmen; and strife among the nations, like the bursting of a river's banks, threatens to become a widening evil, when once discord has gained its first victory. Subtle assaults have been made, and still continue, against the old foundations and bulwarks of the faith. How solemn, then, is the responsibility resting upon those who love and prize the truth, to repeat from their heart the Apostolic greeting, "Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." May we hear the voice of the true Joseph, speaking in love and pity to His brethren, while sorely tempted, as they journey towards Canaan, by the recollection of their mutual offences and sins,—and saying to them with Divine authority,—“See that ye fall not out by the way.” A time is coming, one of our great divines has said, “when three words spoken in the spirit of meekness shall have a more blessed reward than ten thousand words spoken with disdainful sharpness of wit.” May that golden maxim be graven on the heart of every member of the Alliance, and their whole conduct be a continual echo of its truth! May the year, which began with prayer, continue in peace, and end in praise! We commend you, dear brethren, to the care and blessing of the Great Shepherd, the Prince of Peace.

FAITH AND ITS AIDS.*

WHEN the disciples prayed, "Lord, increase our faith," they went to the root of the matter. So did the poor man who cried, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief." The heart and the will of man, the affections astray from God, the biassed inclination to evil, have much more to do with unbelief than defective powers of understanding or insufficient evidence of truth. Believers may be "built up" in their most holy faith, of course; but, for this work (Jude 20, Col. ii. 6—7), adhesion to the love of God, trust in Jesus Christ, abstinence from sin, and praying in the Holy Ghost, are the prescribed means, rather than intellectual gymnastics. The building up supposes the foundation to be good. And poor would be the hope of getting a building to go aloft, if we were always re-examining, and resettling, and grubbing about the foundations.

No doubt an intelligent and a strong faith is desirable, and we are accordingly (2 Pet. i. 5, &c.) exhorted to add to our faith manly courage and knowledge, and other graces and virtues, in order to our more perfect and abundant entrance into the Heavenly Kingdom. In all these cases, however, it is the root which produces the branches, flowers, and fruits—it is the foundation which bears the building. It is Divine faith, existing and presupposed, which is to grow, increase, and flourish, and produce infinite results. Humility, tenderness of conscience, fear of God, love of God, horror of sin, looking to Jesus, prayer—are therefore the most suitable "aids" to which the tempted believer ought to be directed. The man who is strong in faith, giving glory to God, may advantageously grapple with false philosophy and vain deceit, in order to expose its falsehood and vanity; but the weak brother had probably just as well "beware" of it altogether, and tarry at Jericho till his beard be grown. We stand somewhat in doubt whether the pride of mind, which tends to go astray from the simplicity of Christ, may not be rather aggravated than abated by the process of a demonstration which is not the demonstration of the Holy Ghost and of power. The understanding, in a condition of partial or aggravated scepticism, is in a condition of weakness less or more infantile, and seems chiefly to require the sincere milk of the Word to grow thereby. It demands the discipline of humiliation on the one hand, or the cordials of hope on the other, rather than the pabulum of argument and the knowledge that puffeth up. He that will not believe shall not be able to exalt himself. If he lack wisdom, he had better go to God and to God's Word for it. If he lack faith, let him be told to do likewise. If he decline to do so, we doubt whether he will probably be reasoned into

An Attempt to Explain and Establish the Doctrine of Justification by Faith only; in Ten Sermons upon the Nature and Effects of Faith, preached in the Chapel of Trinity College, Dublin. either faith or wisdom, by arguments dehors the Word of Life itself. Not that in these remarks we would disallow all value to the usual methods of establishing the "Evidences of Christianity." The process has its place and its worth. But in these times it is well to bear also in mind that the promises of God are to the believing; that true faith is supernatural, and comes by the Word; that unbelief during this noon-day light, is sin, which incurs penalty, as well as blindness, to be deplored; and that, if we indulge sanguine hopes of producing conviction as to spiritual truths, except by the pure Word and the Spirit of God, we shall probably be disappointed.

These thoughts have been suggested, partly by our observation of a present tendency in many quarters to magnify the human at the expense of the Divine, and partly by the preface to the volume denominated, "Aids to Faith." It is undoubtedly difficult to eschew one's own intellectual and spiritual stand-point, and to enter clearly and sympathisingly into that of another. But we really cannot imagine the faith of any one who has faith to be endangered by the sort of thing which constitutes the fabric of works like "Essays and Reviews." And the genuine heart-unbelief which produces, or which greedily and naturally feeds upon chaff of that character, as it is not the object contemplated by the remedy before us, so it is not over likely to be reached by that remedy. Let it be, nevertheless, for argument's sake taken for granted, that some self-diffident believers may be shaken by infidel suggestions, robed in their modern imposing garb of learning and criticism, sacred and secular; it is a question then worthy of deep consideration, whether more is not likely to be lost than gained by assuming or conceding that, in this day, the religion of Jesus Christ requires to be re-established upon a basis of historical argument. Who has ever yet shaken the foundation or the fabric raised by Butler, Lardner, Paley, and others, who in the last century exhausted this subject? Is it not enough that they obtained a complete victory against the infidelity of their day, and have never been answered since? Indeed, most modern reproductions of the arguments for miracles, inspiration, and right scriptural interpretation, appear to us rather to weaken than strengthen the old foundations. We seem now to descend cap in hand into the arena, to meet this new genteel infidelity, which is clothed in clerical gown and cassock; and with bated breath and whispered humbleness we tame down our strong reasons pretty considerably. We concede more than God has conceded to cavilling unbelief. We are surprised into being too much on the defensive. We engage in affairs of outposts, too, while the conflict thickens towards the centre. The apostolic intimation (Coloss. ii. 7, 8) reminds us that the real antagonism with false philosophy and vain deceit is the person of Him in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily. This is the true stone of stumbling and rock of offence, the real scandal to unsanctified reason, the inveterate aversion of the unholy heart. Miracles would not be worth calling in question did they not authenticate the Divinity, Mission, and Redemption of Christ. Prophecy might be patronised by condescending philosophy, were not its spirit the testimony of Jesus. Progressive development in nature, and especially in humanity, would be, or rather are, doctrines per se highly palatable to the pride of science, but are intolerable when traced to the Divine purposes concerning the Incarnate Son of God, and the regeneration that is alone by him. Nevertheless, as progressive nature culminates in man, so progressive revelation culminates in IMMANUEL. Christ is the only key of all history, the sole solution of humanity's manifold enigmas; the expounder of the character and deeds of God. At this file the serpent may bite, and will bite; and it is just as well to present him direct the invulnerable steel. The Jewish nation; the Jewish Sabbath; the Jewish Scriptures; the Christian Church; the Christian Sabbath; the Christian Scriptures; the ordinances of Gospel preaching, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper; the circulation of the Bible in all languages and lands; the extension and success of Christian missions;—here are facts which are decidedly gravelling to the teeth of "remorseless criticism." To account for the existence of these facts without God, or without Christ, or apart from plan and purpose concerning the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, or on the supposition of the Scriptures being unreliable, is an achievement which is simply impossible. It is written in the Prophets "Ye are my witnesses;" and if existing Judaism and Christianity do not attest the miracles and the Divine power by which they are alleged to have been established, they are themselves marvels as unaccountable and as great as ever have been wrought or recorded.

In the volume entitled "Aids to Faith," we have been particularly pleased with the third essay on "Prophecy," by the Rev. Dr. M'Caul. We think he has happily grasped the true argument. He goes direct to THE BOOK. Whatever may be said of the prophecies, the Hebrew people believed that their prophets were predictors of future events by the authority of God, as well as teachers of his will. The prophets themselves affirm that they have power to predict, and they do utter predictions. Were they impostors or self-deluded fanatics? "That they were impostors is not believed by those Rationalists who have given most attention to this subject, as Gesenius, Ewald, and Knobel, and is disproved by their doctrine and their life." The unity of God, the Divine perfections, His character as an allwise righteous judge and governor, as well as a merciful and loving Father. The necessity of a worship of the heart, spiritual, humble, affectionate; and of a righteous moral conduct to our fellow men. To preach truths like these, and rebuke evil practices, whether of kings, or priests, or people, without fee or reward, and often in the face of contumely, punishment, and death; these were some of the characteristics of the prophets, which disprove the possibility of their being deceivers. And that they could have been self-deceiving enthusiasts is equally incredible by the same argument, which is as eloquently as convincingly stated by Dr. M'Caul in a passage we should like to transcribe did our limited space not forbid. Similar arguments, in a still more perfect degree, establish the authority of Our Lord and His apostles and their writings. It is impossible to believe Jesus and the apostles at all unless we believe them to be entirely true witnesses. And that they are such, neither deceiving nor deceived, is proved by their doctrines, character, and conduct, and the abiding influence of their teaching upon some of the best and wisest of mankind, and upon the dearest and most important interests of society. For aid to faith let us then go more and more to the Book itself. It is scarcely doubtful but that whosoever stumbles will be broken. Whosoever cavils will find faith not aided but still further weakened; while whosoever, as a little child, will bow before the Divine majesty of God's own truth, will find faith intellectually aided, indeed, as well as experimentally confirmed. Dr. M'Caul's defence of the genuineness of the disputed latter portions of Isaiah is masterly and triumphant. We wish he had not been quite so dogmatic in his assertions as to a knowledge of the Hebrew text necessarily enabling its possessor to reject such "cavils" as the rendering of Psalm ii. 12,* "worship purely," instead of "kiss the Son." We adhere to the authorised version, but candour compels us to admit that the Hebrew does not exclude the other rendering; that it possesses very considerable claims, from the context and from authority, to be admitted as the proper rendering; while, at the same time, to allow so much, does not in the least impugn the Messianic character of the Psalm.

We are unable to notice the other essays in this volume at any length, or indeed at all in our present article. The first on "Miracles," by Professor Mansel, is to us most unsatisfactory. If our faith were driven to rest upon miracles established by such arguments we should find a tottering foundation enough. We don't like the substitution of "superhuman" for "supernatural." Things may be superhuman yet not miraculous; and the whole argument in connexion reduces miracles out of their true category. There is a quotation, too, from Bishop Atterbury, which, amongst other things, alleges the necessity of miracles to prove "the doctrines of the Baptism and Supper of Our Lord." We will not pause to inquire what Bishop Atterbury meant by these "doctrines," and by including them in the same category as the cardinal doctrines of the Resurrection, the Trinity, and Salvation. But this and much more in the essay of Professor Mansel would tend very much to perplex instead of aiding our own faith, did it stand in any need of such help. The essay by Bishop Fitzgerald, "On the Evidences of Christianity," contains some useful hints, but as a whole is very much beneath the present condition of the argument. The Bishop, too, seems haunted by a phantom, and to be perpetually fighting a man of straw in a way that to us appears little short of ludicrous. He seems to take for granted that something which we have frequently seen charged on Wesleyanism (whether erroneously or otherwise), characterises generally the modern professors of Evangelical Divinity. A fair acquaintance with their writings, as well as a comparatively extensive intercourse with eminent living Christians of various sound denominations, would surely correct the misapprehension that fancy and feeling have been substituted in modern Evangelical Divinity for scriptural faith; or that an appeal to the conscious sanctification of the individual believer, necessarily supersedes the appeal also to rational argument and the evidence of moral characteristics in a child of God. Perhaps the good Bishop may be dealing with some perversions of truth of which we are not cognisant. To us, however, he always seems to be rather antagonising what is a real experience of some or many intelligent, sober, holy, and devoted believers. No human writings with which we are acquainted, possessing any tolerable degree of acceptance in the Church of God, express, or could express, in more strong, striking, and fervent words than do the Scriptures themselves of the New Testament, the comforting, exhilarating, elevating, and invigorating effects in the believer's soul, which are produced by a Divine faith in God through and in Christ Jesus. Bishop Fitzgerald, however, charges upon the "Evangelical Leaders"—not merely on obscure enthusiasts—a degree of folly and dereliction which he would find it difficult, we think, to substantiate. And when he attributes to that enthusiastic folly the rise of present infidelity (more or less), we think he is not likely to "aid" the faith much of the present generation by his strange caricature of that Evangelical Christianity, which at all events has founded our Bible, and Missionary, and Church Pastoral Aid, and other societies—the living confutation of his preposterous theories. It is true that after some sweeping and universal charges of this character against the Evangelical leaders and party, he finds it needful to qualify such random statements by saying that he is tracing the ultimate "development of false principles when left unchecked to their full operation." We cannot see the value of the remark. If a principle be false, its operation, whether full or partial, must be evil. If he means that a principle which, as enunciated by Evangelical leaders, was sound, was nevertheless perverted by enthusiastic followers, this is not at all what he has indicated or said. In fact, we take the liberty to think that he writes at random rather upon this part of his topic. And when he charges upon the great body of the religious writings of the last generation "a prevailing tendency to forget the aspect of Fact and view only the aspect of doctrine in contemplating the truths of Christianity," we believe that the remark may safely be left to its own unimportance. Mr. Coleridge was no Evangelical leader; and a mystical pronouncement of that misty oracle is the only groundwork for the Bishop's assertion with which his lordship favours us.

* The translation "kiss the Son," in Psalm ii. 12, has only the Syriac in its favour; the Seventy, the Targum, the Arabic, and the Vulgate, all render the Hebrew clause by "receive advice" or "instruction," and, among the great critics of Germany, this rendering is adopted by Ewald. The ancient Greek versions of Symmachus and Aquila substantially agree with Dr. R. Williams's version, "worship purely," and this is the rendering which Justus Olshausen, a celebrated Hebraist, seems inclined to adopt. Hupfeld, who is one of the very first Hebrew scholars, says the ordinary rendering is "utterly impossible," but thinks the text corrupt, and that we should read בָּרַךְ instead of בָּרַךְ, the clause then signifying, "submit yourselves to him." Without going to the length which Hupfeld does, we must remark there are several weighty objections to the ordinary translation. The Hebrew word for son is בֶּן (ben), used in verse 7 of this Psalm, while the word in verse 12 is בָּרַךְ (bar), never used in Hebrew for son, except in Proverbs xxxi. 2, which contains indubitable Chaldaisms; and it ought, if used here in the signification of son, either to have the article, or a suffix, or a following genitive. As to Dr. Williams' translation of Psalm xxii. 16, without going further into the question, we may remark that Leusden, one of the great Hebraists of the seventeenth century, and one thoroughly orthodox in his views, strongly advocated the view that בָּרַךְ in that passage could only mean "like a lion."

To us it appears rather, on the contrary, that a growing departure from "sound doctrine," far more than a disregard to Christianity's historical aspects, has, in many quarters, been a thing to be deplored; and has probably been an inciting cause to the progress of both superstition and unbelief. Where is the man who, taught of God to come to the Redeemer's feet to receive remission of sin, and peace, joy, and love, through faith in a reconciling Saviour, torments himself with the critical or historical doubts and disputations of men whom he instinctively knows to be unbelievers? We conclude, as we begun, the faith of such a one stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the authority of God. It may be the business of the college class-room, of the Divinity Professor's chair, of the more special university lecture, or of the public press, to unfold, and elucidate, and confirm historical Christianity as founded on facts ; but assuredly it is the special, if not exclusive, business of the Christian pulpit to preach "the doctrine" of Christ and Him crucified. There may be, and there is, an historical belief which is not Faith, in the New Testament Divine and saving sense of the term. It may be of some use to establish such belief (if, indeed, apart from living faith, it be ever very real, which we doubt) ; but to subordinate the Divine and saving Faith, or the instrumental mode by which God is pleased to work in producing that supernatural quality in man, to a process of historical demonstration as productive of belief, is, we think, to mistake the affair altogether. But our space forbids further comment on this or any other of these counter essays. And, in fine, we would prefer to say a word upon a work of very different calibre and value which we have just received, but not in time to notice at large. We allude to the Bishop of Ossory's most timely reprint and new edition of his invaluable treatise on the "Nature and Effects of Faith." Whether Bishop Fitzgerald includes Bishop O'Brien in the category of Evangelical leaders who have postponed fact to doctrine, we cannot tell. But of this we feel assured, that no child of God can read the Bishop of Ossory's invaluable treatise without thankfully perceiving that it is indeed calculated, by the Divine blessing, to strengthen his faith and clarify his perceptions upon the very most vital doctrine and fact, which affects his relation to God and his eternal destiny. Here is no random speculation, no quibbling away, no paring down, no diluting to insipidity, the true and solid gospel of a sinner's justification before God, by Faith only in a meritorious Saviour, according to the free grace of God. Were the Bishop of Ossory's doctrines taught at Oxford and Cambridge and other seminaries, preached in the pulpits, and winged on the press, as they ought to be, the counteraction of "Essays and Reviews," and the true "aid to faith" would be effectual and extensive. We commend this masterly treatise to the perusal of every child of God ; and we suggest to wealthy friends of the truth to place a copy of the Bishop of Ossory's book in every public institution possible. We desire to say so much without delay, and we hope in a future number to give some sketch of this work for the benefit of friends in distant parts of the world, who may have to wait long before they can possess themselves of a copy of the book itself. Meantime we feel assured that this is the idea for the crisis. It is not faith historical, but faith as the sole means of man's justification before God which is the "Articulus stantis vel cadentis Ecclesie." The nature and the effects of this Divinely implanted faith concerns also every individual human being in the very highest degree, and the lack of this one thing needful will render worthless, or worse than worthless, every other intellectual or spiritual acquirement or gift.

THE MORAL IMAGE OF JESUS.—Even if we were to regard the image of Jesus as an invention, we should have to confess it to be the sublimest fiction that the mind of man has ever conceived. We should have to own that, as a romance, it far transcends every common experience, and that in its world-transforming power, it had proved itself more mighty and more efficacious than the whole range of actual facts, of whose reality history gives us unquestionable evidence. But just because it does so transcend alike all the romance and all the reality in the world besides, it is impossible for us to regard it as a fiction ; just because it is so deeply and indissolubly interwoven with the whole development of the human race, and because, more particularly, the origin of the Christian Faith, in its peculiar features, would be utterly inexplicable if it be not true,—we must of necessity view it as historical and real.—Ullmann.

THE name of Horace Hayman Wilson is more known as an English Orientalist than any other scholar since the days of Sir William Jones. Sir William Jones, H. T. Colebrooke, and H. H. Wilson, may justly be regarded as the founders of Sanskrit Philology. If the scholars of the Continent who have excelled in this branch of study have been more numerous than those of England, which is a well known fact, and have, as a general rule, been more deeply read in their subject, they must acknowledge that it is to these English pioneers that much, if not all, of their success is due.

Mr. Wilson spent nearly twenty-four years of his life in India, having arrived there, we believe, in 1808, and having finally returned to England in 1832. He was an assistant surgeon in the service of the East India Company. His attention was, soon after his arrival in India, turned to the study of Sanskrit, and in 1813 he published in Calcutta the firstfruits of his literary labours in that language. This was the "Megha Dūta," or "Cloud Messenger," a poem of Kalidasa, edited with the Sanskrit text, a translation in English verse and copious explanatory notes. It was published under the sanction of the College of Fort William, and Lord Minto, having praised the work in high terms in an address to the students of that college, the English translation and notes were reprinted in England, and published in 1814 by Black, Parry, and Co., the then booksellers to the East India Company.

The "Megha Dūta" is a poem of much beauty. Its argument is as follows : A Yaksha, or demigod, having incurred the displeasure of his lord, was condemned to twelve months' banishment to a distant mountain from the city of the Yakshas, and consequently from his beloved wife. The poem opens at the commencement of the rainy season, after he had endured some months of his punishment, when the rain clouds were proceeding in the direction in which his home was situate. To one of these the Yaksha addresses himself, and requests the cloud to act as his messenger, and waft his sorrows to a beloved wife, directing the route it should pursue and the appearance of his loved spouse. One extract from Mr. Wilson's translation will give an idea of the poem and at the same time of his powers of translation in English verse :—

At times such solace animates her mind,
As widowed wives in cheerless absence find ;
She counts the flowers now faded on the floor,
That graced with monthly piety the door,
Thence reckons up the period since from home,
And far from her, was I compelled to roam ;
And deeming fond my term of exile run,
Conceives my homeward journey is begun.
Lightened by tasks like these the day proceeds,
But much I dread a bitterer night succeeds :
When thou shalt view her on the earth's cold breast,
Or lonely couch of separation rest,

* Works by the late Horace Hayman Wilson, M.A., F.R.S., Boden Professor of Sanskrit in the University of Oxford, &c. Vol. I. Essays and Lectures, Chiefly on the Religion of the Hindus. By the late H. H. Wilson. Collected and revised by Dr. RICHARD ROSE. In two vols. Vol. I. A Sketch of the Religious Sects of the Hindus. London: Trübner and Co. 1862.

Disturbed by tears those pallid cheeks that burn,
 And visions of her dearer half's return.
 Now seeking sleep, a husband to restore,
 And waking now, his absence to deplore;
 Deprived of slumber by returning woes,
 Or mocked by idle phantoms of repose;
 Till her slight form, consumed by ceaseless pain,
 Shows like the moon, fast hastening to its wane.

Mr. Wilson next devoted himself to the preparation of a Sanskrit dictionary, of which the first edition appeared in 1819, an incredibly short time for the execution of such a work. A second edition of this work was issued in 1832, and a third edition is now issuing from the press. Mr. Wilson entrusted this work to Dr. Theodor Goldstücker, Professor of Sanskrit in University College, London, and four parts have already been published by Messrs. Trübner and Co. It is to this great work that all the continental scholars have been so deeply indebted, and without which it would have been impossible for Bopp, Böhtlingk, &c., to have successfully prosecuted their studies in Sanskrit and Comparative Philology.

His next remarkable work was his "Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus," of which the first edition was published in Calcutta, 1826. It embraced a translation of six complete plays, an analysis of many others, and an opening essay on the dramatic system of the Hindus. The materials for this work had been collected by him during a residence in Benares. But works like these were not all; his contributions to the Asiatic Researches, the Journal of the Asiatic Society, and other journals, were very numerous, and on subjects of importance and of interest. Many of these, although not generally available from their mode of publication, are the standard, and in some cases the only authorities on the various topics of which they treat. We are glad to be able to announce that these will no longer be permitted to lie in the comparative obscurity in which they have been hid. No works are more deserving of a separate reissue, and we trust that the enterprise of Messrs. Trübner and Co., in commencing their republication, will be duly appreciated and rewarded as it ought, not only by the students of Sanskrit literature, but also by the general public, for whom very many of these works possess an almost equal interest.

In 1832 Mr. Wilson was elected to the Boden Professorship of Sanskrit in the University of Oxford, a chair then newly founded, and which he filled with honour until his death, in May, 1860, at the ripe age of seventy-five. It were well if, in all their appointments, the University of Oxford, with her sisters at Cambridge and Dublin, made use of equal discrimination as was shown in that appointment. Of his numerous works, issued after his elevation to the chair of Sanskrit, we cannot speak now particularly. His grammar of the Sanskrit language has not lessened in value since its publication, first in 1841, and then again in 1847. His translation of the "Vishnu Purana" still stands alone. The continuation of Mill's "History of India, from 1805 to 1835," is a standard authority. His companion volumes to Professor Max Müller's splendid edition of the "Rig-Veda"—namely, his translation of the same—must be of interest to every student, not only of Indian literature, but of the history of man. Three volumes of this work were successively issued during his lifetime, in 1850, 1854, and 1857, and the remaining volumes are now in preparation for publication, under the valuable editorship of Dr. Ballantyne, the late Principal of the Benares Sanskrit College, and now Professor of Sanskrit in King's College, London, and the successor of Wilson as librarian of the East India House.

Messrs. Trübner and Co. propose to reissue nearly the entire of Professor H. H. Wilson's printed works (excluding the Sanskrit dictionary, though including its preface, the Sanskrit grammar, and the translation of the "Rig-Veda," all of which can be got separately) in twelve octavo volumes, four of which are to be issued each year. We have now lying before us the first volume, which is complete in itself, and is a sketch of the Indian sects. It is very creditably got up, in a clear type, though, owing to its being printed in Berlin, there are several curious typographical blunders to be met with in the English, none of which, however, as far as we have noticed, are of any serious importance.

Some years ago it was a common impression among the generality of people that one language prevailed in India, as that country was naturally regarded as a unit. There is still a very general idea afloat that among the non-Christian natives there are but two religions prevalent, Hindu and Mussulman. This is indeed true to a great extent, but under the former name a number of sects of very diversified and conflicting opinions are embraced. There are besides a number of sects which are opposed to the generally received opinions of the Hindus.

Professor Wilson in this work divides the Hindus into three chief divisions: The Vaishnavas, as those especially revere Vishnu; the Saivas, or the followers of Siva; and the Sáktas, or the worshippers of the Sákti, the energy of the divine nature in action. Besides these there are the miscellaneous sects, which can be embraced under no common name, comprehending among others the Sikhs, the followers of Nának Sháh, the only Indian reformer who established a national religion, and the curious sect of the Jains.

These sects are not to be confounded with the orthodox worshippers of the above-mentioned deities. Professor Wilson says: "Few Brahmans of learning, if they have any religion at all, will acknowledge themselves to belong to any of the popular divisions of the Hindu faith, although, as a matter of simple preference, they more especially worship some individual deity, as their chosen, or Ishta Devatá: they refer also to the Vedas, the books of law, the Puránas, and Tantras, as the only ritual they recognise, and regard all practices not derived from those sources as irregular and profane: on the other hand, many of the sects seem to have originated in a great measure out of opposition to the Brahminical order: teachers and disciples are chosen from any class, and the distinction of caste is, in a great measure, sunk in the new one, of similarity of schism: the ascetics and mendicants, also in many instances, affect to treat the Brahmans with particular contempt, and this is generally repaid with interest by the Brahmans."

Among the Vaishnava sects the most ancient is that of the Sri Sampradáya, or Sri sect, founded by the reformer Rámánuja in the middle of the twelfth century. Their worship is addressed to Vishnu and Sri, or Lakshmi, his consort. The most striking peculiarities in their practices are the privacy with which they partake of their meals; the teachers may be attended on by their select pupils, but in general each of the Rámánujas have to cook for themselves; and should even their food be viewed by a stranger while in process of being cooked, the process of cooking is instantly put a stop to, and the viands buried in the ground. Their chief religious tenet is that Vishnu is Brahmá, and that he was the creator of the world. "Although they maintain that Vishnu and the universe are one, yet, in opposition to the Vedánta doctrines, they deny that the deity is void of form or quality, and regard him as endowed with all good qualities, and with a twofold form: the supreme spirit Paramátmá, or cause, and the gross one, the effect, the universe or matter." This opinion is adopted by most of the Vaishnava sects—creation arose from the desire of Vishnu, who existed alone, to multiply himself; "he said: I will become many; and he was individually embodied as visible and etherial light." A pupil of Rámánuja was Rámánand, who formed a new sect of his own, differing not very much from the Rámánujas, except in being set free from their peculiar observances as respects eating and bathing.

The most remarkable pupil of Rámánand was Kabír, who boldly assailed the whole system of idolatrous worship, ridiculed the learning of the Pandits and the doctrines of the Sástras, and likewise the Mullás and the Koran. Kabír probably flourished about the middle of the fifteenth century, and has been claimed, it is said, alike by Mohammedans and Hindus as belonging to their persuasions. The story goes that, on his death, a dispute arose between these parties as to the disposal of his corpse—the Hindus desiring to burn it, the Mohammedans to bury it—when suddenly Kabír himself appeared, and having desired them to look beneath the cloth, which it was supposed covered his body, vanished. On the cloth being removed, his body was nowhere to be found, but in its place was a heap of flowers, which were divided into equal portions by the disputing parties, who dealt with them in the same way as they would each have done with the corpse itself. The disciples of Kabír, though reckoned among the Vaishnava sects, because their master had been a pupil of Rámánand, are not bound to follow any of the rites of the Hindus. Those living in the world, however, do conform to the usages of caste, and some even pretend to worship the popular gods, though this is not considered justifiable. Those living apart from the world abstain from all such practices, and address their worship, which chiefly consists in hymns, exclusively to the invisible Kabír. They are distinguished by some outward signs, which are not, however, viewed as of importance, the inward and spiritual man being considered as the only essential point to be attended to.

Some of the aphorisms of Kabír are curious and instructive. The following may serve as specimens:—

How is it possible to reach the city when the guide cannot point out the road? When the boat is crazy, how shall the passengers get clear of the ghát?

When the master is blind, what is to become of the scholar? When the blind leads the blind, both will fall into the well.

Yet the master is helpless when the scholar is inert: it is blowing through a bambu, to teach wisdom to the dull.

The instruction of the foolish is waste of knowledge; a maund of soap cannot wash charcoal white.

The tree bears not fruit for itself, nor for itself does the stream collect its waters : for the benefit of others alone does the sage assume a bodily shape.

I have wept for mankind, but no one has wept with me ; he will join in my tears, who comprehends the word.

All have exclaimed, master, master, but to me this doubt arises : How can they sit down with the master whom they do not know ?

The moral code of this sect is short, and rather of a favourable tendency. Life is viewed as the gift of God, and therefore must not be violated by His creatures. Humanity, therefore, is enjoined on all of its members. Truth is another of their cardinal principles, as all the ills of the world and the ignorance of God that prevails among mankind are traceable to falsehood. Retirement from the world is recommended as favourable to meditation ; and, lastly, the pupil is enjoined to obey in thought, word, and deed, his guru, or spiritual teacher. This is not, however, to be a blind submission, as he is first to examine the doctrines of the teacher, and carefully to scrutinise his acts, before he yields himself up to his teaching. This last is one of the peculiar points which Kabir strongly urged on his disciples.

Dádú was a cotton-cleaner by profession, who was instructed by the followers of Kabir. He flourished about a century and a half later. He is supposed by his followers to have been absorbed in the deity. The tenets of his sect do not appear to have been very diverse from those of the sect of Kabir, though his followers are distinguishable in outward appearance from those of the latter. They are mutually on terms of friendly intercourse. An extract from one of the chapters, which the editor of this volume of Wilson's works has added from the 6th vol. of the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, will suffice to show the tendency of the doctrinal views of this sect. It is from the chapter on meditation, and the translator is Captain G. R. Siddons :—

Reverence to thee, who art devoid of illusion, adoration of God, obedience to all saints, salutation to those who are pious. To God the first, and the last.

He that knoweth not delusion is my God.

1. Dádú hath said, in water there exists air, and in air water ; yet are their elements distinct. Meditate, therefore, on the mysterious affinities between God and the soul.

2. Even as ye see your countenance reflected in a mirror, or your shadow in the still water, so behold Rám in your minds, because he is with all.

3. If ye look into a mirror, ye see yourselves as ye are, but he in whose mind there is no mirror cannot distinguish evil from good.

4. As the til plant contains oil, and the flower sweet odour, as butter is in milk, so is God in everything.

5. He that formed the mind made it as it were a temple for himself to dwell in ; for God liveth in the mind, and none other but God.

6. Oh, my friend, recognise that being with whom thou art so intimately connected ; think not that God is distant, but believe that, like thine own shadow, he is ever near thee.

7. The stalk of the lotus cometh from out of water, and yet the lotus separates itself from the water ! For why ? Because it loves the moon better.

8. So let your meditations tend to one object, and believe that he who by nature is void of delusion, though not actually the mind, is in the mind of all.

A very numerous sect are the Sákta, or the worshippers of the divine power in action. They are to be met with in all classes, and are especially numerous among the Brahmans of Bengal. Worshippers of Siva and of Vishnu are alike to be found among them, and the form in which the divine energy is personified and embodied differs according to the bias entertained by the individuals for the worship of these two deities. "The bride of Siva, however," Professor Wilson informs us, "in one or other of her many and varied forms, is by far the most popular emblem in Bengal and along the Ganges."

Their worship consists in the adoration of the female principle as distinct from the divinity, and seems to have arisen from a literal interpretation of the metaphorical language of the Vedas, which represents the desire to create as originating from the Creator, and as being his bride while part of himself. Thus the Sāma Veda: "He felt not delight, being alone. He wished another, and instantly became such. He caused his own self to fall in twain, and thus became husband and wife. He approached her, and thus were human beings produced." Professor Wilson remarks that in this passage, and in others in the Rig-Veda, "it is not unlikely that reference is made to the primitive tradition of the origin of mankind, but there is also a figurative representation of the first indication of wish or will in the Supreme Being. Being devoid of all qualities whatever, he was alone, until he permitted the wish to be multiplied, to be generated within himself. This wish being put into action, it is said, became united with its parent, and then created beings were produced."

What impurities this literalisation of metaphorical language has led to may well be understood when Professor Wilson informs us that "all the principal ceremonies comprehend the worship of Sakti, and require for that purpose the presence of a female, as the living representative and the type of the goddess. This worship is mostly celebrated in a mixed society, the men of which represent Bhairavas, or Viras, and the women Bhairavis and Nāyikās. The Sakti is personated by a naked female, to whom meat and wine are offered, and then distributed amongst the assistants, the recitation of various Mantras and texts, and the performance of the Mudrá, or gesticulations with the fingers, accompanying the different stages of the ceremony, and it is terminated with the most scandalous orgies amongst the votaries. The ceremony is entitled the Sri Chakra, or Pūrnābhisheka, the Ring, or Full Initiation." Professor Wilson, indeed, says: "In justice to the doctrines of the sect, it is to be observed that these practices, if instituted merely for sensual gratification, are held to be as illicit and reprehensible as in any other branch of the Hindu faith." But though this may be true in theory, in practice credat Judæus Apella. It is to be hoped that such disgusting ceremonies occur, as Wilson considers, but seldom, though laid down in their ritual.

We have alluded before to Nānak Sháh, the Indian reformer. His principles have been especially adopted by the Sikhs, though by no means by them alone. Several varying sects have sprung from him. His doctrine, however, differed little from that of his master, Kabir, and from the Hindu faith in general. Both laboured to persuade the Hindus and Moham-medans that the essentials of each of their creeds were common to both, that they should discard all the corruptions of their teachers, and unite in the worship of one only supreme god, whether termed Allah or Hari. An extract from one of their hymns will not be devoid of interest:—

Love, and fix thy whole heart upon Him—
 The world is bound to thee by prosperity—
 No one is another's.
 Whilst prosperity endures many will come,
 And sit with thee and surround thee ;
 But in adversity they will fly,
 And not one will be near thee.
 The woman of the house who loves thee,
 And is ever in thy bosom,
 When the spirit quits the body,
 Will fly with alarm from the dead.
 Such is the way of the world
 With all on which we place affection ;
 Do thou, Nanak, at thy last hour,
 Rely alone upon Hari.

We must pass by the sect of the Yogis and that of the Jains without any notice, and the still more interesting sect of the Sádhs, apparently the most enlightened of the many sects sketched by Professor Wilson. We need not say we have scarcely alluded to one-tenth of those mentioned in the volume before us, but enough has been quoted to show the varying nature of Hindu faith and the value of this work of Professor Wilson to all who are interested in the history and religion of India.

MEMORIALS OF THE REV. A. F. LACROIX*.

No one who has read the very interesting memoir of the Rev. J. J. Weitbrecht is quite unacquainted with the labours of Mr. Lacroix. The former missionary was a valued labourer under the Church Missionary Society, the latter an equally esteemed soldier of the cross in the ranks of the London Missionary Society. Weitbrecht reached India in 1830, and was welcomed by Lacroix, who had been there nearly ten years before, and after upwards of twenty years labour in that land received the call of his Lord to "come up higher" in 1852, while the veteran Lacroix was permitted to labour in the plains of Bengal until the middle of 1859, when he likewise was removed to his peaceful home, having borne the toil and heat of the day during more than thirty-eight years of missionary labour.

Mr. Lacroix left behind him few materials from whence to compose a full account of his life and labours. Upon his papers and letters he laid a prohibition as to their publication. The memoir, therefore, is not so full and complete as that of the younger missionary Weitbrecht. But Dr. Mullens has executed his work of love with great credit ; and much of instruction and information is to be found in these memorials, which we commend to the readers of Christian biography. The sketch of Mrs. Mullens, given at the close of the work cannot also be read without interest.

Mr. Lacroix was born amid the sublime scenery of Switzerland in 1799, a most eventful period of European history. Reared, owing to his father's early death, under the paternal roof of his pious uncle, he was not only trained in the ordinary branches of education, but imbibed also a deep knowledge of Christian truth. Though well trained in many particulars, and possessing a good knowledge of several modern languages, he never had the opportunity of acquiring that higher scholarship which is only obtainable after years of study in a university or superior college. The absence of this information, it is worth noting, was mourned by him to the last; and if a man of his abilities, which were of no mediocre stamp, ever felt the want of such instruction, much more is it needed by those who possess but ordinary abilities.

During the military fever which prevailed so widely in 1814, Mr. Lacroix, then a boy of the age of fifteen, determined to enlist in the ranks of the French army. But the uncle had other plans with regard to his nephew's course of life. At last, however, after many entreaties, his consent was obtained, and the youth set out on his journey to the French quarters. An interesting incident Dr. Mullens records here of the power of prayer. "As the young enthusiast crossed the ravine of the Aar, above which the lofty terraces of Berne and the massive towers of its minster stand conspicuous, suddenly a hand seemed laid upon his shoulder, and a voice rang loud in his heart: 'What doest thou here? return.' He paused, obeyed, and at once hastened back; his purpose vanished for ever; and flinging himself into his uncle's arms, he cried, 'Ah! dear uncle, you have been praying for me, I know: you have been calling me back, and here I am!'" He was not to serve as a soldier under the standard of the Emperor of France, but as a soldier under the standard of the King of Kings.

His uncle, who by prayer had arrested his nephew in his warlike course, designed him as a helper in his own sphere of work at Neuchatel. But when the desire to devote himself to the missionary cause was expressed by the nephew in a letter from Holland, where he had gone for a time to reside as a tutor in the family of a Dutch gentleman, his uncle willingly gave him up for that higher service. Mr. Lacroix accordingly offered himself to the Netherlands Missionary Society, who sent him forth to Chinsurah, at that time under Dutch rule, where he arrived on March 21st, 1821. Under that society he laboured until the transfer of the Dutch settlements, in 1825, to the English, after which transfer, the Netherlands Missionary Society having resolved to quit India, he united himself to the London Missionary Society, considering it inexpedient to quit that field of labour in which he was then usefully employed.

Those who expect to find in this biography accounts of wonderful and numerous conversions of Hindus, will be disappointed, as, no doubt, they will be with other missionary biographies. But they will read of steady progress, sometimes apparently retarded for a while, and understand something of the difficulties to be met with in this branch of the work for Christ. We will not attempt to give here an account of Mr. Lacroix's labours, but would wish to note one of the difficulties which he had to encounter.

This arose from the narrow feeling of sectarianism, which produces evil fruit everywhere, and nowhere more than when it is unhappily displayed on a heathen soil. No sooner did the mission at Rammakalchoke begin to produce fruit in the shape of conversions than a hot controversy with regard to the mode of baptism, whether by sprinkling or dipping, was forced upon the converts. Instead of those who differed from the ordinary views of Christians on these unimportant subjects bending their force against the heathen elsewhere, they began to proselytize among the weakly Christians who had just emancipated themselves from Hinduism. Nor did the spirit of sectarianism stop here. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel likewise came down on the fold. Happily these controversies died away, and in general the different societies avoided trespassing on each other's grounds except so far as to unite together in harmoniously working for the same great object that all had at heart—the spreading of the Redeemer's kingdom in the hearts of men. Yet still, during the last few years of Mr. Lacroix's pastorate, some young missionaries of the Propagation Society could not refrain themselves from an outburst of sectarian zeal, and led to an indignant protest from Mr. Lacroix in such words as the following:—

From what quarter did this opposition to the mission arise? was it from the Brahmins of the country? Their hostility to Christianity has always existed, and we are not surprised at it. But this opposition is of later origin, and is the more astonishing and more to be deplored, because attempted by Christian men and Christian missionaries. These men, in direct opposition to the written assurance of Bishop Corrie that our mission would not be interfered with, have entered our mission-stations: this we bore. They have drawn away our converts: this we also bore. But they have gone further; they have told the natives that we are no missionaries, and that our baptism is invalid: this we cannot bear. It is, indeed, a poor recompence, after twenty years' struggle with difficulties, amid the humidity and scorching heat of Bengal, to have such things said of us—of us who were occupying these stations long before the youths who utter them had put off their school jackets to enter college. I appeal to you: Have we not just cause for indignation? God willing, I shall yet visit England, France, Germany, and Switzerland, and to each and to all of them shall I proclaim what bigotry among Christians has done and can do.

We hope and trust the causes that led to this protest are not now at work. The Calcutta Missionary Conference, in the formation of which Mr. Lacroix bore an important part, has done much to produce mutual love and harmony among the Christian bodies. All the missionary societies at work in India have done something for the evangelisation of that land. The Baptists have had their great men, the other Dissenting bodies have been well represented, and the Church of England, by means of her two great missionary societies, has done likewise a highly-important work. But the day of work will soon be over, and the shades of night compel the labourers to return to their homes. There is no time for the lesser controversies while the greater controversies are so pressing. There is certainly much more of the spirit of evangelical love exhibited by all denominations in India than at home; but as an Indian missionary expresses it, "there is no excuse for any here. Jesus has condescended to leave on record His prayer—may we not look on it as His request to us? 'Be ye one, that the world may believe on me.' Oh! how warmly should we love all who are one in Christ; how closely should we, amid the gloom of earth, cling to Him from whom all our springs do flow."

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

March, 1862.

INCREASED PUBLIC IMPORTANCE OF RELIGIOUS QUESTIONS.

A political journal recently remarked that religious matters, home or foreign, had occupied the greater part of the sittings, both of the Senate and the Corps Legislatif, and it expressed some dissatisfaction on this head. The fact thus indicated is indisputable; but we do not share the ill humour of this newspaper at seeing religion occupy so large a place in the attention and the discussions of our country.

Many superficial persons had imagined that, after the attacks of Voltaire and Rousseau upon Christianity, all that concerned sacred things must be thrown aside, or at least take a very inferior position. These people pretended that industry, commerce, railroads, free trade, in one word—material interests—alone deserved the attention of human societies. "Religion," said they, "has had its day," and their unbelieving hearts rejoiced at this singular success. But they may now see that their calculation was false, and their triumph chimerical. Never, since the epoch of the Reformation, have religious affairs been more warmly debated in our political bodies than at the present time. Immediately that the words Rome, the Church, priests, monastic congregations, religious societies, &c., are pronounced, every one becomes attentive; emotions—passions even—are aroused, and it is easy to perceive that in this subject of religion there exists for the majority of men an interest which surpasses all others.

These indications ought not to surprise us. The human soul is never entirely immersed in material life, and it never finds repose in unbelief. A sort of spiritual instinct recalls to it the great thoughts of God, of immortality, of redemption, of duty, of labouring for its own salvation; and when these questions arise, in one form or another, in our legislative assemblies, it is like an electric spark, re-awakening and re-animating even the most indifferent.

I am far from saying that piety has conquered much new ground in France, but if you read the numerous and vehement speeches delivered in our two Chambers respecting the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the position of the clergy, the establishment of new monastic institutions, schools considered in their relations with the Church, and the like, you will see that neither financial embarrassments nor the difficulties of colonization in Algeria, nor the state of our manufactures under the burden of the war in America, nor any industrial or military subject, has obtained, amongst our senators and our deputies, an attention comparable to that which they have accorded to religious matters. As it would be impossible to analyze, in the short space of a letter, these different discussions, we will confine ourselves to the interminable Roman question, and the new aspects which it has assumed.

DEBATES ON THE ROMAN QUESTION IN THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES.

Last year the partizans of the Papacy demanded that the Roman Pontiff should be reinstated in the possession of all his States—including the Marches of Umbria and the Romagna—by the aid of our soldiers. It seemed to them quite simple, quite natural, that the French army should be employed to fight the Italians, and to replace the emancipated populations under their ancient yoke. In the recent discussions the most zealous advocates of the temporal power have not dared to express such demands, they have been willingly content with the promise of indefinite protection to the Pope, within the limits of Rome and the neighbouring territory. This is already a great step in advance. Last year the address of the Senate contained not a single word of blame in respect of the Roman Court, and reserved for the poor Italians only, its complaints and its reproaches. Now the aspect of affairs is changed. If our grave senators charge the Piedmontese with advancing immoderate pretensions, they also declare that the Pontifical See has been too unyielding in its resistance and refusals. The balance is even, and equilibrium established between the contending parties. The second and still more striking indication of progress is in the address of the Chamber of Deputies. Last year the Government orators continued to express the hope that Pius IX. would accept and accomplish certain political reforms. They inferred that, by this course, the Pontiff would preserve his temporal sovereignty over Rome and the patrimony of St. Peter, whilst maintaining friendly relations with the rest of Italy. Now this hope has vanished. M. Billault, the chief advocate of the Imperial policy in the Legislative Chambers, has plainly avowed that it is impossible to obtain any concession from the Papacy. Rome and the adjacent territory must, sooner or later, be re-united to their common country. Only M. Billault adds that the fitting moment has not yet arrived; that an immediate decision would be fraught with many dangers, &c. This, then, is merely a question of time. The fall of the temporal authority is certain; it is deferred only by considerations of prudence. This is the third sign of progress.

A last fact must be noted. A wide schism amongst the men who, since the 2nd December, 1851, had sustained the crown of Napoleon III., has become apparent. During a great portion of this decennial period, the priests, the legitimists, the nobles—all friends of the old régime, had given the hand to the Bonapartists, and shewn a lively zeal for the interests and the power of the Emperor. Now, this entente cordiale is destroyed. The Roman question has created an abyss between these temporary allies. Should this party find an opportunity for overthrowing Napoleon III. without opening the door to the terrors of the Red Republic, they would certainly not fail to turn it to account. On the other hand, the democrats who have hoisted the Napoleonic banner, have combated with more vigour than formerly anti-revolutionary ideas. We may hope that the struggle of the clergy and the legitimist party against the Emperor will turn to the advantage of free institutions, which are themselves so necessary to the progress of vital religion in our country.

OPPOSITION OF THE GOVERNMENT TO THE JOURNEY OF THE BISHOPS TO ROME.

Another subject of quarrel has broken out between the French Government and the Episcopal body. You are aware of the project of an universal Council, convoked at Rome for the month of May next. The Pope and Cardinal Antonelli had devised a singular pretext for summoning to the pontifical city all the bishops of their communion; the occasion being the canonization of twenty-three missionaries, burnt in Japan towards the close of the 16th century! What a fine and admirable discovery—these ancient martyrs, whose names had fallen into profound oblivion! And why are all the Popish prelates of France, of Spain, of Austria, of England, and of the United States, invited to assist at this canonization? Evidently, the reason alleged by the Pontifical Court is false and absurd. If the Pope exhorts so many bishops to subject themselves to the fatigues and expenses of so long a journey, he has quite a different end in view. The Council is intended to consider the question of the temporal power; and as the high dignitaries of the Papal Church would be unanimous in deciding that the preservation of this terrestrial royalty is a law of God, the Roman See would avail itself of their new article of faith to trouble the Catholic governments and peoples throughout the whole world.

Napoleon III. and his Ministers easily discerned the danger hidden beneath the pretended ceremony in favour of the Japanese martyrs, and the official Moniteur has recently published a note, in which it is said that the French ambassador was instructed to ask for explanations respecting this convocation. "Cardinal Antonelli," proceeds the note, "replied that the letter addressed to the bishops was only a friendly invitation, having no obligatory character, and an invitation to a solemnity purely religious. In this state of things, the Government expressed the opinion that the bishops ought not to leave their dioceses, and demand the requisite authority for quitting the empire, except in the known event of grave diocesan interests calling them to Rome."

This is sufficiently significant. Cardinal Antonelli had recourse to a ruse in his reply, and the Cabinet of Louis Napoleon took him fully at his word, feigning to believe that the convocation had not the slightest obligatory character. Consequently, it apprised the bishops that they would not be authorized to go to Rome, except for the discussion of diocesan affairs. This was equivalent to a prohibition. Now, what will the bishops do? It seems that these reverend personages, after having exchanged several letters, are not of one mind. Some have expressed the opinion that their duty is to repair to Rome without the authorization of the Government, and in spite of its formally expressed desire. These are the most violent, such as M. Pis, Bishop of Poitiers; M. Plantier, Bishop of Nîmes; M. Doney, Bishop of Montauban; and others animated by the same spirit. But Cardinal Morlot, Archbishop of Paris, and, generally, those prelates who unite prudence to zeal, advise their colleagues not to push matters to extremity. Suppose, in fact, that the Emperor, irritated by the perverse proceedings of the French episcopate, were to order our troops to evacuate Rome during the session of the Council, what would become of the bishops and the cardinals, before the unloosed onslaught of popular passions? Their very lives would not be safe. It is, therefore, probable that the majority of our prelates will restrain themselves, and that the small minority of malcontents will not be able to excite any serious apprehension amongst the depositaries of political authority.

THE QUESTION OF THE MARRIAGE OF PRIESTS BEFORE THE TRIBUNALS.

A very interesting judicial question has recently been argued before the tribunal of Perigueux, in the department of Dordogne. The definitive judgment has not yet been pronounced; for half of the judges are of one opinion, and the other half of the contrary. The High Court of Cassation, moreover, will have to pronounce, in the last resort, upon the matter. The point is, whether a priest, or, to speak more correctly, an ex-priest, has the right to contract a legal marriage in our country. I will briefly state the facts.

M. Bron de Laurière, formerly curé in a parish of the diocese of Perigueux, having renounced the exercise of the sacerdotal functions, presented himself, with Mlle. Elizabeth Fressanget, before the mayors of Perigueux and of Condrieux, demanding from these magistrates to be married according to the forms established by the civil law. But both refused him, saying that a priest was not at liberty to marry. Then M. Bron de Laurière brought the matter before the judicial authorities. His advocate was M. Jules Faure, member of the legislative body, and one of our most eloquent orators. It was alleged, in substance, by the Procureur Imperial, that a priest had taken an oath of perpetual celibacy; that he therefore could not marry without committing perjury, and that the law must not authorize the accomplishment of a criminal act. Moreover, if priests had the right to marry, auricular confession would become impossible, or at least would be involved in difficulty; for where is the woman—the young girl—who would dare to entrust her closest secrets to a man who, some days afterwards, might form a legitimate union with some other woman? Thirdly, public morality would be shocked by the sight of a married priest, and the civil legislator ought to avoid corrupting the conscience of the people by presenting them with spectacles of sacrilege and depravity.

These reasonings may be easily refuted. This is an affair of doctrine, or of internal discipline, with which the civil law has nothing to do. No civil law prevents a priest from embracing Protestantism, and even from becoming a Protestant pastor. We have in France several ministers of the Gospel who, in their youth, received Romish ordination. Well, then, these Protestant pastors would not be at liberty to marry! But if they may do the greater thing, that is to say, renounce the Popish priesthood to exercise the functions of the sacred ministry in a reformed church, why should they not do the less? As to the arguments drawn from auricular confession, and the respect due to public morality, they are not worth the trouble of answering.

DETAILS RESPECTING THE FIRST LECTURE OF M. RENAN.

The students of the colleges and other academic institutions of Paris have been greatly excited, within these last few weeks, by the measures taken in regard to M. Renan. This gentleman, who was educated in a Romish seminary, long since abandoned clerical studies and became a free-thinker. He has published several works upon the history of religions, on the book of Job, &c., which have been well received by the public. He is a man of learning and talent, but holding Pantheistic opinions. He was appointed Professor of Hebrew at the College de France—the first educational establishment in Paris. This nomination was, I think, a mistake on the part of the Minister of Public Instruction. A disciple of Hegel ought not to be called to such a charge. However that may be, the passions of the young people were inflamed. Some were resolved, beforehand, to hiss the new professor, on behalf of the Roman Catholic faith; others, in greater number, had decided to applaud him, in the interest of what they regard as freedom of inquiry. The crowd of hearers at his first discourse was prodigious, and the expressions of opinion were tumultuous. Next day the Minister of Public Instruction published an ordinance, which suspended, for an indefinite period, M. Renan's course; first, because he had wounded Christian beliefs; second, because his lectures might provoke excitement that could only be deplored. This was, perhaps, a second fault. M. Renan appeared to the young people as a martyr, or a victim of clerical intolerance. Several thousands of students assembled in crowds in the streets and squares, and order was seriously disturbed. The police, with the aid of the military, made several arrests. This agitation has not yet subsided.

PECUNIARY EMBARRASSMENT OF OUR RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

I have very little to communicate to you on the state of our Protestant Churches during the last month. The majority of the Christian Societies of Paris have issued circulars, in which they state that their expenses exceed their receipts by a large amount. Different causes have contributed to the diminution of voluntary contributions. Commerce is paralyzed by the events of America, and the uncertainties of the general situation in Europe. The last harvest was a bad one, and all the necessaries of life are at a high price. We must provide for the urgent wants of the poor. Nevertheless it is sad to see our most holy enterprises arrested or crippled in their operations by the fear of a deficit. The true disciples of Christ are called, in such circumstances, to make extraordinary sacrifices.

FUND FOR AGED PASTOR

The other subject which has occupied our Consistories is the foundation of a superannuation fund for aged or infirm pastors. The Government has invited our ecclesiastical bodies to put their desires on this subject into definite form. God grant that this question may be decided in a spirit of foresight and of liberality!

ITALY.

Florence, March 18, 1862.

CHANGE OF MINISTRY.

The resignation of Ricasoli has taken Italy by surprise. This feeling is deepening into regret. Already the Constitution is loved more than any public man. The back-stairs influence which has raised Rattazzi to power is acknowledged. The Cromwell of Tuscany stands higher than before in estimation, and will soon again be called to the helm of national affairs. His successor outlines no new policy, possesses no more facilities for solving the disquieting Roman question, and constitutes a Cabinet as faulty, from the preponderance of Northern influence, as the former one was from its too purely Tuscan character. Time alone can give the country a thoroughly Italian Ministry. The statesmen are not wanting, but their previous acquaintance with each other has been very short. The abortive revolutions of 1848 and later years powerfully aided the present pacific movement, by testing the leading men, winnowing the patriots from the demagogues, heralding the one class into the councils of the King, and leaving the other to the contempt of the people. But the entirely local experience of men and interests hitherto possible will necessarily give a "district," instead of a "country," aspect to each successive Cabinet.

The character of Ricasoli was his strength. Rattazzi is a man of great ability, but represents more the policy of expediency than stanch principle. His Administration will have a fair trial, but takes the field amid wide-spread distrust and fear. How the French Emperor and the Garibaldian party are to be conciliated by precisely the same measures remains to be seen. Presently the strong support of both is promised. It should be known, to the credit of Rattazzi, that in 1859 he carried a measure through Parliament abolishing all penalties for speaking or writing against the religion of the State, which we hope soon to see applied to Tuscany. The change of Ministry threatens no evil to the Evangelical cause. As long as liberty of conscience and the right to circulate the Word of God are guaranteed, a thousand inconveniences arising from the novelty of the system or the bigotry of priests are unworthy of mention.

THE NEW CLERICAL MOVEMENT.

The clerical movement grows apace. The Waldensian and Free Italian Churches are carrying on separate and successful missions, but it is strongly believed by many that nothing on a national scale will be accomplished till the clergy of Rome are stirred to action. This belief will account for the deep interest now taken in the protests daily sent to the Pope from parishes, district associations, and cathedral chapters too numerous to name. Sicily and Lombardy are taking the lead in pleading with the Pope to resign his temporal sovereignty; but Naples and Turin have their organised societies to hasten the action of the Holy Father. The liberal-clerical party in Naples is in great force, and speaks through the columns of the Colonna di Fuoco (Pillar of Fire), a bi-weekly newspaper. The leading article a few weeks ago on the "Reading of the Bible," may well excite fear in the Papal camp. The Bible is recognised as the cause of England's prosperity, and to the absence of it in the school, the family, and the country, is attributed all the past ills of Italy.

From Turin emanate many noble papers from the pens of Passaglia, Liverani, Reale, and other priests of distinguished gifts and high positions in the Church. The organ of the party is the Mediator, a weekly journal, which treats of the irrepressible conflict in a far different tone from that of its deadly opponents the Armonia, Civiltà Cattolica, and other exponents of Antonellian Catholicism. Passaglia—the Luther of the small, but influential, band—has been singled out by Veuillot, the late editor of the suppressed Univers, who has pronounced a series of hearty and horrifying maledictions upon his head.

A PRIEST ON POISH PIETY.

One of these reformers has lately startled the whole realm of thought by a brochure upon "Il Clero et Società"—the Clergy and Society. Perfetti, the author, is reputed a very pious man, and the strain of fine Christian feeling which pervades his work, harmonises with the seriousness of the theme. He wields the pen of a practised writer, in showing the entire alienation of the priesthood and modern society, and eloquently proves the necessity of a radical cure for the deep-seated malady, unless the Church is to be swept away as a useless thing, devoid of all healthy influence. The Pope, the priests, and the Church, must be brought back to the simple model of primitive Christianity. A thoughtful writer has sagaciously remarked that here there is more meant than what is said, and that here we have the corner-stone of a new edifice.

Take one or two extracts. Speaking of the great number of pious people he had known in the course of his life, Perfetti mournfully says:—

I have asked all these excellent Christians, to whom the things of sight and sense were but shadows, and who felt in the decay of the outward man the growth of an inward and immortal life, to tell me the means by which they reached Jesus Christ and peace. Some of them have pointed me to the Bible, others have spoken of the writings of the Fathers; some have raised their finger to heaven; others, like the mystic in his simplicity, have repeated the adage, "The way of the Cross is the way of light;" but almost none have mentioned the priest, or that priest has come to the truth by the very same way as themselves. The official clergy, the high dignitaries of the Church, have not had the smallest part, the most insignificant influence in these truly supernatural conversions, which are wholly inexplicable apart from the grace of God.

Hear his views as to the Scriptures:—

One of the most serious blunders of the Catholic clergy for several centuries past has been the removal from the hands and houses of the people of the treasure of the Bible. The populations of Protestant lands, in the judgment of impartial men, are much more religious than those of Catholic countries, thanks to the assiduous reading of Holy Scripture.

POPULAR CONTEMPT FOR THE POPE IN FLORENCE.

At the recent Florentine carnival, sad evidence was given of the low esteem in which the Pope is held. On the 5th of December an English mob burns his effigy, while here an utter contempt is shown towards his sacred person. Amid the throng of gay equipages at the Corso on the last day of carnival, a carriage was to be seen in which a dog was placed, dressed up in all the gaudy vestments of the owner of the Vatican, and bearing on its head the triple crown. The crowd was immensely gratified with the exhibition. A country priest, burning with shame, rushed forward to seize the tiara, and was with difficulty saved from the fury of the populace by several policemen, who walked him off to prison. The walls of the town tell the same tale, for the theatre bills announce popular dramas under the titles of "The Waldenses" (I Valdesi), "Fenelon in the Convent of Cambray," "Religion and Superstition," &c.

THE CHURCHYARD A MEANS OF EVANGELISATION.

The churchyard in Piedmont has, in recent years, been made a means of evangelisation. The same thing is taking place in other districts. Indeed, it is very much on this ground that the native Christians of Florence require a more convenient cemetery than that at Trespiano, which the Government has provided. Two cases have occurred this month, which have caused a great sensation in their respective neighbourhoods. At the interment of a Milanese Christian woman, some 2,000 people followed the bier, while the windows of all the streets through which the procession passed were crowded with spectators. The scene is described as very touching, by my informant, when the popular evangelist, Logomarsino, began to preach the Gospel to the assembled multitude, with a little mound of earth as his pulpit. The most perfect silence prevailed during the delivery of the discourse, and no one spoke a word of contradiction as the preacher reasoned of sin, and righteousness, and judgment to come, at the grave of one who had long been a patient sufferer, and was now in glory.

In the other case, in the Island of Elba, an equal number of persons came together in the leading square of Porto Ferraio, followed the corpse a certain distance, and, but for the torrent of rain which began to pour, would have accompanied it to its last resting place. As it was, about 100 braved the storm, and listened attentively to the address of the evangelist Peccennini. The deceased had been a follower of the Lord secretly, for she was not known in the Evangelical Church. On her deathbed she refused the services of the priests, and desired that the Protestant minister should officiate at the funeral. This, of course irritated the Catholic clergy. Arrangements were made with the "Misericordia," the charitable association in each Italian town, which attends to the sick, dying, and dead. Within fifteen minutes of the time for discharging the last melancholy duty, a message was sent that though the society was a purely benevolent one, and recognised no distinctions of rank or opinion, it was still so closely allied with the Papal Church, in origin and constant patronage, that its services must be withheld on the present occasion. The news spread like wildfire; the citizens openly expressed their indignation, and ran with one accord, as of old, to the market-place, where the few evangelicals were surrounded by the sympathising throng as they bore away the body to the grave.

DEATH OF A CONVERTED FLORENTINE.

An humble Christian, who has just died in Florence, deserves a passing record. Francesco Bartoloni, a musician by profession, and constitutionally delicate, was gifted with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit. In 1851 he became acquainted with those who in secret read the Bible, and shortly afterwards gave proof of true conversion of heart by a holy walk with God in very trying circumstances. He at once resigned that part of his professional income which was derived from singing in the churches—his conscience forbidding him to take part in such heartless service of God—and supported his aged mother and himself with the scanty gains of a violin player in the theatres. Though contented with this humble fare, and refusing to make known his evident poverty, he made several ineffectual efforts to better his condition. In this way he was led to Greece, where he spoke to his Italian brethren of Jesus, and established meetings for the reading of the Word of God and prayer. In 1860 an enfeebled state of health disabled him from much exertion. The following year brought him to his last illness, when he showed a steadfastness of faith and entire reliance on the Saviour which edified all the brethren who visited him. His replies to questions about his health were full of grateful resignation to the will of God. The reading of a portion of Scripture was his greatest consolation. It was while prayer was being offered up on his behalf, and at his special request, on the 2nd day of February last, that this exemplary Christian man, of thirty-four years of age, entered peacefully into the joy of his Lord. The most noticeable feature in Bartoloni's character was spirituality of mind. It will be long before the brethren forget how he used to hurry from the distasteful occupations of the theatre to the congenial atmosphere of a Bible-reading meeting, seeming to leave behind him every remembrance of the worldliness by which he had been surrounded. So genuine was his affection to the Saviour, and so truly was his life one of faith, that he could not remain any time without speaking of heavenly things, and whatever the conversation might be, he always, with some text of Scripture or warm Christian utterance, turned it into a channel of blessing. He was a striking trophy of Divine grace.

PROTESTANT BOOKS FOR THE LONDON EXHIBITION.

Among the treasures of art which are being sent from this country to adorn the International Exhibition in London, the Evangelical books printed during the last ten years in Turin and Florence find a place. From the display which took place here last autumn, and the energetic measures adopted by the committee in Turin, we look forward to a great change of opinion in England with regard to the mineral products and manufacturing skill of Italy, a large number of whose artisans have already been nominated to be sent at the public expense to London. And I am sure that the Christian stranger, wandering intelligently down the aisles of the Italian department, will not pass unnoticed or uninterested the small collection of Bibles and the "Pilgrim's Progress," and a hundred other Evangelical treatises, though surrounded with illuminated missals, breviaries in the richest style of binding, and priestly robes of costly magnificence.

EDUCATIONAL EFFORTS.

The "Philanthropic Association of Italian Women" has commenced its educational abours in Southern Italy by opening a school at Torre del Greco, which is kindly superintended by Mr. Wreford, the Times' correspondent at Naples. Two pupil teachers have been sent from a Florentine training school. The patronage of the liberal aristocracy has been obtained, and a considerable number of donations have already been received. As many of the ladies of England are now interesting themselves in this enterprise, to which Garibaldi has given his hearty word of encouragement, I have made particular inquiries, and find that while no sisters of charity are in any way connected with the schools, it is still true that the Bible is excluded from them, and that the liberal priests have been appealed to by the energetic promoters to lend their aid and superintendence. An excellent volume of original compositions, in prose and poetry, by the managing committee of ladies, is being sold at a bazaar price, to increase the funds. As there is nothing Protestant in making the Bible the first of school-books, and as the liberal priests of Naples desire that the Government should see to its introduction, I hope the association will, ere long, concede this important point, otherwise the boasted programme of "morality, patriotism, respect for law, love of work, and temperance," will remain a thing of high-sounding phrases. At the same time, when the difficulties of the country are considered, it is most gratifying to hear of any such benevolent co-operation towards such a praiseworthy aim. The Government is most strenuous in establishing excellent schools, and in enforcing the attendance of all the Neapolitan conscripts in Genoa. Private effort is also worthy of honourable mention. The Marquis Torrigiani has opened an evening school in Florence, at which 300 adults receive the elements of a good education.

LEGHORN PROTESTANT CEMETERY—GAVAZZI—PROSECUTED EVANGELISTS.

The Leghorn municipality has spent 160*l.* in building a wall round that portion of the public cemetery allotted by law to the Evangelicals of the town.

Signor Gavazzi has resumed his "conferences" in Florence, and draws large audiences.

In a few days, the trials of several of our Elba, Leghorn, and Florentine evangelists take place at Lucca, the result of which you will hear in my next communication.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, March 18, 1862.

THE PRUSSIAN CHAMBERS—RESIGNATION OF M. VON BETHMANN-HOLLWEG.

The looks of Germany are at this moment especially directed towards Prussia. A conflict between the Government and the Elective Chamber has resulted in the dissolution of the latter and a Ministerial crisis, the issue of which is not known at the moment we write. But this great crisis has been marked by a fact of great importance to the religious and ecclesiastical interests of the monarchy—the resignation of M. von Bethmann-Hollweg, Minister of Public Instruction and Worship. Though, according to the journals, this resignation resulted from political reasons, which we have no wish to enter into here, it is not less, in a religious point of view, a matter of regret to every friend of the Prussian Church.

The career of M. von Bethmann-Hollweg—first as professor of law, then as Curator of the University of Bonn, and afterwards as a member of the Chamber of Deputies, where he was, during the last reign, leader of a party at once Liberal and Conservative—this career throughout has shown him the same highly honourable character, constantly faithful to the principles which, above all, he openly professes—those of evangelical religion. His active influence as founder and president of the Kirchentag and of the Society for the Inner Mission, has also left reminiscences which will not fade from the memory of the Protestant Church of Germany.

The position of M. von Bethmann, as Minister of Worship and Public Instruction—a position which, from the King's confidence in him, he has occupied since the commencement of the present reign—was a most difficult one. A very different idea may exist on this subject in England, where the great interests of the Church, and of almost every scientific institution, from the universities to each village school, do not, as in Germany, lie, as it were, in the hand of a Minister of State. Placed between the pretensions of the politico-religious party, which had the ascendancy in the preceding reign, and the ardent aspirations of a new-born liberalism, no Minister could have answered everybody's expectations. M. von Bethmann has often had to submit to the unjust judgments of both. In the government of the Church, he earnestly set to work to promote its organic development, so as to enable it to be more independent of the State. He created parish councils and established provincial synods, which were to have at their head a general synod, constituted by election. The work is not finished, but the foundations are laid, and in doing this, M. von Bethmann has resolutely surmounted every obstacle. But that which pious and enlightened men especially regret in his retirement, is the loss of that sincerely religious mind, at once firm and conciliatory, and of that heart, so warmly devoted to the interests of the kingdom of Jesus Christ. We cordially adopt the sentiment of a Berlin journal, the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, that "the gratitude, the love, the veneration, of all who are not blinded by the spirit of party, accompanies M. von Bethmann in his retirement into private life. He will not there remain inactive to the supreme interests of the mind and heart, to the welfare of his nation, of Prussia, and of Germany."

PROPOSAL FOR THE RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH.

Before the dissolution of the Elective Chamber, an important proposition was brought before it by MM. Krause, editor of the rationalist journal, Protestantische Kirchenzeitung, and Techow, relative to the re-organization of the Church. Article 15 of the Prussian Constitution of 1850, contains the following provision: "The Protestant and the Roman Catholic Churches, as well as every other religious communion, regulate and administer their own affairs, in an independent manner, and remain in possession of the institutions, foundations, and funds, which belong to them." Founded upon this article of the Constitution, the two deputies brought forward the following resolution, which will certainly be presented again next session: "That the Chamber expresses to the Government its expectation that it will, without delay, adopt suitable measures to put the Protestant Church in possession of the independence which is assured to it by Article 15."

This resolution proves that its authors, who express the sentiments of a large party, do not approve of the plan adopted by M. von Bethmann, whose intention it was to give the Church its independence gradually, by first creating from below upwards intermediate bodies and institutions, which might end in a general synod. Moreover, the very principle of the proposition is totally different from that of the Minister. The two deputies say this expressly, in their accompanying explanatory statement. After proving, by facts, that the Church is not yet in possession of the independence which has been promised to her for the last twelve or fifteen years by Article 15, they add: "That the plan of the Minister, to grant to the Church her constitution gradually, is in contradiction to Article 15, which devolves upon the Church its own organization. Moreover, they think that experience proves that the measures hitherto taken have not conduced to the desired end."

The fact is, that it is not a different method that is in question, but two opposite principles. M. von Bethmann and his friends in the Church do not want, for the moment, to renounce the principle and the fact, as it exists, of the supreme episcopate of the monarchy, but they wish to avail themselves of it to re-organize the Church, lest such re-organization should fall into the hands of a synodal assembly elected by the mass of the people, whose religious views it would be impossible to anticipate. This is precisely what is wanted by the opposite party, which from its religious doctrines is somewhat important. In a word, the ecclesiastical revolution, which has taken place in the Grand Duchy of Baden is, above all, a source of dread to some, and an object of desire with others. And this conflict, I am convinced, must take place in all the States of Germany. It is impossible that the Church should continue to be passively ruled by the State—a practice which has been a means of its enslavement, and a cause of death. But will the Church be governed by the representatives of the masses, the majority of whom are irreligious, and who will be able to shape it according to their own will and pleasure? Here is the alternative to which the Protestant Church of Germany is reduced by the fundamental error of its Constitution, in confounding the Church with the nation. It will not escape from the horns of this dilemma until it has acknowledged that the Church is composed only of those who adhere by their free choice to its religious doctrines. You are aware that the ecclesiastical question never presents itself thus in England, because of the Episcopal principle in the Established Church, and of the principle of voluntary adhesion in the communions independent of the State.

PROCEEDINGS ON BEHALF OF THE SPANISH PRISONERS.

It is once more in the proceedings of the Representative Chamber that I must indicate a third fact, which will not be without interest to your readers. A petition was presented to the Chamber, praying that it would request the Government to take measures, with the other Powers, to obtain liberty for the Spanish Protestant prisoners. The Government Commissioner declared, before the Committee to whom the petition was referred, that immediately he obtained information of the sentence pronounced upon Alhama and Matamoros, the Prussian Minister at the Court of Madrid addressed to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs the most pressing representations, observing to him that even if the sentence was in conformity with the laws of the country, the Royal favour ought to prevent it being carried into effect, as being contrary to the universal sentiments of the civilised world. The Prussian Minister at Madrid had, with this object, felt it his duty to act in concert with the Envoy of Great Britain. Moreover, the Prussian Government had ordered its Minister at London to speak of this affair to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in order that he also might employ his influence in the same direction with the Court of Madrid. He had not yet received a reply from the English Secretary of State, but the Prussian Government entertained no doubt of its sympathy. Such was the communication of the Commissioner, which, when brought to the knowledge of the Chamber secured unanimous approval. God grant that these efforts may be crowned with success.

THE ELBERFELD CIVIC AUTHORITIES AND THE REVIVAL—DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT OF BERLIN—PROBABLE RESULTS OF THE DECISION.

Bonn, Feb. 28, 1862.

It is just announced in the public papers of Germany that the Supreme Court in Berlin have reversed the sentence of the Elberfeld civic authorities in the case of the Orphan-house. You remember that Mr. Klug was dismissed on the pretended ground of breach of discipline, but really on the ground that he encouraged the children to pray and read the Scriptures. He appealed to the provincial government, which confirmed the former sentence. Then he appealed to the Supreme Court in Berlin, which has decided that Mr. Klug acted according to his instructions, and must be replaced in his former position; and, should the authorities in Elberfeld not do so, they must pay him his salary of four hundred thalers a-year. The effects of this decision will be felt through all Germany like an electric shock. In the first place, it will stop the raging of the infidel press against those who seek and pray for a revival of earnest religion in the land. Not a word will be spoken by the cowardly crew against the Supreme Court, for they know and fear their master. On religious subjects they may say what they like if they do not attack one another with violence. The Papists may not legally preach against the Protestants, nor the Protestants against the Papists, but both have perfect liberty to teach and preach that Christianity is a fable and Christ an impostor. But let them take care how they speak or write against the Government and the officials under Government. This sentence then will silence the beagles that barked so violently against the Orphan-house of Elberfeld. But, secondly, the decision of the Supreme Court in Berlin will confirm and extend the principle of the liberty of the subject. If the slavish doctrine of the Elberfeld authorities were admitted, all liberty of sentiment must necessarily be extinguished in the country. No teacher in Prussia shall take part in revivals of religion or teach their children to pray, or if he does, he must abide the consequence. Stick to your programme, gentlemen. The authorities have appointed the limits of religious thoughts for you! No enthusiasm, no ardour in the cause of righteousness, and on pain of deprivation, no prayer-meetings among the children! This has, indeed, been the system hitherto pursued in Germany. Rules, orders, and regulations from office taking effect in Church and State, in schools, and in education generally, have produced indeed a mechanical knowledge among the masses; but some of the higher, nobler elements of education are wanting. All is compulsory. The parents are relieved of their natural duties, and the official or royal must, taking away the liberty of choice, in so far weaken the principle of self-government and independence. However, I am far from wishing to speak against rules and systems of education, however extensive and national. All I want is that there may be some liberty given to the teaching independent of these regulations. Now, the decision in Berlin will enlarge this liberty exceedingly. Lastly, the effect of the Berlin decision will be to encourage the earnest part of the community generally, and help on the tide of Evangelical feeling till it flows over the land. This is of no small importance. The liberty of the subject is not to be violated with impunity even in matters which the world calls enthusiasm and fanaticism.

AUSTRIA.

NEW AND IMPORTANT LAW: EXTENSION OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

A remarkable document has been received from Vienna. It is the draft of a legislative measure proposed by a committee of the Chamber of Deputies in its report to that body, by whom it was entrusted with the task of framing a law to regulate the relations of the Church to the State. We give the first fourteen articles:—

GENERAL PRINCIPLES: SECTION I.

Chapter I.—Religious Liberty.

Art. 1.—Full liberty of conscience and denominational profession, as well as the domestic exercise of his religion, is guaranteed to every one.

Chapter II.—Choice of Religion.

Art. 2.—Every one may choose his belief according to his own free conviction. Nevertheless, he by whom such choice is made must have attained the requisite age, and must not, at the moment of choice, be in a state of mind or feeling which excludes free and personal conviction.

Art. 3.—The requisite age for the choice of a religious belief is fixed, for both sexes, at eighteen.

Chapter III.—Religion of Children.

Art. 4.—With reference to children, who have not attained the requisite age for choosing a religious belief, the belief to which they shall belong, and in which they shall be taught and educated shall be determined by the rules laid down in the following article.

Art. 5.—When the parents belong to one and the same religion, that religion shall also be that of their legitimate children, and of children regarded as legitimate. In case the parents belong to two different religions, the religion of the children shall be determined, primarily, by a legal agreement on the subject between the parents. In the absence of any such agreement, the decision as to the religion of the sons shall belong to the father, and as to that of the girls to the mother. Moreover, such decision forms part of the right of education, and to whoever possesses this right with respect to the child, has also the right to decide as to the child's religion.

Art. 6.—The religious belief once decided on behalf of a child, in accordance with the preceding article, cannot be changed until such child himself chooses voluntarily another religion.

Art. 7.—Parents and guardians, and the ministers of religion, are responsible for the exact fulfilment of the preceding provisions. Should such provisions be violated, the nearest relations, and also the officers of Churches and religious societies have the right to invoke the interference of the authorities by whom the affair will have to be examined and who will cause the law to be respected.

Art. 8.—So soon as a child shall have attained the requisite age for making choice of a religion, the authorities are bound to protect him in the enjoyment of that liberty.

Chapter IV.—Independence of Civil and Political Rights of Religious Belief.

Art. 9.—The enjoyment of civil and political rights does not depend upon religious belief, and cannot suffer any restriction in consequence of such belief. No religious belief can absolve from the fulfilment of public duties.

Art. 10.—Difference of religion forms no civil obstacle to marriage.

Art. 11.—Difference of religion between children and parents or persons having to bring them up, does not deprive the latter of the rights which belong to them in respect of education.

Art. 12.—Everyone may, notwithstanding any difference of religion, reside in any of the various countries of the monarchy, establish his domicile there, and there exercise his profession, and obtain the right of citizenship in a commune. Everyone is able, also, without regard to religion to acquire, in the various countries possession of property, whether real or personal, together with all the rights belonging thereto.

Art. 13.—The adherents of the various religions are equally admissible, by right, to every public dignity, function, and employment.

Art. 14.—The oath shall be taken by every one, without regard to his religious belief, according to this form: "As true as God may help me." Those whose religion does not allow them to take the oath in general use, must confirm their declaration by presenting the hand, which shall have the same effect.

HOLLAND.

STATE OF PARTIES IN THE NATIONAL CHURCH.

A correspondent in Holland of a Continental journal says:—

The position of the parties in the Reformed Church of Holland is becoming more clearly defined from day to day. Amongst the religious questions there is one which now absorbs and has ascendancy over all others—viz., that of the modern theology. At the basis of this question, we find here the same tendencies which are represented in France and in German Switzerland by different organs of the theological press; but with ourselves they make themselves felt not only amongst theologians, properly so called; they agitate the whole church, and it is difficult not to take part in them; it is, moreover, foreseen that we are approaching a critical period.

The following incident is illustrative of this agitation: Madame Bosboom-Toussaint, well known in Holland, and well appreciated as an authoress, published in one of the religious annuals for 1892 an article which contained a very vigorous attack upon the modern theology. Immediately M. Busken-Huet, one of the most advanced leaders of the new school, and who, perhaps, has laboured more than any other person to make it popular, replied to Madame Bosboom in a tone of authority, denying to her all competence to judge of such matters. Then M. Pastor Stuart, the editor of the annual before mentioned, took up the cause for Madame Bosboom-Toussaint, and claimed, on her behalf, the right possessed by every member of the Church. The authoress herself also replied, in a well-written preface, which was prefixed to a separate publication of her article. Upon which M. Counsellor van der Jagt, of the Hague, testified his warm sympathy for her in a public letter; whilst M. van Vloten, professor of literature at Deventer, published against her some satire in verse. All the editions of these publications were very soon sold. The subject is treated of in the reviews and in the monthly periodicals; people talk of it in their drawing-rooms; all society is concerned in it.

Another example: In the name of modern science, M. Pierson, Walloon pastor at Rotterdam, in an article against Professor Doedes, of Utrecht, rejects and treats as folly all faith in miracles; whilst M. Reitsma, pastor at Groningen, delivers there and publishes a very interesting course of lectures upon "the truth of miracles in harmony with modern cosmology."

Yet one more sign of the times: M. Busken-Huet, above mentioned, was pastor of the Walloon Church at Haarlem. Already, a year ago, the people endeavoured to make him comprehend that he ought to quit his post, because his views were too much in contradiction to the Evangelical convictions of the Church. However, he recoiled from the idea of abandoning the pulpit to which he had formerly been called. Then the flock not finding the spiritual nourishment which they required, went to seek that nourishment elsewhere; the pastor was thus almost entirely deserted, and, finally, obliged to send in his resignation. He is now connected with the editorship of a journal at Haarlem, and he rents a hall, in which, every Sunday, he sets forth, in Dutch, his individual opinions.

DENMARK.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER—SERVICES IN A RURAL PARISH—BENEFICIAL RESULTS.

A correspondent sends us an account of the observance of the week of prayer in a rural parish in Denmark, of which he is pastor:—

The parish is about five miles square; its population 2,000, many of whom are of the lowest class. When I read the invitation to united prayer, I wished to secure compliance with it, but doubted if I should be able, until on Sunday the 5th. I thought that if it were impossible to do more, I might at least on that day join with Christians generally in prayer and meditation. Accordingly, in the afternoon, instead of proceeding with my expository Bible lecture, as usual, I read the invitation of the Evangelical Alliance, and spoke on the person and work of the Holy Spirit. When I had concluded, I said that I wished very much that we could join with the Christians of foreign countries in these days of meditation and prayer, but that I could not venture to ask those present to assemble daily that week, as in the preceding fortnight, there had been service at church during nine days; but should any one wish it, I should with the greatest pleasure attend at the school-room (where we have our Bible lecture) every day except two, when I was engaged to preach elsewhere. The next day, being Epiphany, we had Divine service at church with missionary sermon and report. Then we had a meeting in a neighbourhood in which are not a few intemperate and many ungodly and unbelieving persons. Here was a rich occasion for humiliation and confession of sin. The place was crowded. I read the invitation of the Evangelical Alliance, delivered an address and concluded with prayer. I was invited to preach next day in a private house, which I accordingly did to a numerous company. In the evening, and on every subsequent evening of prayer in compliance with a request to that effect, I held meetings in the school-room. There was a constant increase in the attendance, until, on the last evening the two great school-rooms, a third room, and the entry were filled. At these meetings I felt the presence of our dear Lord, his Spirit was with us, and never before had I prayed publicly with such freedom and such unction from on High. And such blessed results have these gatherings already had upon my dear congregation that since that time I have had meetings frequently, often every day of the week. I come to the houses of the poor cottagers, and their small rooms are thronged with attendants. Without it is cold, but the door may remain open, and within there is great warmth. The Lord abides with us, and with great joy of heart I go to and from these meetings.

BRITISH GUIANA.

MISSIONARY EFFORT AMONG COOLIES—SPIRITUAL DEGRADATION OF THE PORTUGUESE—PRIESTLY TYRANNY.

A clerical correspondent writes from British Guiana as follows:—

Most of your readers are aware that since the emancipation of slaves in the British possessions, the sugar-planters have made a loud outcry on the want of labour. To supply this want of labourers, Portuguese from the Canary Islands and from Madeira, Africans liberated from captured slavers, and coolies from the East Indies and China, have been introduced by the Home Government into these sugar-planting colonies. So that they, so short a time since a field for missionaries, are in their turn called upon to spread the name of Jesus amongst the heathen, who are coming to their shores in large numbers. Nor are they unmindful of their duty. Already a successful mission is carried on among Chinese who came here Christianised. And two coolie missions are started, one indeed being in full working, and having under instruction about 100 East Indian children, many others also being taught in Christian principles in the village schools scattered throughout the length and breadth of the colony.

We are not aware that anything has been done for the instruction of the Portuguese, excepting by their own priests, the Roman Catholics. In fact, it is doubtful whether anything could be done, so completely do they seem to be under priestly control. To expose an instance of the exercise of this, exaggerated into tyranny, is my object in writing.

At a school established on a sugar estate in the colony several children of these people were in attendance, and were among the most attentive and interesting scholars. The priest who pays the district a visit some three or four times in the year, hearing of it, forbade their entering the school. After much solicitation the parents were induced to allow them to return; but, on the priest's next visit, he repeated the prohibition so forcibly, that no endeavours have availed to overcome the fears of the parents.

It is needless to say that the priest has himself made no provision whatever for the education of these children.

Justice requires that it should be added that these efforts are all made by the English Church.

TURKEY.

THE PROTESTANT CHURCH AT MARASH.

In few cases has the sowing of the good seed been so speedily followed by an abundant harvest as in the case of the mission of the American Board at Marash, in Central Turkey. The late lamented Dr. Dwight, after his visit there in April last, wrote: "This place is indeed a missionary wonder! Twelve years ago there was not a Protestant here; and the people were proverbially ignorant, barbarous, and fanatical. Six years ago the Evangelical Armenian Church was organized with sixteen members. The congregation, at that time, consisted of one hundred and twenty. On the last Sabbath, I preached in the morning to a congregation of over a thousand, and in the afternoon, at the communion, I addressed nearly or quite fifteen hundred people." Dr. Dwight, after making some remarks on the evident spirituality of the people, expressed the deep emotions awakened in his breast by what he saw, in words to which, alas! his death has given a mournful significance: "I bless God that he brought me here, and I feel almost like saying: 'Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.'"

The present state of the Church at Marash is described in the following interesting letter lately received from one of the missionaries stationed there:—

SPIRIT OF PRAYER—INCREASE OF MEMBERSHIP.

The members of our congregation have now mostly returned from the vineyards and villages, and our Sabbath audience is from six to nine hundred. Happy am I also to be able to add that there are some signs of the presence of God's spirit. There is more of the spirit of prayer, and a greater desire to talk of spiritual things, and some who for years have been living in wretchedness and sin have been awakened.

Last month sixty-eight persons presented themselves for admission to the church; of whom nineteen have been approved, and are to be received next Sabbath; making the total membership of the church 240. Of the forty-nine not received, at least twenty give some evidence of a work of grace in their hearts; but we desire to be as careful as we can, and preferred they should wait till another time.

LIBERALITY AMID PRIVATION—TREASURE IN HEAVEN.

One of these new members is very poor, her husband having been sick a long time with dropsy. She goes with a donkey, and brings stones from the mountain to sell, and sometimes works in the cotton field, for threepence a day. Last Friday she took a little cotton yarn and sold it for fourpence. She bought a penny's worth of soap, a penny's worth of meat for her sick husband, and the remaining twopence she brought for her subscription to the Home Missionary Society. I asked her about her pecuniary affairs. She replied, "They had been compelled to sell their little home"—one by one, nearly all their articles of furniture had gone—"but oh, Mr. —," said she, her eyes filling with tears of joy, "I have found such a treasure in Christ, I never think of our poverty." Would that we were all as rich in grace as she!

PERSECUTED FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS' SAKE.

One other of the newly received members became a Protestant seven or eight years ago. Her history is hardly credible, but I have heard it all from her own lips, and it is familiar to all who know her.

On first becoming a Protestant her husband drove her away from the house, and she remained six weeks, part of the time in the houses of the missionaries, and part of the time in the houses of native brethren. Her babe was taken from her, and from excessive crying became blind, and afterwards died.

Shortly after her husband had received her back, he took her to Payas, a town near Skanderoon, on the Mediterranean, hoping that by threats and persecutions she would there give up her religion.

She remained there with her son, a lad of fifteen years, for a year and a half—as it were, a prisoner, and subjected to all kinds of ill-treatment. She was beaten, thrown down and stamped on, guns pointed at her, struck in the face with the muzzle of the guns, and so cruelly was she treated, that when she returned to Marash, her arms were so crippled she could not straighten them; and yet, during all that time, she never once swerved from Christ. Her husband is naturally a wicked, morose man; but he has an especial hatred towards Protestantism, and towards his wife for being a Protestant. For years he has scarce spoken to her. She prepares his food, sets it before him, but he will not speak to her, and rarely sleeps in his own house, and this, wholly because she is a Protestant. I almost wonder she has been enabled to stand, but she is only another proof of the power of Divine Grace.

SCHOOLS AND THEOLOGICAL CLASS.

We have this summer erected a school house on the church grounds. It was very much needed, the houses being dark and small, utterly unfit for schools. Our new school-house now contains one boy's school of eighty scholars, and a high school of forty scholars, in which arithmetic, grammar, geography, moral and mental philosophy, astronomy, &c., are taught. We have also a theological class of five, whom I instruct in Biblical and general history and familiar science. These are but small beginnings, I know; still, how much better are they than the utter darkness and ignorance which for centuries have rested on this down-trodden people.

DEEP POVERTY OF THE PEOPLE.

You have possibly heard sometimes of the poverty of the Marash people, and the statements may have seemed exaggerated; But I have never realised until lately how truly poor they are. Our community numbers 1,000 souls. This seems large, and yet their entire property—houses shops, vineyards, clothing, everything—is not worth over 4,500*l.* sterling. This seems incredible, but it is a carefully prepared statement, and is within rather than beyond the truth. Their taxes are very high. This year our community pays to government, including the Kaime, 40,000*l.*, or, over 350*l.* sterling. I much fear, the city, year by year, is growing poorer. Some of our women have scarce a change of underclothing to put on when they wash; still many of them are rich in grace.

MISSION WORK NEAR ALEPPO AND IN BULGARIA.

The following are among the latest accounts received by that valuable institution, the Turkish Missions Aid Society:—

ALEPPO: CENTRAL TURKEY MISSION.

Our new preacher, Tomas, has been at Killis three months, and has already done much good in organizing and concentrating the little community; he and his wife going together from house to house visiting the people. One fruit of his influence and of the embarrassments of the Board was particularly gratifying. The people had received from Aintab, in consequence of our difficulty about funds, an offer of help for their schools. The question immediately arose, why they should not help themselves; and they determined to do it. At first they thought of dispensing with one school; but finally concluded that they needed two and must have them. I was, therefore, informed, very much to my surprise, that they had undertaken to support their own schools from the first of November last. We found them quite earnest in their new work, and had engaged teachers at a lower rate than we could get them. Let our people once get on the basis of self support, and the difficulties about the salaries of native agents will soon settle themselves.

I cannot refrain from adding a word about the Eybaz cripple the late Dr. Dwight spoke of visiting in Killis. No one can see him without a new view of the Lord's great mercy. An abandoned, reckless robber on the mountains, it pleased God to regenerate him in faith; and although he now lies like a forsaken wreck, seemingly helpless and useless, he is a lesson to many. Our preacher went to see him, and the only complaint that he made was, that a party of his old associates had been listening to him reading the Bible, and were called away in the midst, and had thus missed having their interest in the Bible increased. Could some Christians see that outwardly-wretched man, and in his horny withered hand, the only book he reads, and remember how little they prize it, surely a twinge of conscience would result.

Respecting Eybaz, we have only to tell of a temporary repulse. The Turkish feudal Bey has been stirred up by the Armenians to persecution—they having promised 2,000 piastres for the expulsion of our native preacher. He therefore demanded 2,000 from him as the price of remaining. Orders were obtained from Marash, Killis, and Aleppo in favour of our preacher, but, after much delay, he was forcibly driven from the place, and the little community left destitute. The Bey is too independent to be reached by authority, and therefore we can only wait for a change in his own feelings. Meanwhile these six months of instruction have borne good fruits. Ten men, who, with their families, are Protestants, stand firm as rocks, and declare that nothing shall separate them from the truth. One of them was formerly a leading man in robbery, and many a poor Koord has mourned the loss of his sheep, stolen by this daring man. His brother, the cripple, was asked if he thought Manook really renewed, and he answered by saying, "He found a basket and pick in a field, some time since, and carried them to the owner. He would not have done that a year ago." We have also hope of others on that wild mountain.

BULGARIA.

The Rev. Mr. Merriam, of Phillippopolis, gives an interesting account of the progress of the work in Bulgaria, and of the cordial welcome and invitations extended to him from all classes. The people have been so long neglected by their own priests—who are, in fact, mostly incapable of instructing them—that it is with astonishment and delight they behold anyone taking a real interest in their welfare; and, at Tatar Bazarik, expressed their earnest desire for enlightenment. One prominent man saying to the missionary, "Our priest teaches us nothing. Pray go to priest, and teach him his duty towards us."

Mr. Merriam writes: "Although the Bulgarians have remained quiet several months, and have seemed to be sinking back again under the control of the Greeks, yet I believe this is but a temporary expedient forced upon a people unprepared to act powerfully by acting together. A nation cannot consolidate its opinions and work them out in a single day. Since April 27, last, when the Metropolitan Bishop was hurried away into exile by the Turkish authorities, at the instigation of the Greeks, for favouring the Bulgarian cause, they have learned a lesson. Refusing to acknowledge the new Greek bishop, they find themselves obliged to do without one at all; and new Churches have been consecrated by a simple priest—a thing thought impossible a year ago.

MISSION WORK AMONG THE ARABS.

East Ham, Feb. 17, 1862.

Dear Sir,—As you were kind enough to say you would be glad to hear something of the operations of the Moslem Mission Society, I cannot resist writing a few lines to inform you that the temporary trials which befel our Bedouin mission among the settled Arabs, have been happily removed; and nothing is left but the blessing which the trial of any real work of God must leave behind. Besides, it is the best mark of any work being the work of God, to pass through death to life. The prospects of evangelizing the simple Arabs are, perhaps, brighter than ever. The Turkish governor who interfered with our native agents, has been removed from his post, and put upon his trial; and the field is as white as ever for the harvest. Nor is this our only mission.

At the earnest entreaty of Europeans at Cairo, we have engaged an intelligent, well educated, and devout native convert as a Scripture-reader among the Moslems, under the kind superintendence of Mr. Reichardt, the Jewish missionary, who writes that the Mohammedans are seen at his Arabic services, at his Bible dépôt, and at his house; although it was well known that he was a missionary to the Jews.

From Cairo we hope to branch out to the Bedouins in the desert of Mount Sinai, who seem as anxious to be taught as the settled Arabs of Mr. Skene. Algiers, too, is opening a door of mission work among the Arabs, and an English clergyman offers his gratuitous services to the society, provided we supply him with the means to employ a native assistant; but for this we have no means as yet. As, however, we shall soon have to bring forth our annual report, I must not enter into any details of information.

At home, too, our young society seems to make its way into the hearts of Christian people. We have several bishops to support our claims, and to-day the name of the Archbishop of Dublin has been added. There was, perhaps, never a society which has so soon established its claims as this Moslem Society. God is with us. His blessing is mighty enough to subdue the strongest prejudices which will ever exist in any new work. We are greatly cheered in our work, and we need great help and sympathy to enable us to meet all the claims which are brought before us.

Yours faithfully,

J. M. ARNOLD, Hon. Sec.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN MALABAR—CONVERSIONS—BAZAAR PREACHING.

A missionary of the Basle Society writes from Cannanore, the principal military station in the province of Malabar, under date of 14th January last, as follows:—

It will gladden your hearts to hear that we have observed the week of prayer last year and now again.

The black brethren met at twelve, noon, and the European brethren at six in the evening. Coming from your country you might, perhaps, at first, have been somewhat disappointed in seeing our small number, considering this large station; but you know too well that Christians, true followers of Jesus, are everywhere the small flock, and so it is here, especially now. The last year has brought out some precious souls—black and white—who continue to run the race set before them. Their conversion has at the time stirred up many people in this station, and I beg an interest in your prayers that they may continue faithful until the end.

Another promising branch of our labour here is the bazaar-preaching. Crowds of people are eager to listen, and when a dart from on high has at times pierced some, the whole crowd is in a blaze. Oh, that the fire which Jesus came to kindle here on earth might soon be kindled! Another hopeful sign, unknown for some years, has been, during the last month, the readiness of the people to buy tracts, and especially the children are eager to bring their farthings.

Remember us, then, dear brethren, at the Throne of Grace, that our labour may not be in vain, but that we may bring forth fruit which remaineth unto life everlasting.

CHINA.

A MISSIONARY VISIT TO NANKING AND THE "SHIELD KING."

The Rev. Mr. Cox, a Wesleyan missionary, addresses to the Watchman a long and interesting letter, dated Shanghai, 11th January, 1862, giving an account of a visit just paid to Nanking (accompanying Sir James Hope in the Coromandel), and of an interview with one of the rebel chiefs. The chief in question, called the "Shield King," was originally Hun-jin, alias Han-wang, the "quondam Christian brother and helper" of the missionary who now writes. The missionary was accompanied by one Chan, as his native teacher and travelling companion. Passing over various details, we come to the reception afforded the visitors by the "Shield King," who sat at the end of a spacious reception-hall, robed from head to foot in yellow silk, and motionless as a statue:—

MEETING OF THE MISSIONARY AND THE KING.

I soon recognised the fattened features of the former Hun-jin, and, remembering the slovenly garb of other days, could scarcely suppress a smile at the present tawdry show, but I thought it right to withhold the familiarities of an acquaintance until they were invited. As I approached his face flushed, while strong and kindly emotions rushed in upon me. Following their promptings, I should have given him the greeting of yearning, faithful love; in such circumstances, however, I had to sink the feeling of the missionary. I paused, took off my hat, and bowed, when he arose and coldly offered me his hand. He resumed his seat with a haughty though embarrassed air, but kept me standing before him. He first inquired what was my business. I lightly answered him that "I came to visit you as an old friend, and my only business just now is to know if I can spend a few days in Nanking." This evidently confused him, and, with ill-restrained excitement, he said, "Mr. Cox, you know I have been friendly to foreigners and the missionaries; it has involved me in trouble, and has led to my degradation. I should have hastened to welcome an old friend; but I am ashamed to see you, and I fear also your stay with me may involve me." His manner awakened my worst apprehension, and, as his position depends on the fickle humour of an arbitrary and sometimes childish despot, I feared that degradation might be followed by decapitation on the slightest and most unreasonable pretext. I offered immediately to withdraw, but first wished to tell him more fully the object of my visit. First, I said, "I would urge you not to allow your present position to endanger your own salvation; second, as I have lately returned from England, I wish to tell you that many there watch your career with solicitude, and the elders of our Church charged me to exhort you to adhere firmly to the Scriptures; and a third business is to ascertain if there is a favourable opening in Nanking for Christian missions."

Here he abruptly responded—"For the first and second I am obliged to you. What can I say as to the third? Mr. — preached in the streets—'Tien-wang is not a heavenly king, this Tien-Keooh is not a heavenly kingdom;' and our followers, disliking the statements, reported them to the Heavenly King (the Chief or King of the Tai-ping party). Mr. — remained here some weeks, when one night he compelled the gate-keepers to open the city gates at night, contrary to regulations, for which two of the guard were beaten with 1,000 blows, and very narrowly escaped decapitation; whilst I, to whom he professed to bring important information, was degraded two steps, and had the administration of foreign affairs taken out of my hands. I have nothing to do with foreign affairs now, and you must not speak to me on business." He had risen from his seat, and stood with me, uttering the above with much excitement. After a little hesitation, he resumed, "You are a former friend, and, on condition that you don't introduce political business, you may remain to-night, and return to-morrow to your ship."

I accepted this, and asked him to call Chan, my teacher, suggesting that he might meanwhile offer me a chair. . . .

ADVENTURES ON THE ROAD TO REBEL ROYALTY.

A female attendant now appeared with a tray of cakes, and Kan-Wang, Chan, S. S., and myself, sat down to tiffin. We were waited on by girls, who were the only servants or retainers that I saw in the hall or apartments of the Shield King. His brother, with a nephew, appeared during our formal interview in the hall, and retired when we left the hall.

Whilst endeavouring to partake of his unpalatable cakes, I requested Hung-jin to drop formality, and tell an old friend what had befallen him since we parted, and since his arrival in Nanking. He accepted the opportunity gladly, and in his old fond fluency of talk, he treated us to an almost unbroken statement, smiling, humorous, sometimes very earnest and excited in manner, and interesting throughout its more than two hours' duration, and of which the following is the substance:—

In his journey from Canton to Nanking, at one time he was helped forward by a wealthy family with whom he travelled; at another he was compelled to enlist as an Imperialist "brave" to avoid imprisonment; he was then made assistant to a magistrate, and next teacher of his children: in this employ he won great favour as doctor of the family, and was finally entrusted with transport of salt and merchandise, with which charge he transported himself safely to rebel territory. He was received at Nanking with great éclat, and was immediately exalted to be chief officer of their literary department; afterwards the Administration of Foreign Affairs was placed in his hands, but from this he has been recently degraded.

He does not often see the Heavenly King (or head-man of the insurgents), but can obtain an interview when he has "ho zzi" (good business) to transact. His description of the said personage was certainly graphic, and given in such an emphatic manner as to make me suspect that the Shield King sought to impress my teacher with awe, and show me the impossibility of his (the Shield King's) opposing the will of so mighty a potentate. It ran as follows:—

THE REBEL EMPEROR DESCRIBED.

He (the "Heavenly King") is of portly size and commanding presence. He has a piercing eye, before whose glance you tremble. I never feared the look of man before, but his eye I cannot stand. His manner is usually mild. When he laughs his voice fills the palace, and when angry it storms through the adjoining halls; he is of most unbending will, and he beheads everyone who dares to differ from him. His intelligence is wonderful: when he expresses an opinion it is too profound for common minds to understand; he fully believes himself to be of heaven, or divine, and destined to govern the empire. When the Eastern and Western Kings revolted; when the "imps" surrounded us without, and a famine began to waste us within; when one and another brought disastrous tidings, he only smiled, and would say,—Let worse calamities overtake us, let our followers depart until there be only left my child to support me on the left, and a servant on the right, I shall yet have sufficient strength to govern the empire, for such is the Heavenly Father's will, so it must be accomplished.

The followers of our Heavenly King, from Kwang-se, were originally few, and it is really wonderful that they should have gained so many victories and rushed on to this heavenly capital. They were all rustics; and among the present leaders there are no literary men, which was one reason for their hailing the arrival of a follower so accomplished as myself. Their knowledge is very superficial, and is confined to a few elementary points of doctrine; they believe the Heavenly King to be divine, and destined to govern the empire; nor will they suffer any one to oppose his claims. These are the real adherents of his cause, who form but a small portion of the expeditions to conquer the country; for when the expeditions go forth, crowds of needy followers join who care nothing for the doctrine, and whose object is not to establish the Heavenly Dynasty, but to gain spoil for the support of their families. It is impossible to restrain these men from plunder.

THE DOCTRINES OF THE REBEL EMPEROR FOUNDED BY HIS SUBORDINATE.

The doctrines of the Heavenly King agree in the main with those of foreigners, but differ in some points. The English have one method of teaching, the Americans another, and the French a third; but the Heavenly King will not accept these different methods; he is determined to teach doctrines of his own, and to compel men to receive them. He strictly prohibits idolatry. He considers the people so besotted by idolatry that no teaching—neither the teaching of Confucius nor the preaching of missionaries—can turn them from their stupidity. How can the preaching of a few missionaries at the distant ports turn the Chinese from idols? Look at the English Government in Hong Kong! The Chinese there may build any temple, and worship any idol they choose. The Heavenly King is different; he will not allow them to worship idols at all; he beheads them if they worship idols.

In reference to the edict tolerating the visits of missionaries, the Kan Wang said: "Yes; we permit them to visit our towns, but we do not promise to protect them. If they preach against the heavenly title of the king, our followers may rise up and kill them at any time; and their death, if we had promised protection, would involve us in trouble with foreign nations."

The writer then briefly refers to hurried interviews which he had with

THE SHIELD-KING'S BROTHER AND NEPHEW.

The nephew, in answer to questions said, "He had read the books of the Heavenly King, but could not understand them, partly because he forged new characters, and commanded a new signification to be attached to some old characters, and partly because the doctrines were so strange." The brother, in answer to an inquiry if I should come and live among them, abruptly answered, "Missionaries ought not to come, for the doctrines are different, and the Heavenly King will not allow other doctrines than his own. The Heavenly King will not allow chapels to be built in Nanking." In parting, he almost piteously entreated me not to preach in the streets, because hearers would say, "Another friend of the Shield-King is attacking our doctrine." It would implicate his brother, who was already in trouble. I was sorry thus to leave them, not only because both he and his brother are afraid of expressing friendliness to the missionary, but because one cannot but fear their love for the truth of God is crushed by their connexion with this rebel party and the blasphemers at its head.

THE MISSIONARY IN THE PALACE.

Mr. Cox states that Mr. Roberts, the missionary, has apartments allotted to him in the Shield-King's palace. He also says:—

Mr. Roberts's table is supplied from the public stores, and he receives occasional sums of silver from the same source. He goes out almost daily to preach in the streets, or in some house, and is building a small chapel with funds supplied him by the Shield Chang-wang. He is not now at liberty to invite another missionary to stay with him, nor could he encourage me to attempt to settle in Nanking. He has done all in his power to sustain missionaries of his own denomination, and failed, and does not expect he could assist missionaries of another body. The Heavenly King will not allow him to print a tract unless the manuscript be first submitted to his (the leader's) revision. Mr. Roberts has had paper and blocks lying useless in his room for six months. At the same time, he is permitted freely to circulate Christian tracts printed elsewhere. Another significant and awful fact he gave me, when I mentioned Hung-jin's anxiety to secure the services of my teacher. A fortnight before, two copyists, who wrote in a room underneath his own, omitted some alteration in one of the characters which the King had ordered, and, without notice or form of trial, they were decapitated! Some of the kings have endeavoured to send away Mr. Roberts, but the Heavenly King refused. He says the Heavenly Father has told him that Mr. Roberts is a good man; and he is under a superstition that calamities would follow Mr. Roberts's removal.

THE RELIGION OF THE INSURGENTS.

Mr. Cox's conclusions as to the religious views of the leaders of the rebellion are very unfavourable:—

It perhaps falls within the purpose of this communication to assign a reason for designating the rebel chieftain, so broadly as I have done above, a blasphemer. He has now forfeited the apology which could be offered for the assumption of his earliest proclamation. Hang-jin carried to him a clearer light of revelation, and missionary after missionary has visited Nanking to testify of the truth, whilst he continues not only to reject such aid, but also reiterates more plainly his errors. I am fresh from reading three or four edicts of comparatively recent date, which I picked up at Nanking. In these he denies that there is any Holy Ghost; he affirms that Jesus Christ is inferior to the Father, and that he himself shares divinity with the Son of God. These edicts are issued in the name of a trinity comprising the Heavenly Father, Heavenly Brother (Jesus Christ), and the Heavenly King (himself). In one of them he strangely constitutes a quaternity, by exalting his own child to share this divinity, who, he affirms, holds a rule on earth similar to that which is placed in the hands of Christ in heaven. Such are the blasphemies which now appear, more or less, in all his productions.

I did not apprehend that, on a nearer view of these insurgents, they would appear to my judgment so bereft of hopeful elements. I certainly, at present, fail to discover amongst them any party which promises to be capable of administering a Government; and can only regard them as marauding hordes, dreaded by all classes, save a portion of the very vilest of the people, whose only business is plunder, and who carry calamities without hope of amelioration wherever they roam.

MISSIONARY EFFORT IN AMOY.

The week of prayer at Amoy, statistics of the missions there, and the proceedings and character of the Tai-pings, form the topics of a letter from one of the missionaries of the London Society. Since the writer forwarded his communication, we learn that Shanghai has been invested by the rebels:—

Amoy, China, January 24, 1862.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER: PROGRESS OF MISSIONARY EFFORT.

I believe that the work of the Lord is making steady progress here. The week set apart for special prayer was observed most heartily by the native Christians. The chapels of the various missions were crowded at the union prayer-meetings, which were held daily. The meetings seemed even more encouraging than those of last year.

I had occasion to prepare some short statistics to be used at one of these meetings. They may, perhaps, prove of interest to you, and will serve to show that some ground is being gained for Christ in this part of China. As yet we have but the beginning, and are hoping and praying for greater things than these. We have abundant reason, however, to thank God and take courage. We have agents of three missionary societies labouring at Amoy. In this part of the Fo-kien province we have sixteen established preaching stations, where the Word of God is daily proclaimed. Most of these stations are in the country, within a radius of about forty miles from Amoy city. Of course the truth has been preached to a far greater distance, and visits are frequently made to other places. We have at times been compelled to abandon promising stations, through the violent opposition of mandarins or people. There is always more or less of a spirit of persecution abroad, and no convert (especially in the country) embraces Christianity without considerable sacrifice.

MISSIONARY STATISTICS.

I give statistics of the missions here: London Missionary Society—missionaries, 8; communicants, 256. *English Presbyterian Mission—missionaries, 2; communicants, 100. *American Dutch Reformed Church—missionaries, 5; communicants, 267. Total missionaries, 10; communicants, 628. Number of communicants, January 1, 1861, was 526. Baptized since that date, 117. Less by excommunication, 10; by death, 10. Clear increase during the year, 97. The harvest is plentiful, would that we had more labourers.

ADVANCE OF THE TAI-PINGS: THEIR CHARACTER.

We enjoy comparative quiet in this province and have many facilities for missionary labour. Happily for us, the Tai-ping insurrection is still at a distance, although Hong-chow and Ningpo have fallen into their hands. The capture of the last city brings them into direct contact with foreigners. There are signs of a coming collision both at Shanghai and Ningpo. In the region they occupy, both trade and missionary effort come to a standstill. The Tai-pings are beginning to show themselves more hostile to Christianity than the Imperialists themselves. This was a result which has been naturally anticipated. Their presence is a curse to the land, and I fear there is not the slightest reason to hope that the curse will ever turn itself into a blessing. They exist but to destroy; and now, as they are gaining ground near the sea coast, they are losing it just as rapidly in three of the central provinces which they partly possessed. I have travelled in their track. They leave a desert behind them. I am convinced that Christianity—the cause of Christian missions has nothing to hope from them—except it be that now, when God's judgments are abroad in this land, the inhabitants thereof may learn righteousness.

AUSTRALIA.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN VICTORIA, NEW SOUTH WALES, AND TASMANIA.

The Melbourne Christian Times of January 25 devotes fully two columns to accounts of the observance of the week of prayer in different parts of Victoria, New South Wales, and Tasmania. Our contemporary says:—

The response to the invitation of the British Evangelical Alliance to inaugurate the year 1882 with a week of special prayer has been very general here, and as far as we have means of forming a judgment, in the neighbouring colonies also. The meetings being almost exclusively of a devotional character, have not, to any great extent, attracted the notice of the press.

Mid-day union meetings for devotion were held on each week-day at the hall of the Mechanics' Institute, Melbourne. The Bishop and the Dean of Melbourne were among those who engaged in the proceedings, which were held under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance of Victoria. On the Monday evening meetings took place at the hall and at the United Presbyterian Church (Mr. Ramsay's). At Geelong, meetings were held in the parochial school-rooms on each morning of the week, at half-past seven, in accordance with a notice circulated on the previous Sunday, through the Episcopal congregations, by the clergy. The Bishop of Melbourne was present at the opening, and the Archdeacon at a subsequent meeting. "The programme issued by the British Evangelical Alliance was," we are told, "considered to exhibit a great improvement on that of last year, as the topics were so arranged as to admit of being properly distributed amongst those who offered prayer, and the Chairman was always able to announce the particular topics with the name of the minister called upon to lead the devotions." At Kyneton the week was observed by "all the Churches, and proved a time of quickening and refreshing to very many." The services were held in the different places of worship in succession. The attendance was large. The writer of the account from Kyneton concludes thus:—

And now that these sweet seasons have passed away, one cannot but feel that much good has already been done in bringing the ministers and members of the various churches together, and in impressing the town and district with the truth that, after all, Christians of every name are really "one in heart and soul." Nor is this all, the prayers of God's people are before the throne, and will assuredly be answered and return to them again laden with mercy. It was intimated that there would henceforth be a monthly united prayer meeting in Kyneton, on the first Monday of the month, when an address would be delivered.

At Prahran, evening meetings were held "under the management of the Committee of the Prahran and South Yarra union prayer-meeting. There was a good attendance on each occasion, and a spirit of unity and earnestness, of grace and supplication seemed to be experienced by all present."

There are also less detailed accounts from New South Wales and Tasmania. At Sydney, the Bishop of the city presided at each of the meetings; not so at Hobart Town; but there the hope is expressed that on the whole "the services of the week have been advantageous to the churches."

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

We are indebted for the following account of the observance of the week of prayer in Adelaide and elsewhere to the Secretary of the South Australian Prayer Union:—

Adelaide, South Australia, Jan. 22, 1862.

The Christian public of this colony received with joy the invitation to all true Christians throughout the world to commence 1862 with united prayer. Sermons on the subject of the Holy Spirit were preached in most places of worship in Adelaide and its suburbs, and we have heard that the same topic has been preached upon in many other parts of South Australia. Throughout the week meetings were held in Adelaide every evening in one or other of the churches of the uniting denominations, which are here, the Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Bible Christians, Presbyterians of every denomination, Baptists, and Congregationalists. Meetings were also held every second evening in the Eastern suburban district, and every evening in the Western suburban district of Adelaide. Nightly union prayer-meetings were also held in Gawler Town and Port Adelaide, and similar meetings were held with more or less frequency throughout the week in most settled parts of the colony. On Sunday, the 12th, the topic indicated in the scheme of union services issued by the Evangelical Alliance was as generally handled in the various pulpits as that of the preceding Sunday. And on the Monday evening the members of the various uniting denominations partook of the Lord's-supper together in Pine-street Chapel, Adelaide, which was again chosen for this purpose as being the largest place of worship in Adelaide. The assembly was large and deeply interested, although, owing to the overpowering warmth of the weather, the attendance, both at this meeting, and at several meetings throughout the week, was not so large as last year at the same season; indeed these meetings could scarcely be held at a more inconvenient season for us in the southern hemisphere, for it is the zenith of our fervid summer, and over a large proportion of this colony, at least, it is the busiest season of harvest. United communion services were also held in Gawler Town and other parts of the colony on Sunday January the 12th.

Throughout last year we were hearing from almost all quarters of this province, of real and permanent good resulting from the united new year's services. In the southern districts especially a powerful quickening influence has been felt as the result of them. And have not all truly Christian hearts throughout the world been gladdened by hearing of much good being done in various parts of the earth? We do trust that our thirsty souls may this year be refreshed by hearing similar good news from far lands, and that upon us also copious showers of blessings shall descend so that the Word of the Lord "may have free course and be glorified, even as it is with you" in so many parts of Europe.

United prayer-meetings have been held in Adelaide since the commencement of last year on the second Monday of every month. These meetings it has been resolved to continue as they have been felt to be seasons of refreshing, although by no means to the extent of our desires or anticipations.

AMERICA.

THE WAR AND SLAVERY.

The following communication, which reaches us at the last available moment for insertion, referring as it chiefly does to the anti-slavery policy just inaugurated by the Federal Government, will be read with interest:—

Albany, New York, March 7, 1862.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON SLAVERY.

I have a strong impression that yesterday will prove a memorable day in the history of the United States; for though there existed a widespread and growing conviction that slavery is the direct cause of the extensive and unnatural rebellion which afflicts us; though much was being written and published, respecting measures for its prospective destruction, still nothing had ever been done towards it by the Government, and but few, if any, beyond the members of the Cabinet, supposed that President Lincoln was preparing a public Message respecting it.

Yet so it was. While his mind was engaged in the ordinary and engrossing affairs of State—with the conduct of a gigantic war, the issues of which involve the life of this nation—and while sickness and death invaded his mansion, he deliberately prepared a Message respecting this monster evil, which, without the least parade, was yesterday transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives. Not a single paper, so far as I know, predicted its advent. The members of Congress were for the most part taken by surprise, while the people at large read it with astonishment, and generally with delight. It is early at present to say what will be the abiding estimate in which it will be held, but I think it will be very high, flattering to its distinguished author, and most auspicious for the nation.

The President simply recommends to Congress at present the passing of a joint resolution, which shall be substantially as follows: "Resolved,—That the United States ought to co-operate with any State which may adopt a gradual abolishment of slavery, giving to such State pecuniary aid to be used by such State in its discretion to compensate for the inconveniences public and private produced by such change of system." He then argues, with much cogency, the propriety of this course, and concludes his Message with these impressive words: "While it is true that the adoption of the proposed resolution would be merely initiatory, and not within itself a practical measure, it is recommended in the hope that it would soon lead to important results. In full view of my great responsibility to my God and to my country, I earnestly beg the attention of Congress and the people to the subject."

This is unquestionably the entering wedge, and in its existence and insertion I see the hand of God; for it is right—it indicates the amazing growth of public sentiment in opposition to slavery; and it is, I trust, the harbinger of peace, liberty, and righteousness—of a reconstructed Union on the basis of truth and universal freedom.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION RESPECTING SLAVERY.

Another event, in this same direction, occurred a few days previous, and which gives additional significance to the Presidential Message. The Hon. Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, introduced to the United States a bill for the emancipation of slaves in the States of Maryland and Delaware. It proposes to those States that if, within the period of two years, they will, by an act of their own Legislatures, set free all persons now held in bondage, the General Government will deliver to the proper State authorities Six per Cent. Bonds of the United States, payable in twenty-five years, sufficient to compensate their owners at the rate of 250 dollars for each slave thus liberated.

This bill was quietly and kindly introduced. It was not accompanied with any strong and irritating remarks respecting the evil of slavery, or the untold mischief it has done; and it is, moreover, both constitutional and pacific. The States in question are free to act, or not to act. It leaves them with full power, and provides that all their rights and interests shall be scrupulously regarded; while the General Government proffers gratuitous and liberal aid in the removal of an evil which is a hindrance to their peace and prosperity. Should it, therefore, be refused, the disposition of the Government is manifest.

SPIRITUAL REFRESHING.

It is gratifying to be able to state that amidst the general spiritual dearth God is graciously giving to a few Churches the enriching influences of his Spirit. Here and there times of refreshing from his presence are experienced. Some of the Churches in Boston, Portland, and other parts of New England, are being thus blessed. There is also much religious interest among some parts of our army. The spiritual seed which has been by some of the numerous chaplains so industriously and prayerfully sown, is bearing precious fruit. One chaplain says: "In many tents you might hear the voice of prayer and praise. Since our organization we have had about twenty hopeful conversions. The moral tone of our regiment is exceedingly good. About half of our officers, and a large number of our privates, are men of prayer—consistent members of the Church." Another says: "Our little regimental Church is rapidly growing in numbers, and I believe in grace. Five joined last Sunday. Our Havelock Association Meetings are becoming more and more interesting, and through its good influence a Bible class and two nightly prayer-meetings have been organized." These expressions, which might be greatly multiplied, will indicate that even amidst the privations and temptations of camp life, God is blessing the labours of His servants. Very extensive and persistent efforts are made to supply the army with religious papers, tracts, hymn-books, Testaments, and Bibles, and the effect has been most happy. They have widely supplanted novel reading, and are in great demand.

GOD'S HAND IN CONNEXION WITH THE WAR.

In reference to the war we are full of hope. It is, we think, apparent that God is with us. The people of the Loyal States, though, to a great extent, of diverse nationalities, sentiments, tastes, and religious views, are in this as one man. They are intelligently and firmly determined on its support; ready to meet all its demands, and submit to a measure of taxation which the country has never before known. And though naturally impatient for results, are calmly waiting, and willing to wait, for the discreet action of those in command. Knowing this people as I do, I regard these as highly encouraging indications of Divine Providence. More than this, the enemy is now completely encompassed. His lines have been most disastrously broken. Some of his strongest fortifications destroyed. Division has entered his councils. He has confessed the assumption of a task which he is unequal to execute. He will, no doubt, make desperate attempts for victory, and may, in some instances, gain temporary triumph; but God is graciously giving us the pledge that this fair and wide-spread heritage, which has been consecrated to freedom, truth, and piety, shall not be given up to the oppressor's lust.

Miscellaneous Intelligence.

THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF LYONS.—A special appeal has been issued by MM. Poy, Cordes, and De Faye, forming the finance committee of this church, with reference to its present embarrassing circumstances. The American war has so seriously affected the manufactures and trade of the city, that the greatest distress prevails. "We ended the year," says the appeal, "with a deficit of 16,000 francs. Our poor fund, thanks to the efforts of devoted brethren at Lyons, has liquidated its debt of 6,000 francs. He who feeds the birds of the air has had pity upon our poor without labour, and our sick without shelter; but our Evangelization Fund is in the most deplorable condition. If our returns are not more abundant in 1862 than they were in 1861 we must anticipate a deficiency of 24,000 francs by the end of the present year. This it is that alarms us." Time and space would fail us were we to attempt to do justice to the claims which the Church of Lyons has upon those who are in a position to aid the cause of the Redeemer in other lands. Suffice it to say that, as a missionary Church, working with earnestness and devotedness for the spiritual welfare of thousands around them, in one of the strongholds of Popish bigotry, those claims are of no ordinary character. And our brethren ask assistance, be it observed, not for themselves, but for their missionary operations. We are assured that it will not be withheld.

FELIX NEFF'S SCHOOLS IN THE ALPS.—The schools established by Felix Neff, in the French Alps, and now under the superintendence of his successor, M. Cadoret, pastor of the Protestant Church at Mens, are in pressing need of pecuniary assistance. M. Cadoret has occupied his present post for thirty years; and like his sainted predecessor, there attach to his personal history some interesting associations with this country. Everybody knows that Felix Neff was ordained in England; M. Cadoret was born here. The facts are these. The father of the present pastor of Mens was in early life an officer in the French navy, and a Roman Catholic. He was taken prisoner by the English, and being detained for some time at Gosport, was there brought to a knowledge of the truth. Then came the peace of Amiens, when he quitted the navy, and entered the seminary of Dr. Bogue; and after completing his studies he was ordained in London, the presiding minister on the occasion being the Rev. George Burder. About this time M. Cadoret, the present pastor of Mens, was born at Gosport, and baptized by Dr. Bogue. His father, after a ministerial career of nearly sixty years, during the whole of which he remained attached to the doctrines of the Reformation, died about six months ago, at the age of ninety. His son, for thirty years, has proclaimed the same doctrines, free from any admixture of heterodoxy, at Mens, where he continues the blessed work commenced by Felix Neff, and, like that devoted man, has evidence in the conversions which have followed his preaching, that his labour is not in vain. We need scarcely say that we shall be happy to become the medium of transmitting any contributions that may be forwarded to us for these schools.

A MISSIONARY SEMINARY AT COPENHAGEN opens this month (April). The principal is a young but pious and accomplished man named Rordam—an eminent Oriental scholar. There appears to be great interest felt in missions among some of the Christian people of Denmark. As a proof of this a correspondent mentions what has occurred at Hirtsholmen, near Fredrikshaun. The pastor of this poor stony little island—which only contains about 150 inhabitants, more than one-third of whom are children, and the adult male population of which are all engaged in farming occupations—writes to the Danish Missionary Society stating that for two years, in consideration of the scanty earnings of his congregation he had deemed it right to refrain from asking them to contribute to the cause of missions. One day, however, he was asked why it was so long since a missionary meeting had been held, and he was assured that he should have no cause of complaint on the score of contributions—that the people had always something to spare for missions. He felt rebuked, held a meeting, and obtained what for this humble little community was a liberal collection.

THE BIBLE IN RUSSIA.—An article in the March number of the Christian World (U.S.), refers to the publication of the sacred Scriptures in the modern Russ, the vernacular of more than 50,000,000 of the inhabitants of that empire. Through the influence of the Emperor, the "Holy Synod" has taken hold of this great work, which ought to have been done long ago. A Russian Princess, most intimately connected with the Imperial Family, writes thus to Dr. Baird: "The translation of the Bible into the Russian language is progressing. Many copies of the New Testament have been published and sold, but the Old Testament has not come out yet."

The Religions before Christ: being an Introduction to the History of the First Three Centuries of the Church. By EDMOND DE PRESSENSÉ. Translated by L. CORREAN, with Preface by the Author. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

M. DE PRESSENSÉ'S History of the First Three Centuries of the Christian Church is an important work, characterised by much original research and patient thought. The two first volumes appeared in 1858. The first of these, contains a preliminary dissertation, or introduction, and it is that which is here translated. The introduction comprises two main divisions: 1. The preparation for Christianity in paganism; and 2, on Judaism. In his preface to this translation, the author says in explanation of the reasons which prompted the production of the dissertation:—"Before entering upon the details of the struggle between the new religion and the religions of the past, I felt myself bound to draw up a fair statement, a balance sheet of their respective forces, and to show what were the resources, and what the obstacles, Christianity encountered in that old world which it was about to destroy and to replace." M. de Pressensé believes that the old world, notwithstanding its depravity and short comings, desired and sought the "Unknown God," by demanding Him from all forms of worship, and from all schools of philosophy. The development of this desire constituted the work of preparation in paganism. Jesus Christ is therefore viewed as the "Desired of all nations." The supernatural element is not weakened by the attempt to discover its points of contact with conscience; and by showing that man, who could not rise to revelation, was made for it and tended towards it.

Such is the principle of this elaborate essay, which proceeds after the following manner. It opens with some preliminary remarks confirmatory of the ground taken; after which the character of Oriental paganism is described in general. Entering more into detail, the author next reviews the religions of Western Asia, Egypt, Persia, and India. Then come the Pelasgic Mythology, the development of Hellenic humanism, and Greek philosophy prior to Alexander. At this point we enter upon Græco-Roman paganism, and starting from Alexander, we survey the movements of philosophical and religious thought in Greece and Rome, till we come to the advent of Christ. M. de Pressensé traverses this vast field with conscious power, and finds everywhere contributions towards the solution of his main problem. About fifty pages are given to Judaism, which is studied with a similar purpose, and the closing section shows the realization of the world's hope and the Jew's vocation in the Gospel.

The idea of this volume must not be confounded with that of Dr. Temple, in "Essays and Reviews," on "the Education of the World." It lies much deeper, and agrees with some of the early fathers in regarding humanity as always showing some traces of its noble origin and ultimate destiny. The theory must not be summarily rejected because it alone seems to explain many of the phenomena of the religions and philosophies of the old world. We are very anxious for all who are interested in the present conflict with rationalism, to study this essay carefully. Not that we adopt every expression and sentiment, but because we believe that a class of facts is here presented to our view, which have been grievously overlooked. Of the learning, talent, candour, and reverence of the author, we cannot speak too highly, although he is confessedly a courageous thinker and writer.

The translation calls for few remarks. It is generally easy and fairly represents the sense of the original, without being closely literal. Its great defect is in the spelling of ancient and foreign names, many of which, and some of them frequently, are inaccurately written. This is specially owing to the translator's not observing that these names are spelt very differently in French, German, and English. We have even such forms as Cakja and Cakjamouni, for Sakya and Sakya Muni; Théétites for Theætetus; Dædelus for Dædali, &c. Some of the notes and references have also been omitted. Otherwise the book will be read with pleasure, and we are very happy, seeing its importance, to find it in an English dress.

Hand-Book of the English Tongue. For the Use of Students and Others. By JOSEPH ANGUS, M.A., D.D. Religious Tract Society.

THIS work forms the latest issue of the Religious Tract Society's Educational Series. History, ancient and modern; Biblical, ethical and geographical science, and the Christian evidences, having been severally dealt with in distinct volumes, the student is introduced to the study of his own language. The ex-gencies of scholastic life might perhaps seem to demand that a book like this should have appeared earlier in the series: but admirably executed as it proves to be, it was certainly well worth waiting for. Indeed, not very long ago, the results before us could hardly have been attained. The latest writers have been laid under contribution. "But for the labours of Latham, French, Key, Marsh, Dasent, Craik, Rogers, Adams, and Morell," says Dr. Angus, "parts of the book would never have been written; while, for occasional examples and suggestions, he is indebted to the works of Armstrong," and a list of writers which is too long for Dr. Angus to complete, but which, as given by him, extends through more than half the alphabet. We have, in fact, the information which lies scattered over many other works, of diverse character and profound research, presented, in these pages, in the most condensed and useful form. The student will here find a history of his own language, a view of its connexion with other tongues, an analysis of its elements, a grammar, and a treatise on composition. The whole is admirably arranged, and illustrated by copious examples and exercises. At the present moment, this "Hand-Book of the English Tongue," taken as a whole, and for what its title imports, is unrivalled.

1. Words for Women. 2. Tracts for Women.
By the Author of "Woman's Service on the Lord's-day." Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.

THESE "Words" consist of the "Tracts" collected in a little volume. Each tract takes some female in the Old or New Testament as the type of a class, and makes her the text from which to address a thoughtful and loving appeal to the heart and conscience of the women of the present day. The "Words for Women" originated in addresses at mothers' meetings, and their delivery may be repeated at such gatherings with advantage: they ought to be extensively circulated among the class visited by Bible women. Their exterior, as contrasted with some other publication intended for gratuitous distribution, is attractive.

HOME.

The pleadings in the two prosecutions arising out of "Essays and Reviews" have been closed for some time, but the learned judge intimated that he would reserve his judgment. Our readers may remember that shortly before these prosecutions were commenced, a suit was instituted against the Rev. Mr. Heath, of the Isle of Wight, for heresy of a more gross and open form than that which is charged against the Essayists—so gross, indeed, that the judge had no difficulty in pronouncing against him the sentence of deprivation. Mr. Heath appealed to the Privy Council, and the appeal still lies before them. It is this case that stands in the way of the judgment being pronounced against the Essayists; for Dr. Lushington observed, that in the opinions given by the learned judges in the one case he hoped to find some light thrown upon the principles that ought to guide him in the other.

The Convocation of the Province of York has just held its meeting. During the administration of the late Archbishop, the Convocations of this province never extended beyond a formal meeting: but Dr. Longley is more favourable to Synodical action; and York has her Convocation now as well as Canterbury. At the recent meeting, the question was discussed how harmony of action could be secured between the two; which the Upper House thought might be effected by the appointment of a joint committee from the two provinces that should keep their respective constituents acquainted with each other's doings. The Lower House, with greater boldness, suggested that the end would be better attained by the amalgamation of the two bodies into one, so as to form one Convocation for the whole Church. But this did not appear to be to the mind of their Lordships of the Upper House, and the resolution for a joint committee only was agreed to.

There is a general stir among the Nonconformist bodies throughout the country, to celebrate the bi-centenary of the rejection of the 2,000 ministers, on Black Bartholomew's day, 1662, and a very large sum has been subscribed, which is to be chiefly expended in the erection of new Dissenting chapels throughout the kingdom. A great and influential meeting on the subject was held in St. James's Hall, London, about the middle of the month, at which a paper was read from the Rev. John Stoughton, and addresses were delivered by Dr. Vaughan, Mr. Rooker of Plymouth, Rev. Dr. Edmond, and others. This meeting may be regarded as a manifesto of the purposes of the Dissenters; and we gather from the speeches that they claim to be the descendants of the rejected ministers, and that they have no quarrel with the Church of England as a Church, but heartily desire that she should be purged from her abuses, among which her connexion which the State holds in their eyes a prominent placé.

It may be remembered that, some twelve or fourteen years ago, the Rev. Mr. Shore, a clergyman of the Established Church in the diocese of Exeter, resigned his living, left the Church, and began to preach the Gospel as a Dissenter. For this he was inhibited by his former diocesan, who still claimed to have Episcopal jurisdiction over him, and exercised it too in the most rough-handed manner by casting Mr. Shore into prison for disobedience to his mandates. The case excited much attention at the time, and a bill was brought into Parliament to prevent such scandals for the future, and to place clergymen equally with laymen under the broad shield of the Toleration Act. The bill did not then become law, rather from want of time than any active opposition; and since the matter has been allowed to slumber till the present session, when Mr. Bouverie has revived his old bill. It provides that any clergyman may get rid of his ordination vows who will make a declaration that he now entertains conscientious objections to the articles or formulas of the Church; and that he may henceforth either preach outside the Church's communion, or, retaining his place within her pale as a layman, may follow secular occupations. There is no provision made for the release of those who, having thoughtlessly entered the ministry, now find the duties and the designation irksome; nothing but the profession of doubts and scruples will relieve them.

In Scotland, we are sorry to observe that the Sustentation Fund of the Free Church manifests a tendency to decrease, which is only counteracted by the most strenuous exertions of its managers, who are quick to sound the alarm at every symptom of the shrinking of the supply. It is fair to say, that this does not arise from any falling off in the liberality of the people, but from the Church itself being over weighted with the support of a number of small and languishing charges, undertaken in the first gush of popular enthusiasm, and which honour and consistency now forbid to be given up. It is these charges which drag down a fund that would otherwise be amply sufficient for the ministry of the Church. A way out of their difficulties has, however, been shown them, if the heads of the Church would have courage to act upon it, by two congregations in the small border town of Hexham. There were in that town two congregations, one belonging to the United and one to the English Presbyterians. They only acted as hindrances to the usefulness of each other. A short time ago, however, the pulpit of the English Presbyterian chapel was vacant, when, after much and prayerful deliberation, the two bodies agreed to coalesce; and out of two struggling congregations to form one influential cause. We should be glad to know what obstacle there is to this same course being followed in many a remote village in Scotland—nay, what obstacle is there to a union between the two Churches?

The obituary of the month contains the names of two gentlemen honoured for their usefulness in Christ's cause. We allude to the deaths of the Rev. John Hampden Gurney, Rector of St. Mary's, Bryanstone-square, and the Rev. Dr. Reed, of Wycliffe Chapel, Mile-end. Mr. Gurney was best known for his biographical writings, in which his constant aim was to uphold before the minds of men, and especially of the young, examples of Christian nobleness, purity, and activity. Dr. Reed was better known for his works of practical benevolence; and his labours in connexion with the Infant Orphan Asylum and the Idiot Asylum will long be remembered. Of these honoured brethren and their labours it may well be said, "There are diversities of gifts, but the same Lord."

FOREIGN.

The Italian question still engages the attention of Europe. The occupation of Rome is the hinge on which the politics of more than one great nation turns. The Emperor of the French feels himself to be, so far as that question is concerned, in a false position, with the further disadvantage that he can neither advance nor retreat, nor remain where he is with honour and dignity. If the Pope would but abandon that cold impassive attitude in which he has wrapped himself up he might command almost any terms; but Pius knows his own advantages and the embarrassments of his adversaries; and he feels that, in Scripture language, "his strength is to sit still." This state of things of course cannot last for ever; the patience of the Italian people will be exhausted, or the superstitious reverence of the French peasantry will give way, or some other astounding event will occur, in which the Pope and his Cardinals will be whirled into space. There are reports of the license that is allowed in Naples, where all sorts of infidel, indecent, and blasphemous books and pictures are openly sold, which is exceedingly deplorable; but we observe that those who are most loud in their reprobation of this license say nothing whatever of the liberty that is also allowed to the open sale of the Bible, and other religious publications. If the bane be tolerated, it is something at least that the antidote, totally prohibited before, is now fully allowed, and a growing desire for its perusal is, as our correspondent informs us, springing up in all parts of Italy. Even secular journals recommend the study of the Bible as the best reply to the dogma of the temporal power of the Pope.

A curious trial, referred to by our correspondent, is going on in Paris just now, arising out of the marriage of an ex-Roman Catholic priest; and the celebrated advocate and orator, M. Jules Favre, has undertaken to demonstrate that the marriage of the clergy is not forbidden by law. A still greater scandal in the eyes of Frenchmen, and, indeed, of Christians in general, was the appointment of M. Renan, whose Pantheistic sentiments, it is said, were well known to the Government, to the chair of Hebrew in the University of Paris.

The persecution of the Protestants in Spain still continues; and all the efforts of our Government and of our Minister in Madrid have not yet availed to induce the Spanish Government to open their prison doors or to mitigate their punishment. How difficult it must be to find such an opportunity—how difficult even to induce the Roman Catholics to understand what persecution means was curiously illustrated by a conversation that occurred a few nights ago in the House of Commons. Mr. Blake, the Roman Catholic member for Waterford, denied that there was any religious persecution in Spain. Matamoros and his companions were persecuted, he said, for political offences—an assertion which was promptly denied by Sir Robert Peel—but all Protestants were allowed the free exercise of their religion. The hon. member went on to tell a story, which he evidently thought a good joke, but which he did not see contradicted all that he had said before. He related how some zealous Protestants had resorted to a novel method of diffusing their opinions in Spain, by throwing bottles, with religious tracts corked up inside, into the sea, and that he had himself seen some of them brought ashore. The story, as he told it, was a very apocryphal one, even though he vouches for having witnessed it; but, supposing it to be true, it effectually disposes of all his fine stories about freedom of opinion; for no man in his senses would disseminate religious tracts in bottles if he could have openly distributed them by hand.

The news from Germany is especially interesting. Both in Prussia and Austria important events are pending, which cannot fail vitally to affect the interests of Christian truth in those countries. In Austria the members of the Supreme Legislative Assembly, have put forth a programme on the relation of the Church to the State, which, if adopted, will disestablish the Roman Catholic religion there altogether. The Concordat, agreed to a few years ago, which put the education of the people in the hands of the Romish clergy, is entirely at an end. In Prussia, too, there is a movement in progress to separate the Church from the State, which has led to the resignation of the Prussian Minister of Worship, M. Bethmann Hollweg, of whom our correspondent at Frankfort speaks in terms of esteem for his Christian character. It is impossible not to see in all these events that a great religious crisis is at hand all over the Continent.

The war in America continues; and though the arms of the North have of late achieved several important successes, there are no signs of submission in the South. But President Lincoln has sent a recent Message to Congress, which, we rejoice to believe, is the first step towards the termination on a right basis, of the great suicidal conflict. He proposes that the Union shall guarantee to any Slave State that will gradually emancipate their slaves, compensation to the planters who may suffer loss by the movement. His proposal applied to all the States, but he himself appears to think it will only be listened to in the Border States, where the slaves are few. He calculates, however, that if the Border States can thus be won back to the Union, the more Southern States will soon follow their example. We do not know what grounds he has for coming to this conclusion; but it is a noteworthy event, that he sees the propriety of ending the strife by other than warlike means; and it is still more important that he recognises the slave question as at the bottom of the whole difficulty. What is the feeling upon the subject in the North may be gathered from a communication which appears in our correspondence.

As the mails come in from time to time we rejoice to find how universal the observance of the week of prayer has been by Christian men all over the world. Our columns this month bear testimony that in India, in Australia, and in China, wherever two or three Christians could be found, there they were gathered together supplicating for the outpouring of the Holy Ghost. We suppose that in the first week of last January there was a nearer approach to the fulfilment of the Divine prophecy than was ever before realised in the world's history, when from the rising of the sun to his going down Christ's name was honoured and Christ's Spirit invoked. And not without effect, for it will be seen from our missionary intelligence that in various parts of the heathen world, in Turkey, in China, and elsewhere, God's work prospers, and a revival of spiritual feeling is apparent.

PRESENTATION OF ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE TO HER MAJESTY.

The following address to the Queen, on occasion of the death of his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, from the Committee of Council, has been very graciously received by Her Majesty :—

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

The dutiful and loyal Address of the Committee of the British Organization in connexion with the Evangelical Alliance.

May it please your Majesty,

We, the Committee of the British Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, formed for the purpose of drawing Christians of various denominations and of different countries more closely together in friendly intercourse, and in useful co-operation, desire most respectfully to offer to your Majesty, and to the beloved Royal family, the expression of our dutiful and heartfelt condolence on the unspeakable loss and affliction which your Majesty and their Royal Highnesses have been called to sustain, by the death of your illustrious Consort.

Our grief is the grief of the nation. From the highest noble to the humblest toiler on the land, or in the bowels of the earth, all feel that in the deceased Prince they have lost a friend, and, not less, a conspicuous but unassuming pattern of every domestic and moral excellence.

Many were the claims of his Royal Highness on the gratitude of his adopted country. But not all that he did directly to promote the comfort and improvement of various classes of the people—not even his nobly benevolent cares and counsels for the very lowliest of them—endeared him so deeply to our affection as did the knowledge of his incomparable devotion, tenderness, and helpfulness to Her, who by God's blessed Providence is raised above us all, as also of his more than fatherly watchfulness over the Royal Family of England. These virtues, these true services to the nation, neither royalty nor modesty could wholly seclude from public observation : and on the sudden quenching of so useful and beauteous a light, well might "the land mourn, every family apart."

We beg permission to add that, from our constant communication with eminent Christian men in foreign countries, as well as in our own, we are able to assure your Majesty of a very wide-spread sentiment among the wise and good of many lands, and of many Churches, of respect for the memory of the departed, and of sympathy with the bereaved Sovereign and nation. And to catholic minded Christians everywhere, we believe the crowning attraction of that truly princely character to have been the reverence which his Royal Highness so openly and constantly evinced for our common Protestant Christianity, under various forms of worship.

"The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away." Devoutly ascribing to His favour the gift of such a Prince, and of the "wisdom and knowledge" which enabled him thus acceptably to "go out and come in before this people," we look to God alone to alleviate to us the calamity of his removal. For your Majesty, in your irreparable bereavement, our best hopes and wishes, and the prayers of many righteous men, were happily anticipated by your Majesty's own words, in the memorable Proclamation issued on November 1st., 1858, to your subjects in India. "Firmly relying," as your Majesty, by God's grace, then did, "on the truths of Christianity, and acknowledging with gratitude the solace of religion," your Majesty, we feel assured, will now find those same truths of the Gospel Revelation, and the solace which flows from a personal reliance on them to be more available and more supporting than ever. And in that day when the mysteries of Divine Providence shall be explained, it will doubtless be made apparent, that the affliction which has fallen upon your Majesty, and upon the nation, was designed by the Father of Mercies to wean all hearts from this transitory world, and to prepare both sovereign and subjects, "through sanctification of the Spirit, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ," for a life of blessedness that shall never end.

SPANISH PROTESTANT PRISONERS.

Allusion was made in the last number of the Intelligencer to the steps which were then being taken to arrest the arm of religious persecution in Spain, and to obtain the release of Matamoros and his companions, suffering imprisonment "for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." It will be remembered that the original purpose of the Geneva Conference, besides sending a letter of sympathy, which was kindly conveyed to Matamoros, Albama, and Trigo, in their prisons in Granada, by the Rev. A. R. C. Dallas, and the Rev. H. C. Eade, was to present an address to the Cortes praying for the liberation of the persecuted brethren, and for religious liberty. This course was afterwards modified at the suggestion of the Committee of the British Branch of the Alliance, and with the consent of the Geneva Committee, on whom had been devolved the carrying into effect of the resolutions of the Conference. The reason for this modification, together with some particulars not before published connected with General Alexander's mission to Madrid, is explained in a letter written by the Chairman of the British Branch, at the request of the Committee, in reply to an application from Paris to furnish facts for the use of two of the chief literary periodicals of France. The letter is as follows:—

7, Adam-street, Strand, March 19, 1862.

Sir,—I willingly reply to your enquiries about the Spanish prisoners. The Evangelical Alliance has nothing to conceal. It has confidence in the goodness of its cause, in the noble sentiments of Captain General O'Donnell, and above all in the blessing of God. A plain unvarnished narrative of facts can injure no one.

The recent mission of Major-General Alexander to Madrid had for its object respect to the Spanish Government and to avoid public agitation.

The Conference of Christians of all nations in September, 1861, resolved to adopt measures in behalf of their Spanish co-religionists. The Committee of the Conference before its dissolution committed the subject to the Geneva Committee of the Evangelical Alliance. A petition to the Cortes was in process of preparation, asking for legislation in favour of religious liberty. Her Majesty, the Queen of Spain, was to be respectfully informed of it. It was also in contemplation to send deputations from various nations to Madrid, similar to those which sought and obtained from the Grand Duke of Tuscany the liberation of the Medici.

The English Committee of the Evangelical Alliance requested the postponement for a time of these measures, with a view of making trial of one of a quieter character. They knew the Spanish to be a high-minded and highly sensitive people—more likely to be influenced by manifestations of respect, than by exhibition of numbers, or by any appearance of foreign dictation. They were aware, too, that the three chief prisoners—Matamoros, Albama, and Trigo—recently condemned—the two former to seven years', and the latter to four years' hard labour in the galleys—for religion, had appealed to the Supreme Tribunal of Justice. Measures which may be found appropriate in the extreme case of a degrading punishment being actually inflicted, might be deemed premature during the period of detention for trial.

The Committee were chiefly brought to these views by the kind advice of the Earl of Clarendon, to whose valuable experience they were early enabled to have recourse, and to whom they are under the deepest obligation for his sympathy and assistance throughout. His Lordship from long residence at Madrid as British Ambassador, and also from his subsequent administration of the Department of Foreign Affairs, was in the highest degree qualified to advise in such a matter; and being at this time out of office he was enabled to render assistance which no official personage could have done. I am glad to have Lord Clarendon's permission to refer to his sanction of our proceedings, and I am particularly thankful to state that the choice of the English General Officer to whom the mission to Madrid was entrusted had his entire approval.

Armed with Lord Clarendon's introductions, and with such support as Earl Russell could with propriety afford, General Alexander went to Madrid, taking Paris on his way. The General found that in Paris an earnest movement was already on foot for the same object, on the part of the Protestants of France supported by statesmen of high standing, but he deemed it wisest not to complicate his simple and humble mission by offering to combine his efforts with those of public men in France. This did not, however, prevent his accepting a letter of introduction from M. Thouvenel, Minister of Foreign Affairs, obtained through the kind introduction of Lord Cowley, addressed to his Excellency M. Barrot, French Minister at the Court of Spain—a letter not more valuable to the cause of religious liberty and gratifying to the heart of every Englishman, than honourable to the statesman by whom it was given.

At Madrid General Alexander was cordially assisted by his Excellency Sir Jno. Crampton, by whom he was early introduced to the Prime Minister. The Captain-General O'Donnell received him with great courtesy and frankness. General Alexander learnt from his Excellency that revolutionary movements in Spain had lately been carried on, with which it is said that certain persons professing to take the Bible for their guide are connected. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that public opinion should be in danger of confounding one with the other. Our co-religionists, however, stand thoroughly acquitted of any imputation of that sort. Though such accusations have been attempted, they have been refuted before the Spanish tribunals. It is now admitted on all hands that they are on their trial exclusively for religion.

The Prime Minister received very cordially a written statement of the object of the General's mission, a list of the nationalities represented at the Geneva Conference, and another list of persons of note in Europe who had either been present at Geneva or are known to take a lively interest in the fate of the Spanish prisoners.

The list of countries included France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, England (with India and the Colonies), Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Prussia, Italy, United States of America, &c. In the list of names were included M. Bethmann Hollweg, Minister of Worship in Prussia; the late Count de Portalis, late Prussian Ambassador at Paris; Mr. Groen Van Prinstere, Minister of State in Holland; Count Zuylen Van Nyevelt, late Minister of Foreign Affairs (Holland); M. Guizot, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Earl of Roden, the Earl of Cavan, General Sir Rowland Eustace, Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., Hon. Spencer Cowper, Baron de Kattendyke (Holland), Baron Van der Linden, Count Bismark Bohlen (Prussia), Baron von Schwebs (Russia), Baron von Harren (Russia), Baron de Vallendyke (Holland), Mr. Adrien Naville, Colonel Tronebin, Count de St. Georges, Count Agénor de Gasparin, M. Adolphe de Pourtalès, Watteville de Portes, Aloys de Pourtalès, Professor Rosseeaw de St. Hilaire, Professor Merle d'Aubigné, Professor Tholuck, Dr. Krummacher, Professor Dörner, Hon. and Rev. B. Noel, Archdeacon Baggesen, Professor Gibson, M. Adolphe Mallet, Baron von Cramm, Professor Herzog, Dr. Bonnet, Pasteur G. Monod, Pasteur Grandpierre, Rev. D. Wilson, &c., &c.

The Duke de Tetuan, after receiving these documents, replied to General Alexander that though he could hold out no hope of an immediate favourable result, no course could have been better adapted to the purpose than that which had been pursued. He promised to communicate the documents to his colleagues, and said that though Spain would never allow anything like foreign dictation, the Government was considerate of moral influences and fair representations.

Without committing others, I venture to confess that I think that the Prime Minister said as much as we had a right to expect for the moment. The prisoners are now detained for their final judgment. The time, however, to test the sentiments of the Spanish Government will be, when the appeal shall have been decided, and when the sentence is about to be executed. A thrill of horror would vibrate through Europe, the moment Matamoros became a galley slave for religion. The sound of his fetters would touch every heart in Christendom. Before that has happened I feel confident that Captain-General O'Donnell will do justice to his own reputation and to the honour of his country by obtaining the exercise of the Royal clemency and setting the prisoners free.

I might further state that a copy of the enclosed document (see enclosure A)* was placed in the Duke de Tetuan's hands. It is the Address of large numbers of the Protestant nobility and gentry—including bishops and clergy and laymen of all ranks—to the Protestant Government of Sweden on behalf of persons who had been Protestants, and who on becoming Roman Catholics were exiled for their change of creed. The same sort of Address was presented to the Swedish Government from similar personages in France, Prussia, and other countries. The signatures include, as will be seen, the Archbishops of Canterbury and Dublin; the Bishops of London, Carlisle, Ripon, Meath, Tuam, Cashel, Down and Connor, and Jerusalem; the Earls of Derby, Shaftesbury, Carlisle, Gainsborough, Cavan, Ducie, Effingham, Wicklow, Rosebery, Morley, and Kintore; Lords Brougham and Cranworth (ex-Lord Chancellors), Lord J. Russell (now Earl Russell), Sir R. Bethell (now Lord Chancellor), Lords Ebury, Calthorpe, Berners, Midleton, &c., about thirty-five members of the House of Commons, with many leading clergymen, dissenting ministers, and laymen.

You are aware that the Government and Parliament of Sweden at once responded to this appeal. The law under which these persons suffered is changed, and the individuals are no longer exiles. Such a proceeding ought to have but one effect on the minds of generous Spaniards.

It should also be known that General Alexander avoided in Spain, as the Evangelical Alliance has declined in London, everything approaching to contact with political opponents of the Government. Not only so, but we have declined taking any step whatever which might seem to indicate a want of confidence in Captain-General O'Donnell's tolerant principles. H.R.H. the Duke de Montpensier, to whom General Alexander was honoured with an introduction, most generously expressed himself as willing to receive any petition that might be entrusted to him on behalf of the prisoners, and himself to transmit it to his sister-in-law, the Queen of Spain.

This noble offer, which was made with expression of the most enlightened sentiments, was not taken advantage of; as those who were interested in General Alexander's mission thought it more desirable to leave the advocacy of the prisoners' cause exclusively in the hands of the Prime Minister. The Spanish Government may naturally desire to act with the grace of spontaneous magnanimity should the legal appeal now pending be decided against the prisoners. General Alexander was, however, authorised to entreat H.R.H. the Duc de Montpensier to exercise in such way as may seem best to his good judgment the influence of his exalted position and the high moral authority which his personal character commands. In point of fact the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance considered that if the Prince's offer to present their petition to the Queen of Spain were accepted, it would require to be signed by eminent persons of many different nations, and that the necessary correspondence would give a character of public agitation to their proceedings, which they were anxious, if possible, to avoid.

* See "Address to the Swedish Minister on the Banishment of Six Roman Catholic Women," Evangelical Christendom, August, 1858.

Thanking you for the opportunity of making you acquainted with these facts,

I am Sir, your faithful servant,

(Signed) C. E. EARDLEY.

SPECIAL SIMULTANEOUS PRAYER INVITED ON BEHALF OF SPAIN, AND ESPECIALLY OF THE SPANISH PROTESTANT PRISONERS, APRIL 21, 1862.

The Committee rejoice in the knowledge that much prayer is made of the Church of God for our persecuted brethren; but venturing to hope that very many of their fellow Christians would, on a set day, gladly, if invited to do so, offer special supplications for Spain, they have adopted the following resolution:—

That, relying on the gracious interposition of God, far more than on all human agencies (though these are to be used to the utmost), for the spread of religious truth in Spain, and especially for the liberation of our imprisoned Spanish brethren, the Christians of various countries be invited, simultaneously, to offer up their supplications that all obstructions to the free preaching of the Gospel in Spain may be removed, and that the prisoners for the Gospel's sake in that country may be sustained under their affliction by the power of Divine grace, and may soon be delivered from their bonds. That as it is the practice of many Christians specially to pray for the Church at large on Monday in each week, Monday, the 21st of April next, be indicated as a suitable day for the above purpose.

GRANT FOR THE RELIEF OF THE PRISONERS.

The Committee have directed the balance of the funds contributed for the expenses of the Deputation for the Spanish prisoners to be sent to Spain for the relief of the prisoners and their families. The sum of about forty pounds monthly, required to render this necessary assistance, has hitherto been collected and remitted by several friends. The Evangelical Alliance earnestly solicit further contributions to aid in this object.

PROPOSED MEETINGS FOR CONFERENCE DURING THE EXHIBITION.

The Committee have resolved to take occasion of the visit to London of eminent brethren of Foreign Churches to hold in Freemasons' Hall, at convenient times during the coming International Exhibition, three meetings for Conference on the following subjects: 1. The Lord's Day. 2. The different forms of infidelity. 3. The condition of the masses of the population of various countries, and the best means of meeting their spiritual wants. Particulars will be announced as the time approaches.

ADDRESS TO THE MEMBERS OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The Council have just issued an address urging upon the prayerful attention of all the members of this Alliance the fundamental principles of their union, and the duty of watchfulness over their own spirit especially, in reference to the Ecclesiastical controversies of the times. It is hoped that the words of friendly counsel and brotherly admonition contained in this address at the present time, when questions have arisen on which the judgment of British Christians differs widely, may tend, by God's blessing, "to discourage all envyings, strifes, and divisions, and to impress on Christians a deeper sense of the duty of obeying our Lord's command, to love one another." Copies will be sent with the Intelligencer to subscribers, and other copies may be obtained by application to the Secretaries.

LETTER FROM MATAMOROS.

At a meeting of the Committee, held March 13th, a letter was read from Matamoros, expressing his sincere gratitude for the efforts made by the Evangelical Alliance on his behalf, and for his vindication of liberty of conscience in his native country.

LETTER FROM THE UNIVERSAL ISRAELITE ALLIANCE.

At the same meeting the following letter was read, showing the sympathy felt by Jews with Christians who are suffering for conscience' sake:—

Paris, March 9, 1862.

To the President and Members of the Evangelical Alliance, London.

Gentlemen,—Having learned from the public papers the sentence pronounced in Spain against several of your co-religionists, the Committee of the Universal Israelite Alliance, is desirous to express to you how fully they share the sorrow and regret which it has caused amongst all men of right feeling.

Our Society, instituted for the defence of Israelite interests, makes common cause with the general principle of liberty of conscience. It therefore feels itself deeply wounded by every attempt made against that liberty, and would consider it a dereliction of duty if it were to remain indifferent to the sanguinary defiance cast at one of its most sacred rights. The spirit of toleration is in fact too recent a conquest of our civilization, and the attack now made upon it is too odious, for all liberal men not to blend their power and their knowledge in one common effort against such an invasion of their privileges, by the tendencies of an age that is past.

We therefore heartily associate ourselves with every effort you may consider it desirable to make under present circumstances; and if our feeble voice can do anything towards preventing the repetition of acts which we deplore, we shall be most happy to place ourselves at your disposal.

In the meantime, we beg you to accept, Gentlemen, the assurance of our high esteem and warm sympathy.

For the Committee,

LOUIS J. KONIGSWATER, President.

Just as this statement is passing through the press, a copy of the Clamor Publico, of March 20, has been received, announcing that Matamoros and his fellow-prisoner have been condemned by the Superior Tribunal to eleven years' labour at the galleys (instead of seven and four) on the coast of Africa. If this be true, surely the whole of Christendom will feel impelled to move in this matter.

LORD'S-DAY OBSERVANCE SOCIETIES ON THE CONTINENT.

The movement for the promotion of the due observance of the Lord's-day on the Continent, which originated in the discussion of the subject at the Geneva Conference, continues, as we learn from information privately communicated, rapidly to advance. Three public meetings have been held in Geneva since the beginning of the year, for conference on the duty and privilege of aiding in this work; each meeting was attended by a numerous audience, who manifested a warm interest in the object for which they were assembled. Within the last week or two a similar meeting was convened, consisting exclusively of male inhabitants of the city. On this occasion the persons present were invited to declare if they adopted the principles of the newly-formed society, and were willing, by their influence, to seek to extend those principles, when 300 men of different classes of society at once rose to signify their assent. At the same meeting cards were distributed to such persons as were willing to take them, to be returned with the names and address written upon them of others who might wish to become members of the society. About 200 adhesions, by this means, were soon obtained. A meeting of the same description for ladies was likewise intended to be convened. This is but the beginning of a work, which, under the Divine blessing, will effect great good. Similar associations have been formed, or are in course of formation, in other Cantons. One is being formed at Berne. At Lausanne, Zurich, and Basle, the friends of Evangelical religion are engaged in this matter, though in these towns greater difficulties oppose themselves than in many other places. At Schaffhausen an association was constituted with a display of enthusiasm, and it is interesting to learn that the formation of a Lord's-day Society in that town, invited to include all Evangelical Christians desirous of joining it, suggested to the brethren there to form a Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, which has accordingly been done.

RESULT OF THE CONFERENCE.

The following extract of a private letter from Geneva, received by a lady in this country, and placed at our disposal, will be read with deep interest:—

The precious communion of brethren, in the lovely days of September, has left behind it results which will prove eternal blessings. You have, no doubt, already heard from various quarters of the benefit which God has accorded to Geneva from the date of that Conference; but our hearts are so filled with gratitude, that I, too, cannot but speak of it. God has heard the prayers of His children assembled in our city, and He has commenced in it a new era, by breathing upon us the gracious influences of His Spirit. Christians have been encouraged and strengthened. Many good works date their birth from the time of the Conference, and others, which had before been in operation, have received new life and vigour. Meetings for addresses to the unconverted have been held in the Salle de la Rive Droite every Monday evening, for the last five months, which have, by the grace of God, produced fruit beyond all human expectation. The Lord has deigned to put His seal upon them, by making them the means of bringing many souls to know and rejoice in Him. This work has greatly occupied us; for we form part of a little meeting, at which we practice Revival hymns, translated from the English, which are sung at the meetings on Monday evenings.

ALLIANCE.

In addition to the new Committee formed at Schaffhausen, above referred to, another Committee has been constituted at Vigan, in Switzerland, comprising ministers and laymen of the various Churches. The Committee has taken a building, which is devoted to special services and meetings for prayer under their direction.

THE NATURE AND EFFECTS OF FAITH.*

OF all the questions, theological or ecclesiastical, which are wont to excite controversy and demand attention, incomparably the most interesting and important is that old one—"Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, or bow myself before the High God." Or, in New Testament language, "What shall I do to be saved?" And simple and plain as the answer to this important question appears to be made in the New Testament itself, and clearly and elaborately as it has been expounded and elucidated by the Churches of the Reformation, it may well be doubted if any other has been so systematically and perennially assailed and mystified by perverse religiousness and perverted learning. God's method of justifying sinners, according to the riches of His free grace, through faith alone in the blood and righteousness of His Son our Redeemer, and exclusively on account of His merits, remains an everlasting stumbling-block to many. Priestcraft withers in the light of the glorious truth. Pride must become humility before it. Nature struggles against grace. Carnal morality, self-righteousness, and superstition—all dread its approach, and dislike its too heavenly texture and temper. Accordingly, in every age we have had, and may continue to expect, periodical assaults from divers quarters upon the scriptural simplicity of Divine Truth, which will demand to be repelled, from time to time, by those who contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. And as the attack varies in form, so must the defence, while essentially the same, adapt itself to the new devices of the opposition.

It is nearly thirty years since the Bishop of Ossory published the first edition of his ten sermons on "The Nature and Effects of Faith," originally preached in the chapel of Trinity College, Dublin, and intended chiefly for divinity students there. So rapidly did that first edition disappear, and so valuable was it considered, that we have seen the volume sold in auction rooms for nearly three pounds; and it was difficult to get a perusal of it even out of public libraries. This reprint, with additions, we have little doubt, will speedily be absorbed also; and as we trust no great time will be suffered to elapse before the publication of a third edition, we would venture to suggest that a good index of reference to matters, as well as to texts elucidated, would be of great value and usefulness. In these respects few modern books are so convenient as the old publications, which is to be regretted.

The author says:—

The plan of the sermons is very simple, and will be found steadily adhered to throughout. I begin by attempting (Sermons I. and II.) to ascertain the scriptural meaning of faith; how the principle is wrought in the mind; and what is the whole preceding or accompanying change of mind which is essential to the existence of genuine faith. I next seek (Sermon III.), in the same way, to fix the sense of justification in the Bible; and then to determine (Sermon IV.) what is the connexions which the Scriptures declare to exist between this change of mind, which God has wrought in us, and this change of our condition before Him. This ought to end in the establishment of the doctrine of justification by faith only; with a clear understanding of its meaning. And to this are added, in the way of confirmation, a review of the chief corruptions of this doctrine (Sermon V.), and an answer to the chief objections against it (Sermon VI.). Regarding this great truth, then, as sufficiently explained, established, and guarded, I pass in the remaining sermons to a consideration of the other effects of faith: its operation in the sanctification of believers; how it moves and restrains them; and how it calls into exercise and restrains all the other natural forces by which God designs to restrain and move His people.

This was the outline of the plan of the work, and its author declares that upon the full reconsideration of it, forced upon him while the present volume has been passing through the press, he sees nothing in the plan itself which he desires to alter; but it is almost painfully characteristic of the Bishop's habit of mind, that he expresses with evident sincerity his own sense of the defective execution of his work in such depreciating terms as no candid critic other than himself could think it just to employ. But all the reconsideration and revision in the world could not make perfect any mere human writing, especially on such a subject. We must be content to be imperfect, to be open to criticism, and to be satisfied with only having done something in the cause of truth: and something highly valuable has surely been effected by this able volume.

After some preliminary remarks as to the vague and conflicting accounts we commonly meet with upon the simple question of the nature of faith, the Bishop first notices and condemns "all those representations which, in some shape or other, more or less important, make obedience to God's law a part of the notion for which faith stands." He then passes on to consider the true sense of the word, in that use of it in which it stands for "the saving principle which unites us to Christ, and makes us partakers of all the benefits of His life and death, justifies us before God, and reconciles us to Him." The result of a very interesting and lucid discussion of this topic is, that it means trust, confidence, reliance. Trust in God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Not merely a belief of the truth of scriptural history, nor an intellectual apprehension of the Gospel scheme, nor both; but a real desire for the fruits, and a heartfelt confidence in the efficacy of Christ's mediatorial work. The next great point of inquiry is as to "the source of faith." The second sermon, which is upon this subject, is deeply interesting, Evangelical, and edifying, as well as critically satisfactory. While he maintains the plain doctrine that the operation of the Spirit of God is essential to the production of true faith, he does this in a manner not at all common. The difficult question of the time when, or the point at which, Divine spiritual help must needs be superinduced upon man's natural powers, we do not think we have ever elsewhere seen so candidly and cautiously handled. Of course there will be divergencies of opinion, and those who are wedded to systems may not agree with all the Bishop's statements; but it is scarcely possible to read and weigh them without profit. We think he presents, in the main, the mind of the Spirit upon this important and difficult topic, and as to the place of repentance and prayer in connexion with that faith which is the production of the Spirit of God.

In a valuable critical note upon this interesting discussion we are glad to see that the Bishop boldly and, we think, successfully grapples with the modern interpretation of Eph. ii. 8, which denies to that verse the assertion that it is faith which is the gift of God. Dean Alford and, we believe, Dean Eliot take this "modern" view. The Bishop of Ossory adheres to that which is the ancient one, and which we believe—learned commentators notwithstanding—is the mind of the Spirit and the plain meaning of the passage to every unprejudiced reader, whose common sense is not perverted by so-called learning. Force and point seem to be ejected from the whole passage, and flat tautology left instead, if we refer the "and that" (xai touto) not to faith, but to salvation, as being the gift of God. It is satisfactory to think that the simple expedient of varying the point of the parenthesis disposes of the learned objections of Dean Alford and others, and restoring to the emphatic phrase (xai touto) its true office and force vindicates the text in question as an undoubted proof of the doctrine that faith is the gift of God.

The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth sermons seem to form a sort of separate whole on the doctrine of justification by faith only. The Bishop first states the nature and grounds of justification, then explains the connexion between faith and justification; considers the corruptions of the doctrine and the objections against it. The four last sermons are devoted to a discussion of the moral effects of faith. In other words, the four first of this series deal with the question of the effects of faith upon our relation to or our standing before God; the four last discuss the effects of faith upon our character. "To justify," he contends, "is, in its proper and usual meaning, to declare judicially the innocence of the person justified;" and this sense he supports, not by any arguments from etymology, but by a copious induction from the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament. But if justification be a declaration of innocence, how can sinful men be justified? This is the mystery of redemption. We are not merely pardoned, but justified. Not merely is past sin condoned, but we are at once accepted as righteous, on account of Christ's righteousness imputed to us, while ungodly, and before being made righteous or sanctified. Vicarious sufferings and imputed righteousness are the grounds of our justification. We can only refer to the book itself for the elaborate and clear vindication of this Evangelical doctrine, which was held by Arminius, no less than by Calvin; and which the Scriptures adduced in proof establish so conclusively, that it is a marvel how human audacity could ever gainsay them. Going forward, then, to the very important link of the discussion—"the connexion between faith and justification"—we have that admirably perspicuous and unflinching vindication of the doctrine of justification by faith only, of which we have already made mention. And if, with respect to the doctrine of imputed righteousness, it be difficult to understand how the force of the plain statements of Scripture could be gainsayed, much more is such a remark applicable to the way in which this vital part of the question has been and continually is handled by those who resist the truth. But as the Bishop (on Romans iii. 28) observes:—

They who are able to find that when the Apostle says that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of law, he really means that a man is justified partly by faith, and partly by deeds of law, must possess some principles of interpretation which would enable them to dispose as easily of any other statement, or any number of statements, on this subject, or on any subject. . . . To set about fabricating forms of expression that shall baffle the pernicious ingenuity with which we contrive to evade the natural force of plain language, when it conveys to us what we do not like to hear, betrays an ignorance alike of the imperfections of human language and of the wiles of the human heart. The whole history of legislation shows sufficiently that no specifications, however curiously framed and laboriously multiplied, can anticipate a tithe of the subtleties with which men are supplied when they search for such objects. And the Bible does not make the attempt. It denounces this unfairness of spirit, it warns us against it, and supplies abundant remedies for it; but it makes no provision for this warfare in detail against it—a warfare so likely to be interminable, and so little likely to be profitable. When the Apostle preached through Christ “the forgiveness of sins,” and distinctly declared that “by Him ALL that believe are justified from all things,” from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses, he probably knew—the Being under whose inspiration he was speaking certainly knew—that almost every word in this plain sentence would afford an exercise to the perverted ingenuity of those who will not receive the message that it conveys, or submit themselves to the righteousness of God. But he does not therefore stop to explain these terms, and to guard them from perversion; which could only be done by other terms no less liable to be wrested from their natural meaning. He does not do this; but by a solemn warning he commends his simple publication of the Gospel to that honest consideration which renders such precautions superfluous, while the want of it certainly renders all precautions unavailing (“Be-ware,” &c., Acts xiii. 40).

After going through an examination of some of the numerous passages in which the Apostle incidentally supports this doctrine, the Bishop adduces an argument which has often occurred, no doubt, to others, and which seems perfectly unanswerable on the point. We refer to the objections which the Apostle anticipates to the doctrine; and to the way in which he answers these objections. Those undoubtedly could only be brought against the doctrine of free forgiveness and unreserved acceptance of all sinners who come to God by faith in Christ. Those objections would and could never have been advanced against a different doctrine of salvation. If we preached salvation by works, or by works added to grace, we never could anticipate that such objections could be made as are made against the doctrine of free justification by faith only. Says the Bishop, “weak objections against the truth are as likely to be made as strong ones; and may sometimes in prudence no less require an answer. But even the unfairest or dumbest assailant would be unlikely to make use of objections which have no conceivable application to it; and if such objections were really put forward, no defender of the truth would think that they merited any reply; still less would he be likely himself to suggest them and anticipate them.” We do not believe that amidst the variety of objections and oppositions to the truth which the Bishop encounters and explodes, he notices one that is rather new to us, which has been, we don’t know how long since, advanced by some of the Plymouthite brethren. We mean the allegation that because a man is not justified by deeds of law, therefore he cannot be justified by Christ’s legal deeds, or His fulfilment of law. We must suppose there is something meant by this objection which we do not at all comprehend. But if fulfilment of legal requirement be no part of Christ’s righteousness, we do not know what that righteousness is; nor could we see the force of Paul’s statement (Rom. iii. 31), that instead of making void the law, he establishes the law, by the doctrine of the sinner’s free justification through Christ’s righteousness. However, we only mention this in passing. Very pertinent are the Bishop’s searching remarks as to the manner in which the plain statements of Scripture and the elaborate definitions of the Reformed Churches are evaded, by giving some new sense to the terms—Works, or Faith, or Justification. “It appears at first sight remarkable, that upon every one of these terms, at some time or other, has this dangerous process been tried. Labourers have never been wanting to effect the main object of such changes ; though the ways in which they endeavoured to promote it were often not only difficult, but inconsistent with each other." Seriatim, the author exposes several of these perversions ; and most satisfactory is that part of his exposition which confutes the attempt to reduce it, after all, to a controversy verbal or unimportant, since the most strenuous advocates of the pure doctrine of justification by faith only are equally strenuous in maintaining the necessity of good works, and that without holiness no man shall see the Lord. The sophistical nature of this evasion is thoroughly exposed, and the true power of the doctrine, as productive of holiness, admirably elucidated, as well in answer to these objections, as in the four last sermons, on the moral effects of faith. These last four sermons will, probably, receive most attention in our day. They are replete with a profound teaching most necessary at present. It would not be easy, we believe, to declare in more distinct and glorious terms the fulness and freeness of the grace of the Gospel than will be found (pp. 202—205) in this part of the work. The object of faith—the incarnate Creator, who assumed the nature which we had polluted, obeyed the law which we had violated, suffered punishment which we had incurred, &c.—being first set forth, the revelation, we are told—

Publishes that by the life and death of the Redeemer a way is now opened for ALL to be reconciled unto God ; and for ALL the same way. That there is no continuance in sin, however obstinate and prolonged—no degree of guilt, however black and enormous—that excludes the sinner from the offered pardon, or even modifies—in the slightest particular modifies—the offer of free pardon in the REDEEMER which the Gospel makes alike to ALL. That to ALL who, hearing the call, turn to God, casting away all other grounds of dependance, and trusting entirely and unreservedly in this alone, receiving salvation simply as the work of the Redeemer, and as His gifts—unreserved pardon, full acceptance, are freely promised in His name. This is, in brief, that revelation of mercy upon which faith rests ; upon an abiding conviction of those glorious truths it is that confidence in the Redeemer is grounded : they who believe in Him know in whom they trust, and that they who trust in Him shall never be ashamed. The grounds of confidence cannot be laid broader or deeper. The Lord is my light and my salvation, saith the Psalmist, whom then can I fear ? The Lord is the strength of my life ; of whom then can I be afraid ? What can they fear who are confiding in a crucified and risen Saviour ? Which of the natural objects of dread can affright them ? He in whom they trust has abolished death. (2 Tim. i. 10.) The sting of death is sin (1 Cor. xv. 56), and He hath put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself (Heb. ix. 26.). The strength of sin is the law (1 Cor. xv. 56), and He has blotted out the handwriting of ordinances which was against us, which was contrary to us, nailing it to His cross. (Col. ii. 14.) He that had the power of death is the devil, but him the Lord has through death destroyed. (Heb. ii. 14.) He has spoiled the principalities and powers of darkness, making a show of them openly. (Col. ii. 15.) What remains for them to fear who trust in Him ? What, indeed, as the Apostle persuasively argues—what or whom can believers fear ? Do they dread an accusation from God, whom they have offended ? It is He who has justified them. Do they dread condemnation from Him into whose hands all judgment is committed by the Father, and who shall judge quick and dead at the last day ? They know that He lived for them, and rose again for them ; that He even now sitteth at the right hand of the Father, to plead for them—they who trust in Him as a spotless representative, as a sufficient surety, as a prevailing intercessor ; what or whom can they fear ? (Rom. viii. 33, 34.)

We have been induced to give at length this passage, enriched as it is by the very Word of Truth, as a proof of the fearless way in which our author throws himself upon the life-buoy of our salvation itself, while he proposes to go on and to show how this Divine doctrine operates to produce that very holiness and those very effects which no other doctrine can produce; yet to produce which, or pretend to do so, forms the excuse of those who resist the truth as it is in Jesus in this vital particular, and invent futile schemes for justifying and sanctifying sinners. Nor is it unimportant here to note the strong statement of the Bishop, which he certainly has fully established by cogent proofs—viz., that ALL Protestant Churches, however separated by differences in discipline and doctrine, and ALL early Protestant divines to whom any reverence is due, whatever were their differences upon other points, agreed in maintaining the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH ONLY, as it is maintained in these discourses.

Our limited space will not permit us to follow the arguments and illustrations of the four last sermons, "On the Effects of Faith." For our part, we profess that in no other work have we seen this branch of the question so ably and convincingly treated. It is a rich mine of instruction as to the experimental work of the truth, in the intellect as well as in the conscience and affections of a believer. One difficult subject, indeed, which the Bishop treats of, may probably excite some differences of opinion even among the godly, the candid, and the thoughtful. We allude to his mode of viewing the question of degrees of glory, or reward according to works. The subject will bear examination. It is one of inconceivable interest. It is one of vast depth and difficulty. It is questionable if we can be correct judges now of what in God's sight are "different degrees of moral advancement and of moral degradation." We must leave this point, however, to the private consideration of every one for themselves. It is satisfactory that we shall be like Christ, and see Him as He is, whatever shall be the mode or degree of our felicity. And that faith, working by love, is the truly purifying principle, we doubt not is as philosophically demonstrable as it is divinely revealed. "And surely, no one can look at human nature or human life fairly, without seeing the wisdom of this—without seeing that in choosing out of all the principles of the human character LOVE to bear the burden, the one is chosen which is best able to bear it."

Of the mass of learned and argumentative notes appended to the volume, which compose nearly 300 closely-printed pages, we have not room to speak. They form a body of divinity on the topic, refuting in detail numerous errors, condensing into one focus a mass of evidence as to the teaching of the Reformers, and satisfactorily disposing of some critical obscurations of the truth which recent learning has achieved. We have already referred to one of these last in relation to the important text in Eph. ii. 8. The Bishop's arguments on the word δικαιοσύνη will be found exhaustive. And, in fine, we would allude to his exposition of Rom. i. 17, on which he combats Dean Alford's construction, and maintains the passage to be parallel to Rom. iii. 21, 22, and that it means substantially the same thing; connecting, as he does, the ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν with δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ, instead of with ἀποκαλυπτεται, as Dean Alford would.

But we must forbear, and would only repeat our hope that this excellent work shall find now its way into every earnest hand, and that wealthy friends of the truth may feel disposed to see it placed in public institutions, especially those where young persons studying divinity may have free access to it. It is a book truly for our times; and will live for all time.

BESSER'S BIBLICAL STUDIES ON ST. JOHN'S GOSPEL.*

THE writings of the Apostle John strike every reader of Scripture as possessing a stamp peculiarly their own. The beloved Apostle seems to be ever dwelling under the atmosphere of love, and to be enjoying the beams of the Sun of Righteousness. So much love is mingled in his writings that we can almost fancy him writing while leaning as was his wont in Jesus' bosom. The words of Ewald, with reference to the first Epistle of John, are applicable likewise to his Gospel, that the "unruffled and heavenly repose" which pervades it "appears to be the tone, not so much of a father talking with his beloved children, as of a glorified saint speaking to mankind from a higher world. Never in any writing has the doctrine of heavenly Love, of a love working in stillness, a love ever unwearied, never exhausted, so thoroughly proved and approved itself, as in this Epistle."

Thus, at the same time, his writings are the simplest, and yet among the most difficult portions of the Word of God. The child can understand the simplicity of his diction, and comprehend the love which ever is welling up, as it were, from the fountain of his heart; while the theologian must confess, the deeper he searches into the meaning of the Apostle's writings, that there are mysterious depths in them which no plummet of man can ever sound. We refer not to the mysterious Revelation; but we speak as well of the Gospel. The person of the Lord Jesus appears in it surrounded even with greater mystery and glory than in the other gospels, and, as we read his discourses, we are forced to admit that they are indeed the utterances of "the Word made flesh," for "never man spake as this man." Bright with heavenly glory and wisdom as are all "the words of the Lord Jesus," we can almost fancy we are for a while treading the streets of the New Jerusalem, as we follow, in thought, the steps of the Saviour from the earthly Jerusalem to Mount Olivet, listen to that discourse which John records in chapters xv. and xvi., and hear the accents of that prayer, given in chapter xvii., which, as a cloud of incense, preceded the Saviour as He went into the Holy Place not made with hands, in heaven.

Such being the character of the writings of John, more especially of his gospel and epistles, a commentator on these portions of Scripture ought to possess peculiar qualifications. Scholastic criticism is of use in the case of all the biblical books; but, though needful at times, we almost feel as if it were out of place in a commentary on John's Gospel—at least, in one designed for general edification. The commentator ought to possess the spirit of love himself, and experimentally to know Jesus Christ. At the same time he requires a sober judgment, lest his fancy should lead him astray, and should constrain him rather to follow its dictates, than be guided by the mind and spirit of the beloved disciple.

Dr. Rudolph Besser, as far as we can judge, is a commentator who possesses these important qualifications, and withal writes very sweetly on the subject which he has chosen. He is a high Lutheran, and therefore holds very exalted notions about sacramental grace, at the same time that he possesses all Luther's clearness with regard to justification by faith only. When we noticed the first volume of the English edition, some time ago, we remarked that, while the translator had affixed a note to Dr. Besser's exposition of ch. vi. 51—71, to remind the reader that the author regards the sacrament of the Lord's Supper from the Lutheran point of view, she had not followed the same judicious plan in reference to Dr. Besser's remarks on ch. iii., in reference to baptism. In the second portion of Dr. Besser's Biblical Studies, published under the title of "Christ the Life of the World," the translator has wisely prefixed a preface, in which, while she states what are Dr. Besser's views, and what the reader, therefore, must be prepared to find in some parts of his exposition, she notwithstanding observes: "Even when the reader is conscious of a divergence in the author's views from those which he has himself been led to entertain, he will perhaps do well to pause before he throws by as utterly worthless what he cannot himself at once agree with, and either reflect whether what he reads should not suggest some modification of his own sentiments, or at least learn to reverence the piety which he sees co-existing with the holding of a somewhat different dogma."

Christ, the Life of the World: Biblical Studies on the Eleventh to the Twenty-first Chapters of St. John's Gospel. By RUDOLPH BESSER, D.D. Translated from the German, by M. G. HUXTABLE. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 1862.

With the last sentence of this remark we perfectly coincide, although we are by no means disposed to fall in with the sentiments which appear to be suggested by the first clauses. There are, we consider, but two logical doctrines tenable with respect to the sacraments. Either they do confer opere operato grace to all who partake of them, whether believers or unbelievers, or they are simply signs and pledges exhibiting to our view the great work of the Son and of the Spirit, and therefore are not efficacious without faith in the recipients, which enables them to grasp the great spiritual realities. There is no logical halting-place between Rome on the one hand, and Geneva on the other, on these questions. No doubt middle doctrines have been invented, and are capable of being invented, in almost any number, but such doctrines forcibly remind us of the saying of our Lord, that the new wine cannot be put into old leathern bottles, nor an unwrought piece of new cloth inserted in an old garment.

Though, however, we consider Dr. Besser's views on these points very defective, and cannot admire his narrowmindedness in some others, we are yet grateful to the fair translator for editing this commentary in English, while she abstains from "endorsing every sentiment of the original author." These volumes are really well deserving of a serious and devout perusal, and we doubt not that many who differ very widely from the author's sacramentalism, will yet derive much instruction and spiritual improvement from these works. Nor are we to forget that the sacramentalists of Germany, though agreeing in some points with the sacramentalists of England, are yet a widely different class from the latter. Rationalism in Germany has made many pious men cling with tenacity to all the dogmas of their Confession, and to imbibe with avidity the errors, as well as the great Evangelical truths so forcibly taught therein. But few, comparatively, of the theologians of this class possess anything of that longing desire for reunion with Rome, or with the so-called orthodox Churches of the East, which is so characteristic a feature of the English Tractarians—and we must bear in mind that they preach with earnestness the saving doctrines of faith, which the Tractarians, on the contrary, eschew.

A striking peculiarity of Dr. Besser's work is the number of extracts from Luther, and other eminent divines, which are interwoven throughout. Extracts generally are tedious; but of these extracts we can testify that, so far from tiring, they are so well introduced, and so applicable to the subject in hand, that they cannot fail of increasing an interest in the work.

Notwithstanding, too, our own dictum, that in general extracts are tedious, we are constrained to give one here from Dr. Besser, as the best mode of exhibiting the nature of these volumes. We will quote, on this occasion, from the later volume, "Christ the Life of the World," the remarks on ch. xi. 25—26:—

What thou art expecting as a future event, Martha, at the last day, encompasses thy brother and thyself at this very hour as a present condition. Only not alone the grave of the beloved one, but first of all me—me must thou contemplate—me by whom he is loved. I am the Resurrection and the Life!

Christ is the Resurrection because He is the Life. He has life originally in Himself; His essence is Life; in His victorious conflict with that Death which in our flesh He has power to taste for us (Heb. ii. 9.), Life shows itself as Resurrection. "The Living" (Luke xxiv. 5) the angel-youth calls Him in his Easter announcement. Not because He has risen is He the Living, but because He is the Living, therefore has He risen. It was impossible that He should be holden of Death, for the very reason that He is the Living. And what Christ is, this He imparts to His believers (ch. xiv. 19). "He is the Resurrection of the Dying and the Life of the Living." (Bengel.) Believers shall rise because they live. Lazarus had died, but he only slept; his friendship with Jesus—his faith—made him live: He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. Through faith in Him who is the Life, the Christian possesses an indefeasible life—a life which, even in the midst of dying, is not to be killed by death (ch. v. 24); and by virtue of faith in Him who is the Resurrection, even the mortal body of a Christian shall become glorified into the incorruptible Life which pertains to the body of the Resurrection.

For all His believers is this precious word of Christ intended. Just as His sleeping friend there in the grave, although—in the language of earth—he was dead, had nevertheless not fallen away from eternal life; so, in like manner, all who (like Martha and Mary) live the life which they now live in the flesh by the faith of the Son of God, shall never die, although they may be called dead: "And whoever liveth and—just therefore liveth because he—believeth in Me, shall never die." Through faith in Him who is the Life, our life in this mortal body is glorified into that life which shall never see death eternally (ch. viii. 51).

"Who shall be able to match together this that is said: Death is no death, but life. Moses says the contrary. For if thou dost hearken to the Law, it tells thee, as the old Christian song says, 'in the midst of life we are in death.' But this is only a law song; the Gospel and faith reverse the song, and sing, 'In the midst of death we are in life;' we praise Thee, blessed Lord God, our Redeemer, that thou hast awakened us out of death, and has saved us." (Luther.)

Though we are informed by the translator that Dr. Besser has "readily at command the fruits of all modern Biblical scholarship," we must caution the reader from expecting to find critical information on any passage in his interesting volumes. For example, in the narrative of the cure of the poor man at the pool of Bethesda, recorded only in John v., no one would surmise from Dr. Besser's comments that very great diversity of reading prevails with respect to verses 3, 4. Many eminent critics, as Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, omit part of verse 3 ("waiting for the moving of the water") and the entire of verse 4, which gives a very different complexion to the entire passage, for the supernatural influence of the angel being thereby excluded, the movement of the water, as alluded to by the sick man in verse 7, must then be viewed as occasioned by some purely natural cause. Who does not see that this omission, found in some of the very oldest Greek MSS., clears away much of the difficulty attendant on the passage, inasmuch as if the angelic interposition be admitted, the miracle stands alone of its kind in either the Old or New Testament, and is not alluded to by any Jewish tradition, as far as Lightfoot could discover? As to Dean Alford's view, that the disputed passage is spurious, probably a marginal gloss, explanatory of the popular belief of the Jews, and therefore, though spurious, "still useful," because "the man's answer implies the popular belief," we hardly think it is consistent with itself. If the descent of the angel be not mentioned by the Evangelist, there is no proof that the sick man viewed the troubling of the water as anything supernatural; and if the passage in dispute is so useful in explanation of a narrative viewed as otherwise dark, that fact goes far towards the proof of its genuineness. We are certainly not inclined to agree with Dr. Besser when he says of the Apostle John:—

His eye has become keen in its habitual contemplation of heavenly mysteries, and thus he is able generally, under the veil of outward elements, to recognise the personal powers of the invisible world. The same John who in the Revelation hears the words of "the angel of the waters," the angel that represents the golden host of ministering spirits who stand ready at the Almighty God's command, either to bestow or to withhold the blessings of the fourth petition in the Lord's prayer—this same John is he also who here in his Gospel describes, as if his opened eyes had seen it, the coming down of one of these "angels of the waters" into the Pool of Bethesda, for the healing troubling of its waters, for which the sick people were waiting in the five porches which surround it. Many among them, no doubt, attributed this healing property of the water merely to a so-called power of nature, as, for example, to a subterraneous fire, that caused the bubbling in the pool; but St. John knows that that sub-terrene movement was under the guardianship and blessed hand of super-terrestrial angel-powers. If we had St. John's eyes, we should no doubt be aware, even at the present day, of this and of that salubrious spring opened by blessed angels, who rejoice in being employed by their Lord to tend upon the sick. Yes, instead of reading such a passage as this with surprise, it would cause us heartily and joyfully to sing (comp. Psalm xxxv. 5; xci. 11, 12):—

"Thus even now from plague and ill
Deth God protect His converts still;
Bless'd angel-powers He still doth send,
Watchers, to guard and to defend."

All students of the Greek Testament are aware of the fact that the narrative of Jesus and the adulteress in John viii. 1—11 labours under very grave suspicions with respect to its genuineness. Dr. Besser's remarks on this point, however, are not without some weight. He says: "In most of the old manuscripts this most comfortable narrative is altogether omitted, whilst in some it is inserted after Luke xxi. There is some probability in the notion that it was received by verbal tradition from the apostles, and was inserted in the Holy Scriptures as a later edition [addition?]; if such be the case, whoever assigned it a place in our Gospel, in preference to the other three, must have had a delicate discernment; for in it our Lord's glory is brightly revealed, the glory of One who came into the world not to condemn, but to save, the glory which shines forth again in the discourses contained in chapter viii., which immediately follow upon this narrative ('Ye judge after the flesh, I judge no man; and yet, if I judge, my judgment is true')."

Dean Alford's hypothesis, which is not very different, though admittedly "a desperate resource," may be nearer the truth—namely, "That the Evangelist may have, in this solitary case, incorporated a portion of the current oral tradition into his narrative: that this portion may have been afterwards variously corrected, from the Gospel of the Hebrews, or other traditional sources: that being seen in early times to be alien from John's diction, it may have been by some replaced in the synoptic narrative, in its apparent chronological place, at Luke xxi. fin.: or inserted variously in this Gospel from the mere fact of having dropped out here."

The able exposition of Lightfoot tends much, in our judgment, in favour of the apostolic authority of the narrative, and as Dean Alford has not noticed it, and Dr. Besser has passed by some of the finer lights and shadows of the passage by not regarding it; and further, since the explanation has not found its way generally into our popular commentaries, we will reproduce it here in as brief a space as possible.

The woman was accused as an adulteress, under which designation the Jews comprehended not only an unchaste woman who was actually married, but also one who was only betrothed. Our Lord proceeds to try the case in strict accordance with "the law of jealousy" as laid down in Numbers v. The tradition of the Jews with regard to this proceeding was that the woman who drank of the bitter water would die in the manner described in that chapter, and likewise her paramour at the same time and in the same way, if her husband was himself innocent of the like offence. But if he was guilty of the same sin, then "the bitter water" would take no effect on her. Our Lord seems to have applied the same test in this instance. You Pharisees, he would seem to say, have accused this woman of a deadly sin—according to your law, you say she ought to be stoned. But the custom of your nation in another case where the crime is only suspected, is to try the case by means of the bitter water, and if the woman only be guilty and the accusers innocent, then judgment in full must pass upon her. But if the accusers as well as accused be guilty of the same sin, I, as a judge, will be absolved from all blame if I condemn her not. Whosoever, therefore, of you that is without sin let him cast the first stone at her.

In the trial by means of the bitter water, the priest used to bend himself down (Num. v. 17) and gather up some of the dust off the pavement of the sanctuary and put it in the water which the woman was to drink. He was also to write in a book the curses pronounced against the woman if guilty, and then to blot them out with the bitter water. This was done because the truth of the accusation was a matter of doubt; the curses, therefore, were written to testify against the woman if she were guilty, and were blotted out that they might not testify against her if she were innocent.

Christ, therefore, according to custom, bent down towards the ground, and wrote in the dust, as His book, most probably the sins of which the accusers of the wretched woman were themselves guilty. He did not blot out that writing; for He was certain, and in no wise in doubt, of the things which He wrote on the ground. He therefore wrote and wrote again. Not until after these curses were written was the woman, tried by the law of jealousy, to drink of the bitter water; but when Christ had lifted Himself up, the accusers were gone. "Once," writes Bengel, in his immortal "Gnomon," "God, in the Old Testament, wrote the Decalogue: once, in the New Testament, Christ wrote. . . . This action may be easily interpreted, from the following words, that the Lord meant this: Moses wrote the Law, I can also write—nay, the Law of Moses is my writing. You scribes write judgments against others; and I can write against you—v. 26. Your sins are written in your hearts, and your names in the earth—Jer. xvii. 1, 13 (what if He wrote down the names of the accusers?). This, my writing, you do not now understand; but, in time to come, what I have written shall be displayed to the whole world, when the Books shall be opened, and all your crimes shall be laid bare."

Very beautifully does Luther, as quoted by Besser, writing of the difference between the standing of men in presence of an earthly judge and before the judge of all, say: "In Christ's spiritual kingdom it is not so. When thou comest there, thou wilt be as I, and I as thou, although before the world we are not equal. Then, if I am an adulterer, a thief, &c., and thou art not, it does not signify; for I find in myself far higher, greater stumbling-blocks, and therefore I am in such fright that I know not what will become of me; for in Christ's kingdom it is thus: He that is without sin, let him cast the first stone. Therefore, dear friends, spare, let the stone lie, neither will I take up one; let it lie, and without throwing at one another, let the stone fall, and say, 'Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.'"

We pause here, and very warmly recommend the perusal of both of these volumes, exhorting our readers, at the same time that they admire the unction and spirit of love in which Dr. Besser generally writes, to "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."

WEAK CRITICISMS ADDUCED IN SUPPORT OF TRUTH.

If it be true, as Hengstenberg asserts, that those views which may be popularly designated as Essayistic tend directly to the gulf of Atheism, it is surprising that the defenders of the faith in the present crisis should have occupied themselves so generally with questions of detail, instead of fully discussing the truth or falsehood of the principles which underlie the present controversy.

It is generally a sign of a bad cause, or, as in this instance, of bad defenders of a good cause, when arguments of all sorts are made use of without respect to their proper weight and suitableness to the subject in debate. In the great theological discussion now being carried on in this country both sides are guilty in this matter, though, as was perhaps natural from the suddenness and unexpected character of the assault made by the Essayists, the party opposed to them were more disposed to avail themselves, in their fury, of such weapons as came most readily to hand. They who planned the attack might have been expected to make all the necessary dispositions to avoid presenting a weak front to the assailed, while those who merely stood on the defensive were more likely, especially in the beginning, to neglect the right way of repelling the assault.

Instead of the writers who attempted to reply to "Essays and Reviews" carefully avoiding, as they ought to have done, such arguments as are sure to recoil upon those who use them, many weak arguments have been put forward in support of orthodox views. Thus, for instance, Dr. Williams, in his review of Bunsen's "Biblical Researches," says: "The famous Shiloh (Gen. xlix. 10) is taken [sc. by Bunsen] in its local sense, as the sanctuary where the young Samuel was trained; which, if doctrinal perversions did not interfere, hardly any one would doubt it to be the true sense." In opposition to this statement the Rev. H. J. Rose, in the "Replies to Essays and Reviews," asserts: "The words as translated in our version are: 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come.' And such has been the translation from the earliest days till within a comparatively modern period, when the last clause has been rendered by some Hebrew scholars, 'until he come to Shiloh.'" This assertion is slightly modified a few sentences later, where he says: "It was almost universally translated, 'until Shiloh come,' although some understand by Shiloh, 'He to whom it belongs,' and others understood 'rest,' or 'peace,' as a name of the Messiah."

Now we do not think this is a fair statement of the opinions of the ancient translators. Mr. Rose is quite correct in saying that no ancient version coincides with the rendering proposed by many in modern times "until he come to Shiloh." The Targums of Onkelos, and of the Pseudo-Jonathan, and that one designated as "the Jerusalem Targum," the Vulg., Syr., and Arab, with Symmachus, all plainly understand the passage of the Messiah. But the translation of the LXX. is: ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ, καὶ αὐτὸς προσδοκία ἔσθαι: "until the things reserved for him come; and he [scil. Judah] is the expectation of nations" (comp. Gen. xvii. 6). This rendering does not seem to imply that the translators adopted the Messianic interpretation of the passage (though it is not absolutely incompatible with that opinion), for Judah was the recognised head of the tribes (comp. 1 Chron. v. 2), although neither Moses or Joshua, or any very noted individual among the judges of Israel, were of that tribe.

The utmost accuracy in a matter of this kind is, we think, required in these days in a defence of the truth.

But though we think Mr. Rose has not been accurate in his statement, what are we to think of the above-quoted passage from Dr. Williams' essay? Unless "doctrinal perversions" interfered, hardly any one would, in his opinion, hesitate to adopt his translation of the passage. We would ask him candidly to tell us whether he would not be one of the first to apply even this passage in a Messianic sense, if it could thus possibly be reckoned as "a failure of a prophecy," with those instances cited by his friend Professor Jowett, and replied to by Dr. McCaul in the "Aids to Faith" (p. 105, &c.)?

No doubt the passage is not so clearly Messianic as to convince those who set out with the determination to deny the predictive element in prophecy.

A recent writer who, we understand, is no favourer of the Essayist school, but who desires to see solid arguments, and not vituperation, made use of against the Essayists and Reviewers, while condemning weak criticism in others, falls himself under the same condemnation. We refer to the gentleman who writes under the signature of "Clericus" in the April number of the Journal of Sacred Literature. Speaking of the old interpretation of Gen. xlix. 10, he says: "We venture to pronounce [that interpretation] equally opposed to Hebrew syntax and to the context of the passage." (The italics are our own.)

We waive altogether the question with regard to the context of the passage, for on that point "Clericus" might take one view, and we another, without any chance of our ever arriving at agreement. But the question of Hebrew syntax is simple. Why it should be opposed to Hebrew syntax to take שִׁילֹה, Shiloh, as the nominative to יָבֵא, "shall come," in the sentence שֶׁדָּרְבִּיבֶלֶת שִׁילֹה, when in 2 Samuel xxiii. 10, in the phrase דָּרְבִּיבֶלֶת יָדָיו, "until his hand was tired," it is clear that יָדָיו, "his hand," is nominative case to the verb "was tired," we cannot divine. The nominative in Hebrew is frequently put after the verb, and numerous are the instances of this even in Genesis xlix., and this is, we must note, the usual arrangement after יָבֵא (see Gesenius's Hebrew Grammar § 142, 1 a). We never could have imagined that such an assertion as that by "Clericus" would have been made, though we have frequently seen it denied on the other side that the passage in question can grammatically be translated "until he comes to Shiloh," which is just as untrue a statement, for the same phrase occurs in 1 Samuel iv. 12, "and there ran a man of Benjamin from the battle, and came to Shiloh (וַיָּבֵא שִׁילֹה) on the same day."

Thus, too, with respect to another passage, Psalm ii. 12, Dr. Williams' rendering "worship purely," instead of "kiss the Son," has repeatedly, in the present controversy, been attacked, as according to some exhibiting Dr. Williams' unacquaintance with Hebrew; or, according to others, as if it were a mere "cavil" revived again. The Rev. Henry Craik, author of "The Hebrew Language, its History and Characteristics," published early last year a pamphlet entitled "A Brief Reply to Certain Misrepresentations contained in 'Essays and Reviews,'" which was altogether devoted to an examination of this one passage. In that tractate he asserted that "the translation, 'kiss the Son,' is supported by the current authority of all the most distinguished Hebrew scholars, from the time of Buxtorf down to the present day." And after citing several of these he goes on to say: "It is in all cases difficult to prove, respecting any proposed rendering of a passage of Scripture, that it never was maintained as the correct one by any critic, in any age or country; but I have said enough to show that the all but universal decision of scholars runs counter to the representation of the learned Professor, and I am not aware that any critic has ever attempted to prove that which Dr. Williams refers to as if it were a point quite acknowledged by all acquainted with Hebrew idiom."

As was stated in the note appended to the article on "Faith and its Aids" (on p. 176), the rendering, "kiss the Son," has the Syriac alone, among the ancient versions, in its favour. If the point were so clear as Mr. Craik has asserted, this would not be the case. Dr. Williams' version is substantially the same as the καταφιλήσατε ἐκλεκτῶς, of Aquila, and the προσκυνήσατε πατρὶ, of Symmachus. Ewald renders it nehmt rath an, "receive advice," following the LXX. ἐράξασθε παιδείας, Targ. תְּקַבְּלוּ מִלְּפָנֶיךָ וְהָיָה לְכִסֵּף וְלִפְדֵּי וְלִפְדֵּי וְלִפְדֵּי Vulg. apprehendite disciplinam, and the Arabic. The objections to the ordinary rendering may briefly be stated: 1. בֶּר (bar), in the sense of son, is not found in Hebrew, except in Prov. xxxi. 2. It is a Chaldee word, and in the passage in Proverbs it occurs with decided Chaldaisms, as מלכין. But the second Psalm belongs to the time of pure Hebrew. In v. 7 the regular Hebrew word for son is used, בן, my Son. It is unsatisfactory with some to account for the change here to another word, on the supposition that it was to avoid the cacophony of בן, lest, following בן, for the Psalmist would have used it in that case with the article, וברן, "the Son," or with a suffix, as in v. 7, בְּנִי, my Son. 2. If בר was used in the sense of son, it ought to have either the article, or a suffix, or be followed by a genitive. Hengstenberg's reply to this objection, that the word is here used in a sort of transition to being used as a proper name, requires no refutation. Nowhere in the Scriptures is the term "son" unaccompanied by the article, a qualifying pronoun, or noun in the genitive (as "Son of man," "Son of God"), used with reference to Christ.

No doubt there are objections which may likewise be urged against the rendering of Dr. Williams, and also against that of Ewald, which tend to confirm Hupfeld's conjecture, that the text is corrupt, and that we ought probably to read בר instead of בִּר. But, as the text stands at present, scholars like Hupfeld and Olshausen lean favourably towards the rendering "worship purely," which Mr. Craik has regarded as abandoned by all modern critics up to Dr. Williams.

But what is gained or lost by the discussion of the passage? To critics it is a matter of interest, and seems likely ever to remain a matter of dispute. But the Messianic exposition of the second Psalm is quite unaffected by any conclusion reached on the subject, and the clause is never referred to in the New Testament. Far better would it have been, for argument's sake, to admit the new translation, and to ask why Dr. Williams should have cited such a rendering, as if its admission overthrew the Messianic reference of the Psalm which was held by the New Testament writers, when it was quite beside the point for which it was designed to form an auxiliary proof.

One favourite argument of the Rationalistic party against the genuineness of the Book of Daniel is, that Greek names of musical instruments are found there, such as, for instance, those cited by Dr. Williams, "symphonia and psalterion." In their eyes this assists in fixing the date of that book as late as the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. On the other hand, as such a use has been made of the Greek origin of these words, orthodox writers are generally inclined to assert, on the contrary, that however much these words may resemble Greek, they are really of Shemitic origin.

Mr. Rose seems inclined to coincide in this point with his party; for although he does not discuss it himself, he maintains it is "not capable of any satisfactory proof," and refers to Hävernick and Hengstenberg, by consulting which writers the inquirer may "see with how little reason this argument has been alleged. Modern philology, upon the whole, has rather tended to remove this objection than to confirm it."

We shall see. The Chaldee word סַפְפִּינָה (the bagpipes) is found in Daniel iii. 5, 10, 15, and is rendered by Theodotion in v. 15 by the Greek συμφωνία (and so also in vv. 5, 10, according to the Alex. MS., but the word is omitted altogether in the Vatican) and by the LXX. in vv. 5 and 15 by the same Greek word (also in v. 10, according to the Alex. MS., but it is omitted in the ordinary text). The Vulgate has symphonia in all the verses. In Polybius, among the Greek, and in several of the later Latin writers, the word is used as an instrument of music. Than the Chald. כִּיפְּוֹנָא (sūmpon'gā), there could not possibly be a better transliteration of the Greek συμφωνία. In v. 10 a form, סִיפְּוֹנָא (sīpōn'gā), or, perhaps more correctly, סִיפְּוֹנָא (sippōn'gā), is found, formed by the rejection or assimilation of the כ, corresponding to the word used in the Syriac, ܣܝܦܘܢܐ (tseppūnyō), which is just such a form of the Greek as we might expect to find in Syriac; for Hengstenberg's remark, "that the Syriac word is derived from the Greek is no probable supposition," has no weight when we consider for a moment how the earliest Syriac abounds in words derived from the Greek.

The second word, פִּסְתֵּרִין (or פִּסְתֵּרִין), the psaltery, occurs in Dan. iii. 7, and in all the other passages before referred to. It is uniformly rendered by the LXX. and Theod. ψαλτήριον, and by the Vulgate also psalterium. With respect to its connexion with the Greek, it must be noted (1) that in Doric the ν often appears for the λ—e.g., βεντίων, βέντιστος, for βελτίων, βέλτιστος, and φίντερος, φίντατος, for φίλτερος, φίλτατος; and (2) that the termination ִין is not a plural ending, but the mode of writing the Greek ιον—e.g., συνέδριον, פִּסְתֵּרִין; ὑποπόδιον, חֲפִצִּין; κοινόβιον, כֹּוֹבִין (vide Ges. Thes., p. 1,116). When these things are considered, it is hardly possible to resist the conviction that the word is not of Shemitic origin; and we must regard such derivations as that of כִּיפְּוֹנָא from כָּף (a reed), and פִּסְתֵּרִין from פֶּסֶק (the hand—rather the extremity), and נָר (to spring, as a locust), although advocated by respectable scholars, as derivations that would never be defended for a moment apart from theological prepossessions.

But because we maintain that these and other words of the same kind must undoubtedly be referred to a Greek origin, are we prepared to deny the genuineness of the book of Daniel? Far from it; but we are of opinion that the authority of that book is seriously weakened by the common use of such criticism as the above, on the part of its defenders. We have formerly alluded to what we believe the right mode of defence. Even before the time of Daniel communications may have taken place between Greece and Babylon. Long before that era Greek colonies had been founded on the coast of Asia Minor, and there is nothing so improbable in the idea that the Greek names passed over along with the musical instruments to the Babylonians. The silence of history on the point proves nothing, as the information it gives us of these early times is by no means copious. We may be on the eve of great discoveries, which may clear up many of these points; let us watch and see. Meanwhile, let us be candid, well assured that candour, so far from injuring, will really serve the cause of truth; and weak arguments and indefensible criticisms, so far from protecting, do serious injury to the truth which they are intended to defend.

POSTSCRIPT.

SINCE the above was put in type, we have received the subjoined letter from Dr. Tregelles, which we willingly lay before our readers:—

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Sirs,—In the article "Faith and its Aids," in Evangelical Christendom for this month, I was sorry to see (p. 176) remarks on the rendering of Psalm ii. 12, which I believe not only to be incorrect, but also misleading. Dr. Rowland Williams put the matter thus: "If he [i.e. Bunsen] would follow our version in rendering the second Psalm 'kiss the Son,' he knows that Hebrew idiom convinced even Jerome the true meaning was "worship purely." The article in Evangelical Christendom says of Dr. M'Caul's remarks on this: "We wish he had not been quite so dogmatic in his assertions as to a knowledge of the Hebrew text necessarily enabling its possessor to reject such 'cavils' as the rendering of Psalm ii. 12 'worship purely,' instead of 'kiss the Son.' We adhere to the authorised version; but candour compels us to admit that the Hebrew does not exclude the other rendering; that it possesses very considerable claims from the context, and from authority, to be admitted as the proper rendering; while at the same time to allow so much does not in the least impugn the Messianic character of the Psalm."

How inaccurate this admission is, and how needless, I shall show presently; but the footnote carries the objections to the common version further, for it says: [Our readers can refer to the footnote in question in our last number, which is substantially reproduced in the foregoing article.]

It certainly seems to me that the argument of the footnote, if valid, would seek to prove that the expression above, "we adhere to the authorised version," would be the conclusion at which it was not to be expected that the writer of the review could have arrived; for the gist of the note seems to be that this cannot be the meaning. But the statements require examination. "Only the Syriac in its favour," must mean "only" amongst the ancient versions, not "only" amongst other authorities. And is it not remarkable that in separately citing "The Seventy," and then "the Arabic and the Vulgate all render," he has multiplied one witness into three?—for the Vulgate of the Psalms, and also the Arabic, are only secondary versions from the Greek. Thus the supposed weight of authority, which was presented as overwhelming, is reduced to the LXX. and the late Targum.

Allow me to refer the writer of the review to the statements of a true Hebrew scholar on this subject, who establishes that rendering to which he states that he "adheres." Mr. Craik not only does this, but he shows that the rendering maintained by Dr. R. Williams is one which the Hebrew text does exclude.

In his "Brief Reply to Certain Misrepresentations contained in 'Essays and Reviews,'" Mr. Henry Craik says, with equal force and truth: "The translation kiss the Son is supported by the current authority of nearly all the most distinguished Hebrew scholars, from Buxtorf to Gesenius. If Dr. Williams does not know this he is culpably ignorant of that with which, as a Professor of Hebrew, he ought to be familiar. If he does know that in the judgment of those best qualified to decide such matters, the Hebrew idiom does not require the translation he proposes, then a graver charge even than that of ignorance must be laid against him."—(P. 8.)

Then, after giving quotations from Gesenius and Maurer, Mr. Craik thus continues:—

"It would be no difficult task to call witness upon witness to confirm, if that were necessary, the authority of the two whose evidence has just been adduced. I could produce testimonies from scholars—Jewish and Christian, German and English, ancient and modern—all agreeing in maintaining the accuracy of the rendering, which, on the authority of the late Baron Bunsen and his disciple, Dr. Williams, we are called upon to reject. For the full satisfaction of my readers, I refer to the following distinguished names: Aben Ezra, Kimchi, Buxtorf, Pfeiffer, Venema, Doederlein, Drusius, Michaelis, Clericus, Rosenmuller, De Wette, Winer, Hitzig, Hengstenberg, Fürst, and Lee—all agree in supporting that translation of the words which Dr. Williams so recklessly and contemptuously rejects. I am at a loss to know by what authorities Dr. Williams is prepared to support his mode of rendering the passage. The versions of Symmachus and Aquila, in such a case, are of no weight at all against the mass of first-rate critical authorities. We know enough of the latter to warrant us in regarding him as a most incompetent translator. . . .

"But I am ready to go further. I maintain that the rendering 'worship purely' is inconsistent with the meaning of the Hebrew words, and contrary to the idiom of the language. The verb לשׁקט without an object after it is incapable of being rendered by the English verb 'to worship;' and the term בָּר is never, in the whole Hebrew Scriptures, used adverbially in the sense of 'purely.' In Isaiah i. 26, that which in the English version is rendered 'purely' reads in the Hebrew כָּבֵר, 'according to pureness.' The adverb is not found elsewhere in the authorised version of the Old Testament."

To Mr. Craik's remarks I may add that I ask in vain for a defence of such a rendering of the Hebrew words as "receive instruction." Where is anything like either of them to be found in such a sense? Why then should English readers of the Word of God be mystified with the incorrect statements of the footnote?

Mr. Craik thoroughly disposes of the alleged authority of Jerome, who uses both renderings, "worship the Son," and "worship purely." As to the supposed grammatical difficulties, I cannot do better than refer the writer of the footnote to De Wette, who disposes of them in a simple note.

Inquirers, whether possessed of Hebrew scholarship or not, will learn in the complete and conclusive statements of Mr. Craik's pamphlet how truly that excellent Hebrew scholar, Dr. M'Caul, has said that a knowledge of the Hebrew text enables its possessors to reject such "cavils" as "worship purely," instead of "kiss the Son."

For thirty years and more I have habitually read and studied the Old Testament in Hebrew; and thus I can state distinctly that in citing from Mr. Craik I do not quote statements on a subject with which I am unacquainted, nor assertions the accuracy of which I do not test myself.

The importance of the subject is a sufficient excuse (if any be needed) for drawing public attention to the erroneousness of certain remarks.—I remain, yours very truly,

April 17, 1862.

Dr. Tregelles, our readers will perceive, has not attempted to deny that the evidence of the ancient versions is, with the exception of the Syriac, against the rendering of our authorised version, but he endeavours to weaken their authority. We simply remark, in reply, that though the Vulgate of the Psalms and the Arabic are secondary versions, they are of some importance, as they by no means adhere always to the rendering of the LXX. Even on Dr. Tregelles' own admission, we have four independent ancient versions—viz., the LXX., Aquila, Symmachus, and the Targum, on the one side, against the Syriac on the other.*

Dr. Tregelles ought not to have said that we "presented this weight of authority as overwhelming." We did nothing of the kind. We expressly intimated that we did not consider it "overwhelming," since we adhered notwithstanding to the authorised version. We did, in common justice to Dr. Williams, who is notoriously an eminent Hebraist, feel it right to show that there are "several weighty objections to the ordinary translation." Dr. Tregelles may think, if he pleases, that our arguments are stronger than we ourselves thought them; but we respectfully submit that he has entirely failed in supporting, in a single instance, the charge of "inaccuracy" or of "incorrect statements" which he brings against us. Our purpose simply was to show that, so far from its being a mere "cavil," which every Hebrew scholar would reject, to question the rendering of our authorised version, it has been questioned by eminent scholars like Ewald, Hupfeld, Olshausen, Koester, Dietrich, and others.

Ewald defends his translation (see above) by considering that לָאֵלֹהִים (the pure or sincere) is a poetical expression for counsel, sincere admonition, Arabic نصيحة. לָאֵלֹהִים expresses properly a cleaving to or attaching oneself to another (hence kissing); and consequently in a new active sense (in Piel.) it may well signify laying hold of, seizing, availing oneself of.

As to Mr. Craik's argument from Isaiah i. 25, it is quite irrelevant, because $\bar{\text{בָּר}}$ (bar) is not found there, but בֹּר (bör). Adjectives in the masculine are sometimes used adverbially (though the feminine is the more common form), and $\bar{\text{בָּר}}$ therefore can be taken in an adverbial sense "purely." The masculine is sometimes used as well as the feminine in a neuter sense, and therefore $\bar{\text{בָּר}}$ can also mean what is pure, which is the mode in which Ewald would understand it. We need not cite examples of these usages, as they will be admitted by Hebrew scholars.

* As bar, not ben, is the word for son in Syriac, the Syriac translator might easily have overlooked the absence of the article, while rendering the word in question definitely "The Son."

The verb נָשַׁק does not always mean to kiss, but is used also of drawing bows, and of arranging oneself, and there is no impossibility of its being used in its original signification, of joining together (Arab. نَسَب), hence cleaving to; or in a signification derived from that of kissing as that of worshipping in the passage in question.

The difficulty of those that adopt the rendering of the authorised version lies in the word בָּר , and in the mode of its construction; the difficulty of the opposers of that rendering lies unquestionably in the usage of the verb. Both renderings are possible to be extracted from the Hebrew words, although Dr. M'Caul may choose, on the one side, to call adverse criticism mere cavilling, and the great scholar Hupfeld may, on the other side, pronounce the rendering "kiss the Son" an impossibility. His conjecture (mentioned above) as to the reading of the text renders all things easy, and does not necessitate the giving the passage a different interpretation from that ordinarily assigned to it.

Yet, as the matter is so disputed, we prefer to leave the rendering of our authorised version undisturbed, though we have strong doubts of its correctness; and we decidedly object, on the one hand, to the attack made on Dr. Williams for his rendering of the passage, and on the other to the use he appears to make of his translation; as if, were it to be adopted, the second Psalm would thereby lose its Messianic reference, than which nothing can be more unfair.

Dr. Tregelles seems to vouch Mr. Craik as an "overwhelming" authority. Our readers will easily perceive from our article, which was written before we received the letter of Dr. Tregelles, that we do not entertain a similar opinion. His weight as a philologist may be guessed from the fact that he holds to the opinion that Hebrew was the language of Adam, which has long since been exploded by all scientific scholars. And we submit that on this very topic of "kiss the Son" we have clearly shown both Mr. Craik's inaccuracy of statement and his want of acquaintance with the state of criticism on the passage.

In conclusion, let us not be wanting in candour on the side of truth, if the adversaries of the truth should fail in it. Let no dogmatical statements on the side of the assailants make us have recourse to counter-dogmatism ourselves.

READING AND REALISING.—If with a true and living faith we seek to bring home to our hearts the great features of the evangelical history—to journey with our Master over the lonely mountains of Galilee; to sit with Him beside the deep waters of the lake of Genesareth; to follow His footsteps into remote and half Pagan lands; or to hang on His lips, in the courts of His Father's house—we shall not seek in vain. The history of the gospels will be more and more to us a living history; our Divine Image ever waxing clearer and brighter—shedding its light on lonely hours, coming up before us in solitary walks, ever fresher, ever dearer—until at length all things will seem so close, so near, so true, that our faith in Jesus, and Him crucified, will be such as no sophistry can weaken, no doubtfulness becloud.—Ellicott's Life of Christ.

FRANCE.

—, France, April, 1862.

THE ROMAN COURT AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

The Roman question is indeed a delicate and interminable affair! The Marquis de Lavalette, French Ambassador at Rome, has, within these few weeks, appeared at Paris. Every one knows that our ambassador does not live on very friendly terms with the Count de Goyon, the Commander-in-Chief of the French troops; and it was natural to conclude that M. de Lavalette would endeavour to replace his antagonist by another general, less submissive to the inspirations of the Papacy. "Cedant arma toga" was a wise maxim of the Romans, which holds good for all time. But no similar measure has, to this moment, been adopted; and M. de Goyon retains his military command. There are, in the Court of the Tuileries, and in intimate relationship with Napoleon III., certain mysterious influences which prevent the adoption of decisive resolutions. In vain do M. Fould, M. Thouvenel, and other Ministers of State, demand that, in one way or another, this question shall be definitively settled. The Emperor persists in making use of both the two contending parties, possibly awaiting the time when the death of Pius IX., or some other providential event, shall open to him a path of retreat from his present false position.

GREAT SCANDAL COMMITTED BY THE ARCH-BISHOP OF TOULOUSE, IN ORDERING THE CELEBRATION OF A HORRIBLE JUBILEE.

Another matter, within the last three weeks, has greatly agitated France. Your readers have seen the particulars of it in the English press; but I will deal with the question in its religious aspect; and point out the impressions of the French Protestants respecting it.

M. Julien-Florian-Felix Desprez, Archbishop of Toulouse, Primate of Narbonnese Gaul, Prelate Assistant to the Pontifical

Throne, &c. (you perceive that his titles are numerous and brilliant)—M. Desprez suddenly published an ordinance directing the celebration of "the jubilee commemorative of a glorious fact, accomplished three centuries ago. . . . The Lord," adds the Archbishop, "stretched forth His powerful protecting arm over that Church of Toulouse, defended at once by the courage of its children, and by the prayers of its guardians sleeping in death [the bones of the saints]. A general procession was instituted to transmit to future generations the remembrance of a vow made under these circumstances by the capitoul [chief municipal officers] of Toulouse."

The Archbishop then relates that this procession took place in 1562, in 1662, and in 1762, with extraordinary solemnity, under the sanction of the pontifical bulls of Pius IV. and Clement XIII., which granted plenary indulgences or absolution to all who should participate in this festival. Consequently, M. Desprez prescribed the celebration of the same jubilee from the 16th to the 23rd of May of the present year.

On reading this pastoral letter every one inquired what was this glorious fact—this evidence of the Divine benediction—which, after an interval of three centuries, excited, in so lively a manner, the gratitude of both the Archbishop and his clergy and of lay devotees. I have no need to state what was the reply to this question. France, England, and all Europe, know that the secular jubilee of Toulouse was instituted in memory of a horrible massacre perpetrated during our old religious wars.

In the middle of the sixteenth century the number of the Calvinists in this large city of the South was very considerable. Some historians assure us that it contained at least 20,000 disciples of the Reformation. These were the most enlightened men of the city. Magistrates, functionaries of high rank, professors of the university, had embraced the doctrine of the pure Gospel.

The priests and monks, exasperated to the last degree by these defections, stirred up the populace and the peasantry of the vicinity against the Calvinists. The latter contended for six days with their enemies. At length they concluded a capitulation, according to which they laid down their arms, on condition that their lives should be respected. But, according to the maxim generally admitted at this time amongst the Romanists, that it was not obligatory to keep faith with heretics, immediately that the Protestants were without arms the fanatical peasants fell upon them, and slaughtered them without pity, to the number of 3,500 or 4,000.

Well, then, this is the glorious fact, the celebration of which by a secular jubilee has been enjoined by the Archbishop of Toulouse! The St. Bartholomew's Day of Southern France has been deemed worthy of solemn thanksgivings by this prelate! Could you have imagined that in our age—in our France—seventy-two years after the revolution of 1789—when our public opinion and our laws have established the mutual toleration of religious communions—there would be found a bishop so insensate, or so fanatical, as to organise an extraordinary procession in honour of four thousand assassinations!

The impression produced at Toulouse by this pastoral letter was profound. Our friends in that city state that the Roman Catholics of every social position—officers of the army, members of the magistracy, merchants and bankers—hastened to assure the Protestants of the indignation with which the unjustifiable conduct of the prelate had inspired them. Never had Protestantism obtained at Toulouse so many marks of sympathy. The emotion was the same at Paris, immediately that the mandate of the Archbishop was known. All the journals, both of the Liberal opposition and of the Government, agreed in blaming, in the very strongest terms, this deplorable outrage on public opinion. Hardly did two or three organs of the Jesuitical faction dare to make a timid apology on behalf of the prelate. It became evident that, should the celebration take place publicly, it would provoke serious disturbances, and perhaps a new effusion of blood. The Moniteur accordingly published an official note, containing these words: "The Government has decided that all processions, or outward ceremonies, relative to the celebration of the jubilee, shall be prohibited."

This is a satisfaction accorded to public opinion. You will observe, however, that the prohibition concerns only outward ceremonies. It is probable that in the interior of their churches the priests will yet persist in thanking God for the murder of 4,000 Protestants.

The Archbishop of Toulouse has sent to the journals an explanatory letter, in which he states that the object of the jubilee is not to glorify the excesses committed in religious conflicts, but to bless God for having granted to the Roman Catholics a victory which has preserved the holy city of Toulouse from becoming a kind of French Geneva. He says also that he had no right to deprive his people of the special favours attached to the celebration of this secular jubilee. He pretends to be tenderly united in heart to his Dissenting brethren. These are the prelate's own expressions. This tardy attempt at justification is very weak. The Archbishop of Toulouse ought to have known, beforehand, that the common people do not make such subtle distinctions; and that it was extremely imprudent, and even criminal, to revive, in the midst of the exorbitant inhabitants of our Southern provinces, the most dreadful and odious recollections of the past.

PASTORAL LETTERS OF THE BISHOPS.

I have before me other episcopal mandates, which have been circulated in the various dioceses during Lent. Several bishops, amongst others the Bishop of Arras, have taken advantage of this opportunity to stimulate the liberality of the devout on behalf of the "Peter's Pence." It seems that the donations to this fund are becoming rare, and that the returns are but scanty. This falling off will astonish no one. In the first place, there are many Romanists who love better to declaim against revolutionists and impious persons than to un-loose their own purse-strings; they are prompt in word, and slow in deeds. Then, the purpose to which the Peter's penny is applied is not adapted to encourage the liberality of the faithful. Is it agreeable to give one's money to pay bands of brigands to desolate the kingdom of Naples, or to minister to the luxurious pomp of the Roman cardinals? According to all appearance, the Peter's penny will soon be struck with utter barrenness, and the verbose rhetoric of the prelates will not avail to restore to it its original fecundity.

Other bishops announce to their flocks their intention of shortly visiting Rome. This is, for them, an affair of honour not less than of religion. They regard themselves as obliged to respond to the appeal of their Sovereign Pontiff, in taking part at the council which has been convoked under pretence of canonizing certain martyrs of Japan. The Government is thus placed in a position of great embarrassment. It has essayed to hinder the bishops from making the journey to Rome, and this it really has a right to do, according to the articles of the Concordat signed between Napoleon I. and Pius VII. But you know that proverbial saying, Summum jus, summa injuria. If the political authorities were to resort to physical force to compel the prelates to remain in their dioceses, that would be true persecution, and the bishops would be applauded as martyrs. It is most likely that the counsellors of Napoleon III. will follow a middle course in this affair. They will use their moral influence to persuade the most moderate of these high dignitaries not to go to Rome, and will permit the more ardent to do as they please. Well-informed persons estimate that about thirty-six French bishops will repair to the Pontifical city. Cardinal Morlot, Archbishop of Paris, and Grand-Almoner of the Emperor, must also go to Rome, but with the view of accomplishing a special mission. He is charged to ascertain the state of feeling in the conclave, in order to furnish the Government with precise information on the results which would be produced by the death of the reigning Pope.

Finally, certain bishops have filled their pastoral letters with violent diatribes against the opinions and the institutions of our times. I will quote, in particular, the mandate of M. Plantier, Bishop of Nîmes. "Our age," says this fiery prelate, "has decreed the eulogies of men whose shameful degradation stains the page of modern history. Will it not be the eternal reproach of the present epoch that it has dared to pronounce the panegyric of Luther, and the vindication of Calvin? Such deviations of the moral sentiment dishonour our days of ignorance and darkness. . . . Treasons, perjuries, shameless outrages, iniquitous aggressions, impiety, concealed and real—all this is more frequent now than ever. . . . Did there ever exist in the annals of humanity a time in which blood and mire intermingled have impressed more shameful stains?"

M. Plantier writes like one possessed, or a man afflicted with mental aberration. He evidently thinks that he gives proof of faithfulness and force by heaping such gross insults on his adversaries, whereas he shows only that he is himself wanting both in good sense and decency.

M. RADCLIFFE AT PARIS AND MARSEILLES.

Our Protestant journals have devoted several articles to the preaching visit of M. Radcliffe, and to the salutary influence which he has exerted in our midst. Although this worthy brother experiences great difficulty in speaking before a French auditory, his deep piety, his ardent zeal, his special method in the teaching of the Gospel, have produced extended and durable effects. The organs of the liberal, or negative theology, and even some well-intending persons, too strongly attached to the ordinary style of preaching, have shown for M. Radcliffe but little sympathy. The refutation of their grievances is easy; it is enough to quote that text from the Gospel, "A good tree is known by its fruits." It is an indisputable fact that the appeals of M. Radcliffe to the Protestants of Paris have been, under the Divine blessing, instrumental in awakening slumbering consciences, and reassuring trembling souls. The same is true of Marseilles, where this faithful servant of Christ has passed three weeks. Notwithstanding continual physical sufferings, he has done much good, especially amongst the young people. The number of his hearers increases with every new discourse, and the inhabitants of this great commercial city have proved, by their attention and their assiduity, that their hearts were not insensible to the promises of the Divine Saviour.

NEW PROTESTANT CHAPELS AT PARIS.

Another fact which I am happy to mention is the opening of new Protestant chapels at Paris. The last number of the Archives du Christianisme mentions two chapels in which the Evangelical worship will be celebrated, independently of the churches and other places of worship which existed before. We may thence conclude that the Protestant faith is making remarkable progress at Paris, even amongst the Roman Catholics. Vainly do the Ultramontanes exclaim, in every variety of tone, that Protestantism is dead: the truth can never die. X. X. X.

ITALY.

Florence, April 18, 1862.

POPULAR FEELING ON THE ROMAN QUESTION.

The Roman question gives rise to an increasing uneasiness, as it draws its slow length along. Hope deferred for months and years has sickened the heart of the nation. The matter has been debated ad nauseam, and never more ably than last week in the English House of Commons. The speech of Mr. Layard will, above all others, interest your readers, as it contains so much educational and religious information, obtained a year ago through painstaking research by the Under-Secretary in person. The facts connected with brigandage have been published in official documents, and reflect eternal discredit on both Pope and Emperor, through whose patronage and connivance Rome has become a den of cut-throats, and a focus of systematic disturbance. The English press, especially the Times, contains the most reliable descriptions of the Southern kingdom, helpless and desolate through foreign marauders. Through a personal antipathy to Rattazzi and Napoleon III., Mr. Gallenga, the correspondent of the Times at Turin, probably paints with too dark colours. But no one can exaggerate the despondency of the Italians. It amounts almost to despair. In their deep perplexity, the only certainty seems to be that Savoy and Nice are gone for ever. A strong under-current of hate has set in towards the French Emperor, which may soon again bring Orsini bombs in fashion in Paris. Greater game than the Iale of Sardinia is now thought to be in request at the Tuileries. The unity of Italy appears to be disliked. Naples seems marked out for a Murat or a Bonaparte. Victor Emmanuel shares the popular ill-will, for neither Tuscans nor Neapolitans desire a monarch who takes his orders by telegraph from France. The state of Rome at this moment is a standing disgrace to civilization, and threatens to involve, not Italy alone, but the continent of Europe, in revolution and bloodshed, unless a clean riddance be speedily effected of the Pope, or at least of Papal misrule.

PROSECUTIONS AGAINST THE EVANGELICALS.

A few words as to the prosecutions against the Evangelicals. Signor Gavazzi has not been interfered with. His imprisonment would have caused too much stir. Mr. Ribet has been acquitted, by the highest court of law in Leghorn, as having transgressed no law, in replying to the attack made upon him by a Capuchin monk. Peccenini has been condemned at Lucca to one month's imprisonment and a fine of 8*l*. for publishing a New Year's-day tract in the Island of Elba. His object was to answer a priestly pamphlet full of calumnies against the Protestants, and to show that the alone method of solving the Roman question was for the people to withdraw spiritual allegiance from the Pope. An appeal has been lodged against this unjust sentence. The case of Mariani, the dépôt-keeper in Leghorn, who exhibited in his window the picture of the Romish Church service, which is being sold largely and without hindrance in Naples and Florence, has been remanded to a higher court by the authorities themselves, while the Waldensian student, Gregori, who published last summer in Elba a simple defence of his scriptural faith, when misrepresented in Roman Catholic fly-sheets, which were widely circulated in the island, has had his case postponed sine die, at great expense to himself, and on the most frivolous pretences. Though months have passed since the indictment was served, the Procuratore, who had himself fixed the day of trial, asked an adjournment, on the ground that two policemen, whom he required as witnesses, were absent. It appears, however, that the jury summoned was composed mostly of liberal men, and that he feared an acquittal. In every instance the bitterest opposition to Gospel truth was exhibited by judges and public prosecutors. When will an end be put to these vexatious and costly proceedings? Is Tuscany, the first land annexed to the kingdom of Italy, to be the last in receiving the benefits of the annexation? Will not the excitement caused by these covert assaults of the priesthood in Parliament, in the press, and in the mind of the people, hasten the introduction of the Italian criminal code into Tuscany. We hope so, for without it no one is safe from annoyance and expense, if not from actual imprisonment.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of the Bible Society was held here on the 9th inst. The sale of Bibles and Testaments at the Florentine dépôt during the year 1860 was 7,797 copies; during the year 1861 it was 9,121 copies; while, during the last year, above 32,000 copies had been sold throughout Italy. Those sent out from Tuscany were partly disposed of in Umbria and the Marches. Through special colporteurs between 600 and 700 copies had been sold at reduced prices to Tuscan soldiers during 1861. As about 900 copies of the 9,121 sold in this quarter were of the Martini version, we may reckon, judging proportionally, that about 3,000 out of the 32,000 sold all over Italy last year were Roman Catholic Scriptures. A resolution was passed at the meeting strongly urging the British and Foreign Bible Society to withdraw from circulation the Martini version. This expression of opinion ought to weigh with the Society, as it emanates from parties on the spot capable of judging the respective merits of the two translations, and of observing the inexpediency, on the part of a Protestant society, of selling an imperfect, nay, a false Word of God. The mistranslation of the one word, "Repent," which occurs some thirty times in the New Testament, by the expression "do penance," is so repulsive to some Christians, that they will neither contribute to the funds nor take part in the meetings of the Bible Society, until some guarantee is given that such perversions of Divine truth are set aside. The Martini is now provided, in various editions, for those who wish it, by Roman Catholic booksellers, who have been driven to publish it through the zealous efforts of Christians in connexion with the Diodati Bible. As the era of persecution, when an excuse for the circulation by Protestants of the Martini Bible has now passed away, and as the Italians—singular circumstance—almost never seek the Martini, but the Diodati version, when searching for the Scriptures, I hope the report is true that the committee in Earl-street has resolved to print no further editions of Roman Catholic versions of the Scriptures, at least for Italy, where any demand that may once have existed for them has ceased, according to the statements of official persons in Italy.

CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES IN ITALY.

It is cause of unspeakable thankfulness to Almighty God that, chiefly through the exertions of our noble Bible Society, aided by the Scottish Bible Society, somewhere about 80,000 copies of the Scriptures should have been sold from the hands of fifty colporteurs, these three years past, in priest-ridden Italy. Even supposing the one-half to be destroyed by the priests, or thrown aside by careless purchasers, there still remain scattered over the country

40,000 copies of that blessed Book, which maketh wise unto salvation. Our fervent hope and prayer is, and we are not without good ground for the expectation, that God is blessing the perusal of the Sacred Volume in town and country, amid the solitude of the mountain hamlet and the stir of the marts of trade. The exasperation of the Pope, the only and great enemy of the Bible Society, the violent opposition offered to the colporteurs by the priests and their tools in the courts of law, seem to prove that God's Word is having free course, and being glorified. When the heart is saddened on hearing the eloquent and effective denunciations of Protestantism by the Lent preachers, and by the sight of multitudes still devoutly thronging the churches and chapels of town and village during this holy week, a strong consolation is imparted by the fact that a secret power is at work on the hearts of men in this land, which will one day overthrow the vast power of the Papacy. No stronger argument could be afforded, if any were now needed, for the association of Christians in religious and missionary efforts, than the statistics given above. Many an opportunity, in this and other countries, has come and gone unimproved through division, and consequent weakness, in the Evangelical camp. No sooner was Italy, however, opened to the Gospel than the Bible Society, with an energy above all praise, took the field and carried on the enterprise, not knowing what a day might bring forth; and no faintness of heart or feebleness of power is yet visible in its operations.

THE TRACT SOCIETY AND COLPORTAGE.

Nor should we pass by in this connexion the equally praiseworthy and beneficial labours on Italian soil of the Religious Tract Society. With the exception of the many religious works printed during the last ten years by the Scotch ministers in Tuscany, through private liberality, almost the whole Evangelical literature presently circulating in Italy has been prepared at the expense of the Religious Tract Society. I have had repeated occasion to mention in previous letters the popularity and usefulness of these publications. They are sold not only at the depôts in Turin, Milan, Florence, Leghorn, and Naples, but by twenty out of the fifty colporteurs at work. While we honour the motive which causes the Bible Society to restrict its thirty colporteurs to the sale of the Bible alone, we feel persuaded that ninety-nine out of every hundred supporters of that Society would grant these men permission to carry the "Pilgrim's Progress," "Come to Jesus," and many such works, in their knapsacks, if by experience they were acquainted with the workings of an Italian mission. Here the religious tract as often leads to the purchase of the Bible as the perusal of the Bible creates a demand for religious literature. The Bible Society colporteurs are so constantly asked for Evangelical books, that they cannot be made to understand why they should not sell them; and when positively refused, in accordance with the present instructions of the Society, they beg that another colporteur with Bibles and books should accompany them in their peregrinations, an expedient which is occasionally resorted to. The Tract Society, whose exertions are not so well-known as they ought to be, or as those of the Bible Society, from the want of foreign agents and colporteurs in their own employ, has this winter exceeded all its former liberality by granting 1,000*l.* for printing in Italy; 500*l.* to the Italian Committee in Geneva, and 500*l.* to the Evangelical Publication Committee in Florence, which directs the Claudian press.

NAPLES EVANGELIZATION-AID SOCIETY.

I send you the very interesting report of the Naples Evangelization-Aid Society, which forms an excellent history of the work which has sprung up in the South, where a more favourable opening for Evangelical exertion now exists than in any other part of Italy. Lest your space will not take in the whole story, I give you the salient points:—

The society was formed in the winter of 1861, by members of various Protestant communions, chiefly in order to aid, rather than direct, every really Christian enterprise on behalf of the Italians of the South. It has raised and disbursed above 400*l.* The sources of revenue have been a subscription through the Record newspaper, several donations from the Foreign-Aid Society and the residents and visitors of Naples. The Marquis Cresi, who presides over a meeting of Italian Christians, and superintends the colporteurs of several societies in the town and provinces, is highly esteemed, as well as his assistant, Signor Cerioni, an ex-priest, many years ago received into the Christian Church at Malta by the Bishop of Gibraltar. The female school begun in the fisherman's quarter, the Mergollina, by Signor Cresi and the Countess Steinbock, and taught by Miss Sprenger, has fifty pupils, cleanly and well-behaved. In spite of threats, excommunications, and the refusal of absolution at the confessional, on the part of the priests towards the parents, the children have not been withdrawn; on the contrary, the parents oftentimes join with their children in the instructions of the school and the enjoyment of the singing-class. The deathbed of one pupil, who had been struck by the hand of a fanatic, was a singularly happy one. She expired, saying to her friends, "Don't cry; I am going to be with Jesus."

The committee paid for the room hired by Signor Gavazzi, in the Toledo, close to the palace of the Papal Nuncio. For three months this eloquent preacher addressed crowded and enthusiastic audiences, on four nights of the week, on controversial topics, enlarging the public mind, emboldening timid Christians, and ushering in a clerical movement by the powerful exposition of truth, unheard before in a land of ecclesiastical despotism. On Sabbaths, with the flexibility so characteristic of Italians, the joke and sarcasm were laid aside, and he expounded with all the fervour and fidelity of an experienced pastor the essential truths of Christianity, justification by faith, and redemption through the blood of Jesus. The committee believes that Signor Gavazzi prepared the way for other preachers; that many of his hearers joined other Evangelical réunions, and that an excellent effect was produced by his labours, though no constituted congregation or religious body resulted therefrom. The lull which occurred on the retirement of Signor Gavazzi was employed in printing several tracts for the times, on "Roman Infallibility," "The Mass," "The Worship of Images," "The Opinions of the Jesuits on Morality," "The Life of Luther," "A Defence of the Reformation." One colporteur was employed in the town of Naples, and many of these tractates were sent to the Waldensian pastor at Palermo, whose Evangelical work makes steady progress, despite the fury of fanatic and priest. In addition to Signori Calva and Gioia, two Calabrian priests, who have since been studying in Florence and Genoa, the society has been applied to by a large number of priests, who were desirous of leaving the Papal Church, if they could only be secured against the pangs of hunger. Christian prudence, the fear of placing temptations in their way, and the want of funds, have induced the society to limit itself to kindly counsel in these difficult circumstances. Four priests, however, have relinquished their calling, and cast themselves on the Providence of God. One has been employed at a small salary as a schoolmaster, and expresses himself more than satisfied with the change. "When I was a priest," he says, "I was always unwell. My conscience was ill at ease, and yet I was doing nothing. Now, although I labour hard, my soul is at peace, and both body and spirit are strong and happy." The Evangelical school for boys begun by the society, though under the ban of the clergy, has eighty scholars in attendance. Two able masters have been employed, and Mr. Buscarlet, the Scotch minister at Naples, superintends the religious instruction of the children. An evening school for adults has been attended by forty workmen, who not only learn to read the New Testament, but give evidence that they lay to heart its teachings, by removing the Madonnas from their houses, and discussing with their fellows in the workshop and the National Guard. The efforts of Signor Albarella, however, form the chief interest of the report, as they are peculiar to Naples, and have been very successful. This able speaker, formerly an advocate, has been a professing Christian for several years. Under promise that he would abstain from political discussions, the committee rented for him a large hall, capable of containing 250 persons, in which the simple Gospel has been faithfully preached on the Sabbaths, and controversial meetings, crowded to the door, have been held during two evenings of the week. A topic announced for discussion, "The Use of Images in Worship," "The Real Presence in the Lord's Supper," and such like. Full liberty of speech, pro and con, is allowed, of which the priests at first took full advantage, but have subsequently withdrawn, finding themselves worsted in every argument. When the debate is over a vote is taken, and usually only four or five hands are held up as dissenting from the testimony of Scripture on these vital points. The costume of the assembly is very picturesque, and shows that the middle classes have been reached and interested. Beaten in discussion, the priests have sought to influence the authorities, but no police interference has been permitted by them. A rencontre lately took place, which has been spoken of throughout the town. "The Worship of God in Spirit and in Truth" had occupied several weeks in discussion. One evening a Neapolitan littérateur, Signor Escalona, maintained, that as we could only form in our minds an idea of God under a human form, pictured and sculptured representations of the Divine Being were therefore legitimate. God, however, employed the simple to confound the wise. An humble artisan, who though fifty-five years of age, is a scholar in the adult class, rose and replied by improvising a parable in the genuine vernacular dialect. "There once was a blind man," said he, "who had never seen the human figure, and who was seeking the Lord and asking where he might find Him.

He was led into the church, and had pointed out to him several pictures and statues of Christ. 'Look there,' said they to him, 'and behold the Saviour.' The poor man was in despair, and cried out, 'I cannot see him. Must I be condemned, because I am blind?' Whereupon an Evangelical Christian, with the Bible in his hand, spoke to the disconsolate man of worshipping God in spirit and in truth, of the Redeemer of souls, and His wondrous love, of Jesus and His atoning death. Then was the blind man's heart opened, and he exclaimed, 'Now, indeed, I see Christ.' Then turning towards his opponent, the popular orator added, "There was a man who never saw the human figure, and yet was privileged to see God. What need have we, then, of your images?" and he continued in a lofty strain of feeling to pour out his soul on the real character of spiritual worship, to the delight and edification of the whole assembly.

This model report closes with an appeal for funds towards the purchase of a suitable hall, so that the work so prosperously begun may not be at the mercy of priestridden landlords, with the expression of a strong desire that Signor Albarella, Signor Cresi, or some other servant of Christ, should be regularly ordained in Naples for the dispensation of the sacraments and pastoral visitation; and with the important explanation that Signor Albarella has, without any salary, continued for eight months thus to labour, despite the daily threats of the assassin's knife. His views are the furthest removed from Plymouthism, for he argues for a regular official and salaried Evangelical ministry.

It is said that Signor Cresi is about to publish a confession of faith, which will substantially agree with that of the Waldenses, though he does not belong to the communion. The school at Torre del Greco, supported by the Philanthropic Association of Italian Ladies, has already eighty pupils, and is highly spoken of by visitors.

THE REFORM MOVEMENT IN THE ROMISH CHURCH.

I am glad to be able to furnish you with a few trustworthy facts connected with the movement going on at Naples within the Church of Rome itself. The membership of the Mutual-Aid Society is between 4,000 and 5,000. The great majority are priests, although about forty deputies of the Neapolitan provinces have joined the Reform movement. Priests alone are entitled to aid from the funds, and it is by them that the Colonna di Fuoco is edited, printed, and circulated. As yet this journal is not vended in the ordinary way, being published with a view to influence the clerical mind for the present. A considerable difference of opinion obtained as to the name to be given to their broadsheet. Many wished to have it called The Reformer, but as this would at once have laid the party open to the charge of Protestantism, and frustrated their plans, the paper was sent forth as the Pillar of Fire, in the hope that it might guide many feet stumbling in darkness. Several of these priests have been imprisoned under the old régime on account of their liberal opinions, notably the author of the famous article on "Reading the Bible," noticed in my last letter, who was in chains with Poerio, and visited England after his release. The same enlightened views as to the necessity of circulating among priests and people the Holy Scriptures are being expounded in a long series of articles from the same pen, addressed to the priests of Italy. Two able priestly pamphlets have appeared lately on the same subjects, the secularization of the Bible, as they call it, by Lachina of Stilly and Tibboni of Brescia. The society has been investigating the relative merits of the Diodati and Martini translations, and while giving the palm at once to Diodati, feels that the latter learnt too much to Geneva in his interpretations, as the former undoubtedly drew his inspiration from Rome; so that a new translation is proposed. The leading aim of the society, however, is to obtain the practical abolition of the temporal power of the Papacy. To this alone Passaglia in the North confines himself, hoping that the spiritual power in its present condition will be vastly increased. In this sense he is about to present a petition to the Pope previous to the meeting of the bishops in Rome, in the month of May, and hopes to obtain the signatures of 20,000 priests. But the Neapolitan Society, while seeking the removal of the temporal power as a stumbling-block to further progress, looks forward to the overthrow of Papal supremacy, and what they call the "autocracy of the Papacy," which since the Reformation has so grown in strength, that all initiative is centralised in Rome. Let it be clearly understood, nevertheless, that they cling to Rome as the centre, and to the Pope as the head of the Church; but while doing so most honestly, they plead in the petition forwarded to the Pope, signed by 8,000 priests, for the removal or rectification of indulgences, the confessional, the superstitious worship of images and relics, the introduction of lay influence into the councils of the Church, and the improved and liberal education of the priests. How will his Holiness sympathise with their sanguine belief that the day of a great moral regeneration is at hand, when the priests will regain their lost sway over the souls of men, through the teachings of Scripture and the example of holy living?

This movement is now headed by Bishop Caputo, who, in virtue of the office of Chaplain-General, which he held under the Bourbons, has been able to open all the Royal chapels, such as San Francesco di Paolo, opposite the King's palace, to the ablest preachers in the society. All the bigoted journals have opened their columns to the foulest abuse, recrimination, and misrepresentation of this band of reforming spirits; but it is remarked, on all hands, that the arguments advanced in the Colonna di Fuoco remain unassailed. As it is not two years since Garibaldi landed in Sicily, results like these of the progress of free inquiry, though not yet what we could wish to see, afford abundant grounds for thanking God, and taking courage as to the future of Italy.

THE WORK AT AOSTA.

Monsieur Curie, the Waldensian pastor of Aosta, and author of several valuable controversial works, makes head against violent opposition. Although the town only contains 1,000 inhabitants, there are forty priests, who preach constantly against Protestantism. The priests of late have been burning Testaments and tracts in the public square and neighbouring villages, and paying their parishioners to do the same. And yet the average monthly sale is eighty Testaments, ten Bibles, and 280 Evangelical books. In 1861 about 1,500 copies of the Scriptures were sold.

THE PRIESTS OUTWITTED.

Another instance in which the priests were outwitted occurred in Sicily lately. A colporteur was seized by their orders and hurried before the magistrate, with the certainty that the poor fellow would be lodged in prison. But the magistrate acquitted the colporteur, and incarcerated the man who had illegally disturbed him in the peaceable sale of his books.

THE WORK IN LOMBARDY.

The work of God advances in Lombardy, formerly so ungrateful a soil for the seed of the Word. A colporteur at Brescia, who had been maltreated by the people, persevered in circulating the Scriptures, and finally formed a congregation of eighty. The Lord's Supper was lately dispensed to forty-five individuals. At Milan a large number of the respectable classes of society have been attracted to the various réunions, and day-schools and Sabbath-schools are being set on foot. The concert for united prayer was observed in January, and many Italian Christians expressed the liveliest satisfaction of hearing for the first time of the existence and aim of the Evangelical Alliance.

SIGNOR GAVAZZI AND MR. PIGGOTT.

In Florence Signor Gavazzi is forming a "Chiesa Nazionale Italiana," which I need not explain the principles of, as you are soon to have the Padre in England, to give an account of his project. I hear that 300 names have been given in of parties willing to join.

One of the Wesleyan missionaries recently sent to Italy—Mr. Piggott—has met with considerable success at Ivrea, in the North. He has associated with him, as evangelist, an ex-priest, and visits all the villages along the shores of the Lago Maggiore, preaching the Gospel from place to place.

AUSTRIA.

CONVERSIONS TO PROTESTANTISM IN BOHEMIA.

A Protestant pastor in Bohemia expresses his gratitude for assistance received from the readers of Christendom, which has enabled him and his congregation to get rid of an "oppressive load of debt" upon their church and parsonage. He then gives some particulars of what is doing to promote the welfare of his charge, and next relates several interesting facts respecting the progress of Protestantism in Bohemia generally. The account in a subsequent page, cited from a Continental contemporary, corroborates our correspondent's testimony on this subject. With reference to the restrictions which still continue upon religious liberty, it must be remembered that the remarkable document, published in our last number, guaranteeing the utmost freedom of conscience and worship throughout Austria, is at present only a "project" of law:—

Haber, near Auscha, March 12, 1862.

... We have purchased a new cemetery, to which the Concordat forced us, by excluding us from the use of the Roman Catholic churchyard. During the preceding year this burial-ground was solemnly consecrated, amidst great interest on the part of the Catholics. This cemetery was purchased at a cost of 1,200*fl.*, a very considerable expenditure for our poor community, and of which 800*fl.* still remain to be paid. Notwithstanding this, we still kept our eyes fixed upon the object for which the community has for years striven. What is a Protestant community without schools? Our children have been for seventy-seven years alienated from us in Roman Catholic schools, and their hearts have been poisoned with Romish errors. In order to avert such consequences we have collected continually amongst ourselves, and have also been assisted by the gifts of other brethren, in order to create a school building fund. God willing, we shall open our school next Whitsuntide. That will be a happy moment, for which I have so often wrestled in prayer.

But, to a wider extent also in my community, the Lord has done great things for us: He has given us an important increase from the Roman Catholic Church. In the year 1858 I communicated to you that among the Catholics in Bohemia there was an unusual demand for the Word of God. Many Bibles and Testaments have been sold here to Catholics, and many more would have been disposed of among the people, but their poverty is so great as to make even a slight expenditure impossible. Notwithstanding, the Lord has blessed His Divine Word among them. Many come from a distance to hear the Word of Life in the church at Haber; others have promptly made confession of the Protestant faith. It is a deeply-moving sight when old men and matrons confess the name of our Lord Jesus, and promise henceforth to walk in the pure light of the Gospel. The Lord opens the eyes of the blind, and whole families have here been converted. In Rosendorf the number of Christian converts amounts to sixty-two. Previously to the year 1850 some conversions had indeed taken place, but they were isolated cases. It is only since 1859 that the Spirit of God has mightily moved the heart. In that year there were only five converts, two men and three women. But, on the other hand, in 1860, nineteen women and thirty-seven men; in 1861, twenty-five men and twenty-four women; and recently two girls; making, therefore, in the course of three years, 112 persons who have been brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. In the same period two Protestants, who were dwelling at a distance from here, and who were attended on their sick beds by Romish priests, were persuaded to forsake our Church. In another community in Bohemia the number of conversions to Protestantism is increasing.

When we in Bohemia think of the Concordat, we might say to our oppressors with Joseph, the son of Jacob, "As for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good." Oppression has kindled the love of the Gospel in a thousand hearts. The Protestants in Görkan have associated themselves, and founded a new community. They have possessed for three years their own cemetery, and have now built a new church. In and about Rumburg the Protestants formed themselves, two years ago, into a new congregation; they have renovated an old church (which was formerly Roman Catholic), laid out a cemetery, and will in a short time appoint their own minister. We experience more and more that the Gospel is the power of God. The Almighty Disposer of events has caused the alteration of the arrangements of the State to work for the good of His Church; and if those above us should indeed take a more serious interest in the free position of the Protestant Church, then a new era will commence for us. Till now, at least, the oppression of the Concordat lies like an incubus upon us, and hinders everywhere the life of the Church. The old restrictions with regard to marriages between Protestants and Roman Catholics are still in existence, and all the children of such marriages still belong to the Roman Catholic Church. The Roman Catholic priests allot for the burial of Protestants the despoised places reserved in their cemeteries for suicides. In Rosendorf the corpse of a Protestant child was obliged to be buried in the garden of its grandparents, because the Roman Catholic priest there would allow no other place for it than that above referred to. The political authorities, who were asked for help, showed themselves as powerless—being fettered by the bands of the Concordat. This happened on the 11th of May, 1861, and therefore since the Imperial Patent. But even in higher places a freer development of our Church cannot make way.

The Protestant official of the High Consistory in Vienna, appointed by the Government, mistakes his high mission. In vain we have applied to him; already he has spent eleven months in preparing for the assembling of the synod, though all that he has accomplished could have been done in two. We almost resign the hope that he will rouse from his lethargy and assemble a synod. Himself opposed to freer movements, he has not surprised the Church in regard to this, by taking any initiative. In our Church, as in the State itself, mistrust awakes again. But the Lord, who has been pleased to allow the dawn of (as we hope) a better time on the horizon of Austria, will guide everything for the best; will increase His kingdom amongst us, and let the light of the Gospel penetrate further.

CONVERSION OF A BOHEMIAN VILLAGE.

We are indebted to a Continental journal for the following interesting account of the conversion to Protestantism of a village in Bohemia:—

In the Giant Mountains there is a Bohemian district called Seml, which wholly professes the Romish religion, and in which no one would suspect the existence of ancient Protestant or Hussite traditions. Nevertheless, in the gorges of the mountains, and in the caverns, may be seen, carved upon the rock, cups, with the initial letters of the sacramental terms of body and blood. This well-known symbol is sufficient to attest that these solitary valleys of old served as an asylum to the disciples of Huss. Here is now situated the little village of Spalov, which numbers forty-three houses, and is inhabited only by poor mountaineers. Five leagues separate it from the nearest Protestant place, Krischlitz. In March, 1860, the pastor of Krischlitz saw two peasants arrive at his modest parsonage. They came from Spalov to announce to him that almost the whole village had decided to forsake Romanism, and to enter into the Lutheran Church. M. Molnar (that is the name of the pastor), to prove their resolution, confined himself to pointing out to them the provisions of the law relative to abjurations. But very soon afterwards they returned with the certificates of the civil authorities in due form. Sixty men and women of Spalov delayed not to enrol their names amongst the presbytery of Krischlitz. In September took place their solemn abjuration and their admission into the Reformed Church, and on the 8th December of the same year the first act of public worship was celebrated at Spalov itself, in the house of a peasant, in the midst of a numerous concourse of the Romanists of the neighbourhood, who were serious and orderly. The pastor had chosen for his text John viii. 31 and 32. Next day Divine service attracted a still larger number; the Lord's Supper was celebrated, and eight new converts joined themselves to the rising Church. A great number of spectators openly expressed their desire to follow this example. All hearts were full of joy. They could not separate from one another.

In the course of the afternoon, the day being serene, the Christians of Spalov assembled together before the house which had offered hospitality to the pastor, and at sunset, men, women, and children all accompanied him for the space of three miles. Since then he has visited them as often as his other duties would permit, and cannot but praise God for the progress which they are making, young and old, in knowledge and in sanctification. The first donation that they received (it came to them from the National Church of Mecklenburg) enabled them to procure for themselves a sufficient number of Bibles and works of edification, and to purchase a communion service.

However, one of their families was already in trouble; one child, the first infant baptized, having died in October, a few weeks afterwards. The Romish cemetery was closed against it; the railway refused to convey the corpse, and it was necessary to carry it to Krischlitz. The mother accompanied it. She only returned home, after ten hours' walking, at three o'clock in the morning, half dead with fatigue. The new parish comprehended the absolute necessity of having its cemetery. A disposable piece of land was found; the civil authorities interposed no impediment; and at length, on the 21st of May last, the purchase was completed. The ground is large enough to contain a church and parsonage; but the parish is indebted 420 florins, and, notwithstanding the legal authorisation, must expect vexations of every kind. In August last the cemetery, which is surrounded by a hedge, was about to receive its first deposit, a child, when the gendarmes prevented its interment, and M. Molnar buried it in the garden of its father.

Spalov will probably be the centre of a Protestant movement, which will propagate itself widely in the Roman Catholic population of the country. It will require a church and a pastor, then a school and a teacher. In a parallel case Rome would have her hands full of gold. Very recently, on the frontiers of Eastern Prussia, she has built eight churches for ten, for fifty, for a hundred Catholics lost in the midst of the Protestants. Protestants will surely not abandon the poor mountaineers of Spalov.

HOLLAND.

Amsterdam, April 11, 1862.

DOCTRINAL DEGENERACY.

The readers of Evangelical Christendom will be grieved to learn the events, bearing on religion and morals, which have occurred here within these few weeks. They are already aware of the opinions publicly held by the Rev. Buskin Huët, formerly minister of the French Church at Haarlem, and how he had recently resigned his charge, in consequence of a falling off in the number of his hearers. There is not so much cause for joy at this result as at first sight appears. It only shows that the members of the French Church at Haarlem were not prepared to accept of his extravagances. His power for evil is only enlarged by entering on the wider field of preaching in Dutch, and followers are not wanting. It is illustrative of the state of affairs in the Church in Holland, that while M. Huët was constrained to leave the French Church at Haarlem, the very reverse was taking place at Arnhem, where a considerable number of the elders of the French Church resigned, because the majority supported their minister in preaching similar views; and the most advanced of the infidel school, the Rev. Mr. Pierson, of the French Church at Rotterdam, has very recently been called by the General Session of the Dutch Reformed Church at Leyden; and five of the elders have resigned. It will be seen, therefore, that while single congregations are dissatisfied with a form of teaching which undermines God's Word, and destroys the vitality of religion, yet that others take precisely the opposite course, while the leaders are either advancing, like Mr. Huët, voluntarily to wider fields, or by call of the Church rulers, as Mr. Pierson to Leyden. In reality, there are no fixed principles necessary to holding the pastoral office. All that the minister has to do is to preach notions acceptable to his elders and deacons.

EXTRAORDINARY SERMON BY DR. JUNIUS.

As characteristic of what extraordinary sermons are sometimes preached in Holland, we may mention a case, recorded some time ago in the Herald of Amsterdam (a religious paper, edited by the Jewish missionary from the Free Church of Scotland), as quoted from another paper. It is necessary to premise that there is a pleasant and harmless usage in Holland of sending presents to children, relatives, and friends, on the evening of the 5th of December, which is called St. Nicholas' Feast. These gifts are regarded as rewards of good behaviour to the young, and tokens of esteem to others. The clergymen are also frequently remembered, on such occasions, by the liberal members of the Churches. We cannot say what motive prompted the Rev. Dr. Junius, of Tiel, to preach the sermon referred to in the Herald on the 5th of last December, but the usage suggests that either his people had been particularly kind to him, or that he wished to stir them up to greater liberality. Be that as it may, we are informed that he took as his text Acts x. 38—"Who went about doing good;" showing—1. The manner in which Jesus, during His life, went about doing good—healing the sick, cleansing the lepers, giving strength to the lame, calming the waves of the sea, to quiet the fears of his disciples. 2. The manner in which St. Nicholas went about doing good—visiting the poor and wretched in the most unostentatious manner. In illustrating this, the preacher related several legends regarding his favourite saint. 3. The fruits of following the example of Jesus and St. Nicholas: Those who go about doing good prepare a feast for many; they prepare a feast for themselves; at death they go to the realms of light; their names are blessed. This last point was shown to be incontrovertible, seeing that, notwithstanding it is more than eighteen centuries since Jesus walked on the earth, His name remains in blessed remembrance. St. Nicholas is also regarded with affection, Roman Catholics honouring him as a saint, having houses of prayer and societies named after him; and Protestants thinking so highly of him, that they still celebrate the St.

Nicholas Feast, though he has been dead for upwards of 1,400 years.

This is not the sketch of a sermon by a young and vain man of the out-and-out Buskin Huët or Pierson infidel school, but by a doctor in divinity, comparatively speaking advanced in life, and holding the prominent position of vice-president of the Synodal Commission—a rank something similar to, but of far greater influence, than that of ex-moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. Dr. Junius, of Tiel, is not one of those who deny the miracles of the Saviour, and other fundamental articles of Christian faith, but rather claims to be Evangelical, though there is more of Rome than of grace in the above sketch; and we have been assured that he maintains that the reason why clergymen in England and Scotland do not play cards, etc., on the Lord's-day evening, is that that unfortunate country, Britain, is quite in a benighted state compared with the light which shines in the United Provinces.

We may remark that the practice is not better than the doctrine, and that the evils in both are not confined to the Dutch Reformed Church. On the most undoubted testimony, the writer knows of a theological professor of one of the oldest Dissenting bodies in Holland having a dancing party for young people on the evening of the Lord's-day. Equally certain is the case of one of the oldest French or Walloon ministers, whose orthodoxy we never heard called in question, going with one of his young deacons, after evening service on Sunday, to a supper party, finding the company at cards, and an opening being made for him, taking his hand as a matter of course. Such a state of things is perfectly incredible to those who know how effectually and promptly such irregularities would be put down in England or Scotland, in National Church or in Dissenting.

There are many good people who deplore the present state of things in the Church; and there are also Evangelical efforts for the welfare of the people put forth, though on a small scale, and not supported by one-tenth part of those who claim to be Evangelical.

MUNICIPAL RESOLUTION TO AUTHORISE THE OPENING OF THE THEATRE ON THE LORD'S-DAY.

It will not appear surprising, after what has been said, that the Town Council of Amsterdam, a few weeks ago, resolved to subsidise the City Theatre for five years with an annual amount of nine thousand guilders, and an additional sum of seven thousand, this year, for decorating the building; adding the permission, hitherto withheld, of playing on the Lord's-day evenings. It is satisfactory to know that such a scandalous resolution has not been allowed to pass without protest. The Society for the Spread of Truth (which does much good with the small means placed at its disposal) earnestly remonstrated against taking the money of the ratepayers to support Sabbath desecration. The General Council of the Dutch Reformed Church of Amsterdam expressed themselves as "compelled by duty" to make known their "astonishment and pain" at the resolution taken by the Town Council, and protest against it "in the name of religion and good morals." They expressed their fear "that both the Christian and social life of the community will suffer, if the opening of the City Theatre on the Lord's-day evenings be officially legalised, presenting a new temptation to the pursuit of pleasures which interfere with family order and purity." The address concluded with the request that the Town Council of Amsterdam would not only continue to keep the City Theatre closed on the Lord's-day, but also take the proper steps for putting down the clandestine representations of the lesser theatres, which had hitherto been connived at.

Yesterday the question was reopened in the Town Council, but without success. The motion to withdraw that part of the resolution of March 12 which referred to the opening of the theatre on the day of rest, was negatived. A second motion—that the entire resolution should be rescinded—was also rejected; but a third—that the carrying or not carrying out of that part of the resolution which authorised representations on the Lord's-day should be left to the Burgomaster and Wethouders (mayor and aldermen)—was carried. This is a small section of the magistrates, and if it was not for the fact that the resolution must have been passed by them previous to coming before the Town Council, there might have been some cause to rejoice. As it is, the protests which have been made may perhaps restrain the mayor and aldermen from giving effect to the resolution of the Town Council, especially as two of them at least, the mayor and one of the aldermen, Mr. I. I. Teding van Berkhout, opposed it from the first. It is to be hoped that many of the readers of Evangelical Christendom will join with the friends of truth and of true religion here in prayer that the mayor and aldermen may have true wisdom given unto them, and decide against further desecration of the Lord's-day; breathing, also, the earnest supplication that the members of the Town Council may soon be brought to fear God and uphold righteousness.

SYRIA.

Our readers will be glad to learn that, since the establishment of Protestant missions in Syria, the prospects of Evangelical religion there were probably never so cheering as at the present moment. A missionary of the American Board writes us as follows:—

Beirut, March 5, 1862.

UNPRECEDENTED PROGRESS OF EVANGELICAL RELIGION.

The present year promises, thus far, to be one of the most eventful and fruitful in the history of Evangelical religion in Syria. At no time, in many years, has there been so much inquiry on the subject of religion, and at no time such a general movement towards Protestantism. At the beginning of the year about a dozen persons were received to the communion of the Protestant Churches on profession of their faith, and several persons are now asking to be received. The regular Sabbath congregations in Beirut, Sidon, Abeh, Suk el Ghurb, Deir-Mimas, El Khiyam, and other places, have been large and attentive, and not a little spiritual interest in the preached Word has been manifested by some of the hearers.

INFLUENCES AT WORK BREAKING UP NATIVE IMMOBILITY AND PREJUDICE.

The civil war, and the subsequent massacres, in 1860, have had one good effect, in addition to their many and overwhelming evil results. Thousands of the people were driven from their houses and crowded together in the seaboard cities, and in those very cities where Evangelical religion occupies the most conspicuous position. Before this banishment from their homes they had only heard of Protestantism through their priests. They regarded Protestants as "Freemasons" (a name only known here as descriptive of some vague but terrible system of false religion)—sun-worshippers, child-stealers, necromancers, and enemies of the human race in general. But after spending many months in Beirut, in constant intercourse with Protestants, both native and foreign, and receiving food, clothing, and house-rent from the hands of the hated "Angliz," their prejudices were gradually softened and removed, until they began to think that a religion productive of such good fruits must itself be good.

Other causes have also united with these in breaking up that fixity and immobility which has so long characterised the Orientals, and especially those of Syria. The form of government in Lebanon has been changed. Old feudal prerogatives and forms and offices have been done away. Men who have hitherto held office from birth alone are now among the common people. The war itself dispelled many of the superstitions of the people about the sanctity and inviolability of places reputed sacred. The shrines and images of saints which had been thought to be able to destroy all enemies were themselves utterly destroyed. The people have thus seen changes in the Government, in their own circumstances, and in things heretofore deemed unchangeable; so that the idea of changing from one religious sect to another is by no means so repugnant as formerly.

When the people hear of Protestants now they regard them not only with diminished prejudice, but with not a little esteem.

It is easier to-day to distribute religious books and tracts, with a prospect of their being read, than ever before. There are more open doors for the establishment of schools than ever before. And now that the distribution of charity has ceased, and the missionaries are no longer identified with relieving bodily want, they are welcomed among the people with more freedom and less fear of the priests than ever before. Soon after the beginning of the year there was an increase of religious interest in the congregation in Sidon, and several gave evidence of having experienced a change of heart. Just at that time news was received, indirectly, from the city of Homs, that a large number of young men assembled every night to study the Scriptures, and subsequent intelligence proves the movement towards the truth to have been one of great importance and extent.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT AT HOMS.

Six years ago the Rev. D. M. Wilson, missionary of the American Board, took up his residence in the city of Homs, and continued to labour there steadily, and with some success, until the summer of 1860, when the alarming state of the country obliged him to leave for the sea coast, and more recently he has returned to the United States. Since his departure Homs has been deprived of the labour of a missionary; but the seed sown has not been lost. The Bibles, Testaments, and religious books distributed among the people have been read and studied, and in some instances prayed over. From twenty to forty young men met nightly to study God's Word. The Greek bishop was expelled from the city, by his own people, for outrageous and unblushing iniquity. The fetters of sect were broken, and the fear of excommunication ceased to affect the people. In the month of February a letter was received from Homs, stating that a large number had become open Protestants, and urging that a missionary be sent immediately. Letters were received from Damascus and Tripoli to the same effect, and it was evident that something must be done. Owing to the diminished numbers of the American Mission, no missionary could be spared to reside permanently in Homs, and measures were taken to find a native brother to undertake the work. A suitable person was found in Solleba Jerwan, a young man who had resided in Homs with Mr. Wilson. He has been labouring recently in Deir Mimas, south-east of Sidon, and when he announced to the people his intention to leave for Homs, they immediately wrote a protest, and insisted that he should not leave them, but finally yielded, on the ground that the native preacher at El Khiyam could supply them, while Homs was entirely destitute. When this young brother arrived in Beirut he found still further intelligence from Homs. I had just received a long letter signed by thirty-six men of that city, who pleaded most earnestly for help. In order to give your readers some idea of this letter, I will translate a part of it for their benefit.

"TO THE EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS OF BEIRUT.

"Homs, Syria, Jan. 19, 1862.

"Your petitioners in Homs, who long for the true doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, would respectfully state that we have studied the truths of the Gospel as written by the apostles and prophets, under the instruction of our honoured teacher, the Rev. Mr. Wilson; and, since his departure, we have been as sheep without a shepherd. While he was with us our faith was weak, and the seed of the Gospel failed to grow; but now, praise be to God, He has not left His Word to return to Him void, but it has begun to grow, and the kingdom of Christ is advancing by degrees. We have left our old Church, and wish, if it be the Lord's will, to unite with that Church which is free from all superstition and all teaching of man. And we would intreat you, as did the Macedonian, come over and help us. Compassionate our condition. We are left alone, as sheep without a shepherd. And, more than this, we are undergoing severe persecution from the priests, whose hearts are utterly destitute of compassion. They stir up against us the Greek sect, and, as if that were not enough, they have gone to the Mohammedans, and accused us of being 'Freemasons,' who deny the existence of God, and have no religion, their object being to stir up Moslem fanaticism against us. We prove to the Mohammedans that our religion is the pure Gospel, and we endure the persecution with kindness and patience for the sake of Him 'who, when he was reviled, reviled not again: when he suffered, he threatened not, but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.' And now we intreat the Lord and beg of you to send us a missionary to instruct us in the Word of God. We are in great straits; yet we ask not for a missionary to give us worldly relief and ease, for he that pleaseth men is not the servant of God, but for spiritual rest to our souls. And we ask Him most exalted to make our petition to you efficient, as was that of the chief butler to Pharaoh, who procured the release of Joseph from imprisonment. These names undersigned are of those who are ready to suffer persecution for Christ's sake. It is our opinion that one-half of the members of the Greek Church in Homs are enlightened, and will soon follow our example. . . . And may the Lord preserve you!"

(Signed by thirty-six men of Homs.)

This letter greatly strengthened the heart of our young native brother, but he was also greatly encouraged by another event which occurred before he left Beirut:—

NATIVE MISSIONARY SOCIETY IN BEIRUT—NOVEL AND INTERESTING FACT.

The native Protestants in Beirut have formed a missionary society, known as the "Evangelical Society of Beirut." Its object is the spread of the Gospel in this and other lands, and its funds are to be raised on the plan of systematic giving. Each member pledges himself to give a certain sum every week, and the collector calls upon the member regularly. The members are men, women, and children. Of the women and children, not a few are poor widows and orphans, refugees from Hasbeiya, who are wretchedly poor, and yet seem to delight to give of their poverty for the spread of the Gospel. The great part of the Hasbeiyans and Damascene widows in the school of Mrs. Bowen Thompson have written their names on the list, and would not take a denial when told that they were too poor to give. The cheerfulness with which all have entered upon this work is very delightful and encouraging. A hymn has been written for the society, by one of the native young men, to the tune "Shining Shore," and it breathes the genuine missionary spirit. The chorus which follows each verse is somewhat as follows:—

"True is the word of Christ our Lord,

Most blessed is the giver;

To dreadful woe the heathen go,

Give freely, then, and ever.

I have heard nothing, since my residence in Syria, which sounded so sweetly to my ear as this original missionary hymn when sung by a crowded congregation at the first monthly meeting of the native Missionary Society.

When the news of the Macedonian cry from Homs, and the readiness of the young brother to go there, reached the Missionary Society, they at once decided to assume his support, and unanimously voted to do so. He is now in Homs, and is to make regular reports to the society. This step is one of not a little importance. The native brethren have thus begun the work of supporting the preaching of the Gospel in Syria, and we trust it will continue until the whole land is evangelised.

OTHER IMPORTANT PROTESTANT MOVEMENTS.

Other very important movements towards Protestantism have occurred in other parts of Syria. In the village of Cana, east of Tyre, two hundred persons have just come out as Protestants. In Tibneen, sixty-one have taken a similar step, though with doubtful motives, and in other villages in Merj Riyim and Belad Bahara both Maronites and Greek Catholics are embracing the simple truths of the Gospel. Missionary societies have been formed among the natives in Sidon, Deir Mimas, Cana, Alma, and other places, and the missionary spirit has received a new impulse.

We hear from our Irish American brethren in Damascus that three villages in that vicinity are asking for Protestant instruction. The light is also spreading in several parts of Lebanon. Even the Druses, who have never supported schools, have just set apart a portion of their "wakf" property for the establishment of a high school in Abeih.

SOCIAL CONDITION OF SYRIA.

The poor refugees from Hasbeiya have not yet returned to their homes. A few of the men have gone there temporarily, to secure the payment of their indemnities; but a dark cloud rests over their future. The Druse butchers who slaughtered the unarmed men of Hasbeiya still live unmolested in their houses, unpunished by the Government. Who can expect the Christians to return there, while these murderers remain unpunished?

Syria is now outwardly quiet. There is no hope of its remaining quiet, except in the prevalence of the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ. The great bane of Syria is the multitude and virulence of conflicting sects. There can be no peace until these hostile elements are reconciled, and nothing can reconcile them but a common faith in Jesus Christ.

Mohammedanism has ceased to be aggressive. Romanism, with its creature-worship, can never make converts from among Mohammedans. A pure Gospel can conquer both.

CHINA.

THE WAR AND THE MISSIONARIES.

The facts stated in the following letter from an American missionary will, we are sure, give emphasis to the appeal, on behalf of himself and his fellow-labourers, with which he concludes:—

Fuh-chau, China, Feb. 3, 1862.

THE WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

The Special Week of Prayer (Jan 5—12) was observed by the English and American missionaries at this place, who met together some ten times for devotional purposes. We felt that it was good thus to meet in concerted prayer with our brethren in Christ in all lands. The prayer-meetings seemed if anything to be more interesting and refreshing than those held on similar occasions one or two years ago.

THE PERSECUTION AT POK-LO.

You have doubtless heard more or less of the savage persecution which broke out last fall against the native Christians living in and near Pok-lo, in Canton Province; of the torture unto death of the native evangelist, Chea, by his captors, and the scattering of many brethren to Canton, Hong-kong, and elsewhere; of the offering of 50*l.* for the head of every foreign missionary going into that district; and of 25*l.* for the head of every Chinese who rented houses or chapels to missionaries, or who aided them in distributing tracts, &c. It is encouraging to know that three native Christians suffered patiently the spoiling of their goods and cruel mockings and torturings rather than recant. It is said that no instances of recantation of the principles of Christianity has been known to occur among them. By a recent letter from a missionary of the London Mission, Hong-kong, I learn that the murderers of the native evangelist have become more and more frightened, and that the chief of them has been offering money for a substitute to bear the consequences of his crime. This looks as though the Chinese authorities were bestirring themselves to execute justice. It is to be hoped that the way will be opened soon to resume missionary labours in that part of Canton province.

THE REBELS AT SHANGHAI: THEIR CHARACTER.

According to our latest news, Shanghai was threatened by insurgent forces. A large army was distant only three or four miles, and two other powerful divisions were expected shortly, from different directions, to approach and hem in the place. Ningpo was still in possession of the rebel forces. Missionary labour at Shanghai and Ningpo, and at the out-stations, must be very greatly interrupted and deranged, if not entirely prevented, by the conduct and the presence of these marauders. From their course at Ningpo, it is probable that they do not wish to come in contact with foreign soldiers, nor to excite the active opposition of foreign officials. They would be content—for the time being at least—with the capture of the Chinese city of Shanghai. It is generally supposed that foreign soldiers will aid the Imperial forces in defending that city against the insurgents. Such a course undoubtedly will make the latter unfriendly to foreigners, and will tend to make the persons and the property and the trade of foreigners less secure than heretofore. Should Shanghai be taken by the insurgents, it is difficult to see how the foreign community, distant only half-a-mile, will not be, sooner or later, embroiled and endangered, on account of the immense amount of wealth collected there.

These Nanking rebels are fast losing the friendly sympathy of those foreigners (missionaries or merchants) who some year or two ago wrote in their favour. The more there is known about them, the less favourable do they appear in any point of view. Their views of religious doctrine have few features to be approved of by the Bible Christian, and their lives did not seem to be purer than the lives of the Imperialists. It is understood that at Nanking they do not (notwithstanding their professions and promises) tolerate a free and public proclamation of the truths of Christianity on the part of missionaries. These are expected to acknowledge the Tien-Wang and his son as divine. It is affirmed also that the Tien-Wang (Heavenly King) exacts the most degrading adulation from all who approach him, even from foreign missionaries, who are obliged to "knock heads" to him. Two have recently left the capital of the insurgents, under the impression that their personal safety could not be relied upon.

APPEAL FOR PRAYER ON BEHALF OF MISSIONARIES.

In view of these things, allow me to ask the members of the Evangelical Alliance and the readers of Evangelical Christendom to remember in their prayers especially the foreign missionary and the foreign officials in China, in all they have to do relating to the rebel power and the rebel officers. It may be that long before this letter can reach you a course will have been taken by the rebels or by the foreign officials at Ningpo, or at Shanghai, which will much more seriously interfere with the prosecution of the missionary work in the neighbourhood of those cities than anything which has yet been done. Native Christians or foreign missionaries may have been butchered; the persons or the property of foreigners may have become unsafe in the territories held by the insurgents. But whatever be the result of the present complicated state of affairs, fervent and abundant prayers for our native brethren, missionaries, and officials, will be needed.

Another missionary writes as follows:—

MISSION WORK IN CANTON.

Canton, Feb. 5, 1862.

The cause of Christ is gradually gaining ground in Canton, by the removal of hindrances to the preaching of the Gospel, and more free access to the people. A beautiful and convenient chapel belonging to the brethren of the Wesleyan Missionary Society was yesterday dedicated in the western suburbs.

There are now fifteen missionaries of six different denominations in Canton, English and American. Two more are located in cities in the vicinity. We observed the Week of Prayer at the beginning of the year, as recommended by the Alliance. I trust that all were benefited who took part in the service.

The people of this empire are still disturbed with wars and rebellions in various quarters. The desolation and distress which they bring is beyond all conception.

SOUTH AFRICA.

MISSIONARY ENCOURAGEMENTS AND DISCOURAGEMENTS.

One of the missionaries of the London Society thus describes, briefly, the state of things in that part of Southern Africa in which he labours, and the emotions awakened by the prospect of what yet remains to be accomplished:—

British Kaffraria, Feb. 10, 1862.

As we toil on and on in the mission-field, it is cheering to find that the cause of the Redeemer is progressing. Yet like as a small amount of light brought into the region of gross darkness but serves to make that darkness more visible, so the fact ever transpiring in relation to work being done makes those of us in the mission-field only the more conscious of the still-remaining mass of heathenism and sin. Work presses upon us here. Near us and around us is a large population of Kafir. Christians and nominal Christians; outlying the circle pure heathens; beyond this Europeans, possessing large tracts of land for sheep, farming and cultivation; and scarcely any caring for their souls; rapidly making wealth, but destitute of the means of religious improvement, and too frequently, through long neglect, altogether careless of the means of grace. Then, again, there are the German immigrants, destitute of any means of grace except as they may seek to supply their need from among themselves; themselves careless, their children growing up in almost heathenish darkness. Perhaps no man feels so thoroughly and so keenly that he is but flesh as the missionary of the Gospel; none, perhaps, more inclined to sit down and weep for the miseries of a lost world. What has been done in vast Heathendom, rather than causing a cessation of effort on the part of the Church of Christ, should the rather quicken it to the work of faith and labour of love and patience of hope in a more intense degree. We seem to be but on the borders of our Lord's future possession, or but gazing from some Pisgah upon the land to be possessed.

POLYNESIA.

Rarotonga, the largest of the Harvey Islands, was discovered, it may be remembered, by the late Rev. John Williams, and is associated with some of the most interesting facts in his life. A missionary writes from the island as follows:—

Rarotonga, June 10, 1861.

LOW STATE OF RELIGION, FOLLOWED BY SPIRITUAL AWAKENING.

Knowing what deep interest you feel in the Lord's work in every part of the world, I feel sure you will rejoice with me in His great mercy shown to this island in the year past. Rarotonga has for many years deservedly ranked high as a centre of missionary influence. About 165 persons, educated in the institution here, have gone forth to preach the glorious tidings of redeeming love to islands far and near; many have died in the work; some have gained a martyr's crown; and eighty-four—viz., forty-two couples—are still active, some in the Coral Islands north of Rarotonga, where nothing but fish and coconut is to be obtained, and some as far as the New Hebrides. In this institution are at present thirty-five—viz., eighteen men and seventeen women; eight couples will leave, as soon as the John Williams can take them, for Tonna, Erromauga, and Lifu. I was, therefore, much cast down by the state in which I found the island, in general, on my arrival, having had a high opinion about it; but I felt especially grieved by the apparent coldness of the Churches, and rampant wickedness—yes, daring—of the unbelieving part of the people, and many were my prayers on their behalf. At length our ever merciful Lord sent us a season of refreshing. A few young men, ringleaders in wickedness, came one morning, in July, 1860, requesting me to write their names into the candidate-book, as they wished to become Church-members. My first impression was that they intended to play a practical joke, and I therefore questioned them rather severely; but found that, though they were yet babes in knowledge, still a new life seemed to have sprung up in them. I subsequently questioned their parents and guardians, and received the most cheering account of a total change having taken place in them.

FACTS INDICATING MORAL AND RELIGIOUS IMPROVEMENT.

The most besetting sin in all these islands is the Corinthian, and the second drunkenness, for either of which the culprits are fined if found out. When a culprit is brought to the judge he is led by the constables, who beat a kind of drum before him, so that every one may know when a judgment occurs. This judgment drum, which, the first twelve months of my residence here, I so frequently heard, and the sound of which so much depressed me, was completely silenced during the time of refreshment, instead of which prayer and singing was heard almost all the day long. Some brought their rum barrels* and buckets to me, saying, "This was my God and Sabbath, now I have done with it." During the month of August till December I was almost overwhelmed with inquirers, so that I had to divide them in classes, giving to each deacon a class to instruct. So many meetings for prayer and instruction were established, that I had to allow the students of the institution to go and help the deacons. A great portion of the day and night was thus occupied. In consequence of this revival, about 400 have joined the five churches of this island; our churches are now filled, and my labours are a joy. I cannot say that I feel equally satisfied with all who have been admitted; our native pastors are hardly sufficiently careful in recommending candidates for Church-membership, and by my overwhelming labour, as the only European missionary now on the island, I have to trust too much to my native assistance. On the whole the effect has been very remarkable, and has excited the astonishment of those captains who have seen Rarotonga since and knew it before. The excitement has now passed, but the fruit is left behind. Help us to pray that it may be abiding, even unto life everlasting.

* This rum is fermented orange juice, not distilled.

Miscellaneous Intelligence.

NEW ENGLISH CHURCH AT CALAIS.—A large English community, consisting chiefly of operatives engaged in the lace trade, is resident at St. Pierre, a suburb of Calais. A Church is now in course of erection for their use. The Rev. Thomas St. Hill, their pastor, who has been stationed there by the Colonial and Continental Church Society, writes us, referring to a statement by the Rev. Wm. Arthur, respecting the prohibition of Sunday work at the Wesleyan Chapel in Paris (Evangel. Chr., March, 1862, p. 158), as follows: "It is gratifying to me to state, that upon a similar occasion, at the signing of the contract for the erection of an Anglican Church at St. Pierre, Calais, I found the architect had inserted a clause prohibiting Sunday work, without previously consulting me." Mr. St. Hill, adds: "It may not be uninteresting to your readers to know that the first stone of our Church at St. Pierre has been laid by Lord Henry Cholmondeley, President of the Committee of the Colonial and Continental Society, assisted by the Rev. Richard Burgess, Rector of Chelsea, and the resident clergy. The ceremony took place in the presence of more than 400 persons, a considerable portion of whom were Roman Catholics. The Rev. R. Burgess offered up prayer in French, which was listened to with the greatest attention. A general reverential demeanour was observed, and a good feeling seemed to pervade the mixed assembly. In the evening a public meeting was held at St. Pierre in a commodious room belonging to the municipality. The Mayor of St. Pierre-Calais, with the greatest kindness and liberality, not only granted the use of the room, which is the largest in the town, but ordered it to be brilliantly lighted and seats with ornamental covering to be provided. He expressed his regret at not being able, on account of a positive engagement, to attend the meeting, and at the laying of the stone, and has granted the use of the room on another occasion, when it is hoped sufficient musical aid will be obtained for a concert, proposed to be given by amateurs towards our church fund. The Mayor, though a Roman Catholic, has promised to subscribe to this effort, and will use his influence in this way to induce the members of the Municipal Council to follow his example." Mr. St. Hill encloses an appeal, which we regret that the other demands upon our space render it impossible for us to insert. The facts, in addition to those we have stated, are shortly these: The builder's contract is for 20,000 francs, or 800*l.*; and this will be the sole cost, the site of the church having been presented to the congregation. Of this sum, 300*l.* have been raised by the English residents on the spot, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has made a grant of 100*l.*, on condition that half the sittings are free, and 50*l.* have been obtained from other sources. The sum of 350*l.*, therefore, remains to be raised. We shall be happy if this notice of the fact contributes forthwith to secure that amount. The Rev. Mesac Thomas, 9, Serjeant's-inn, Fleet-street; and the Rev. Thomas St. Hill, St. Pierre, Calais, will be glad to receive donations, or to furnish additional information.

STRUGGLE BETWEEN EVANGELICAL AND RATIONALIST TENDENCIES IN GERMANY.—That confessional catechisms are more and more used is proved not only by many publications relating to them, but by the decisions which have been come to. Among the districts referred to in proof of this statement, the Allgemeine Kirchen Zeitung mentions Hesse-Darmstadt, Brunswick, Hanover, Saxony, Holstein, Baden, Bavaria, Rhenish Prussia, &c. It is gratifying to notice, that in some cases the rationalistic manuals which had taken possession of the ground have been superseded by others of a more Evangelical character. We may consider the facts to which we allude as a decided proof of the growing estimation in which Evangelical doctrines are held among the people. These remarks also apply to hymn books and other elementary books, where the disposition to improve seems to grow stronger.

THE BASLE MISSIONARY SOCIETY employs 87 missionaries—viz., 57 in the East Indies, 27 in Western Africa, and 3 in China. The native assistants, catechists and teachers, in the service of the society, are 82—viz., in India 57, in Africa 21, and in China 4. The Indian missions are carried on in the six provinces of South Canara, North Canara, South Malabar, Malabar, the Nilgherries, and Codogaland. In each of these provinces there are several stations. The African provinces are four, and the Chinese stations at Canton, Hongkong, &c.

A new mission-house at Basle has been entered upon, but the society is burdened with a debt.

AUSTRIAN PROTESTANTISM.—In all the provinces much attention is paid to organization in the Churches. It is a time for drawing up rules and regulations, for forming societies and associations, and for official appointments. All this was rendered necessary by the dislocated state in which the patent of last April found the Protestants of the empire. The indications to which we allude are visible not only at Vienna, but in Moravia, in Hungary, and in every other direction. They are at least symptoms of life and hope, and encourage us to look for better times.

PROSPECTS OF PROTESTANTISM IN ROME.—"It is the opinion of the best informed persons here," writes the Roman correspondent of the Daily News, "that in the event of a revolution which should restore liberty of conscience, there would be a much stronger reaction towards Protestantism in Rome than has yet been shown in Florence, or elsewhere in Italy. They have here seen Popery in its grossest shape, and are doubtless heartily sick of it in all cases where there is not absolute enslavement to superstition. The 'curse not loud but deep' on the immorality of the clergy may be heard by whomsoever will earn enough of the confidence of one of the poor Romans as to induce him to speak his mind."

HUNGARY.—SOMETHING LIKE A PARISH.—The royal free town of Nagy-Bánya lies in the north-east of the county of Szathmar. The pastoral oversight of the Mother Church comprises a territory of more than eighty German miles square; and as each of these is equal to twenty-two and a half English square miles, the district or parish contains more than 1,800 square miles, and is about 172 miles in circumference. The Protestant population resides in several counties, and is scattered among the adherents of the Romish and Greek Catholic Churches. This unusually large parish is divided into three sections. The first, with the Mother Church at Nagy-Bánya, contains the affiliated members residing at Upper and Lower Fenezely, Lápos-Bánya, Felső-Bánya, and Kapnik-Bánya; the second section, about fifty miles from the Mother Church, comprises Sztrimbuly, the head-quarters, with Oláh-Lápos-Bánya, Oláh-Lápos, and Magyar-Lápos, and consists almost exclusively of very poor miners; the third section meets at a place nearly forty miles from the Mother Church, and consists of several villages, one of which is on the borders of Galicia. The nearest Lutheran Church is fifty-seven miles west of Nagy-Bánya; to the east there is not one till you come to the Bukovina. Once a-year the pastor visits Strimbuly and Marmaros-Sziget, the principal stations of the second and third sections; on which occasion he preaches and administers the Lord's Supper. The Church at Nagy Bánya dates at least as far back as 1576.

MISSIONS TO MADAGASCAR.—Six missionaries in connexion with the London Society have been ordained for Madagascar. The directors have received a munificent donation of 1,000*l.* to aid them in their enterprise, from a friend who withholds his name, but expresses his desire that his gift may not supersede, but rather stimulate, the liberality of others. We learn that the Rev. J. J. Le Brun had returned from Antananarivo to the Mauritius, in consequence of an attack of fever. Mr. Ellis was awaiting the healthy season for entering the country.

EFFORTS OF ROMANISM AND CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE IN NEWFOUNDLAND.—A correspondent writes from Bay de Verds, Newfoundland: "In this island, the Papal power has been making great efforts to gain the ascendancy, and to carry things with a high hand; but it has received a considerable check during the past year. It scruples not, as in times past, to have recourse to open violence and secret incendiarism. Destruction and misery mark its path. In this village the population is about equally divided between Romanists and Churchmen, and the former often show what spirit they are of, by annoying, waylaying, and assassinating the latter; so that I am at times very fearful of an open rupture. I cannot but give my people credit for much forbearance. There have been, unhappily, in years gone by, many intermarriages, which are productive of much unhappiness in families; and in too many instances the Protestant, for peace's sake, 'makes shipwreck of his faith.' As the people become instructed in their duty, however, these instances become more rare. I am sorry to say that in consequence of a bad fishery, and a failure, to a great extent, in the potatoe crop, there is much poverty and distress among us. Very large are the demands upon the Government for relief. The pauper grant now swallows up a large proportion of the revenue."

Literature.

LANGE ON ST. MATTHEW'S GOSPEL.

Theological and Homiletical Commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew. Specially designed and adapted for the use of ministers and students. From the German of J. P. LANGE, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Bonn. By the Rev. ALFRED EDERSHEIM, Ph. D., and (part of vol. 2) by Rev. W. B. POPE. 2 vols., 8vo. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 1861.

WE are much pleased at this appearance of Dr. Lange's great work in an English translation. It deserves to be read and studied by the class it is especially designed for. The appearance of a commentary of this kind is a new feature in our theological literature. The storehouses from which our ordinary preachers draw their materials are few, and frequent complaints are made as to the great want of freshness in their preaching. The doctrines of the Gospel are so often proclaimed in such an uninteresting manner, that they lose much of their power. This state of things could be easily remedied were our preachers to "give attendance to reading," not only of the Scriptures, through the medium of translations, but in the original languages, with the various helps which modern criticism has supplied.

While the study of our old English divines, especially those of the Reformational and Puritan eras, is not to be overlooked, the study of the German orthodox divines (and Rationalistic too, if the individual clergyman possesses the necessary leisure) is of importance at the present time. In the case of the work of Dr. Lange, while its critical portion is of importance and interest, we fancy it is the homiletical and doctrinal parts that will prove of the greater value, at least to the ordinary minister. We can speak with confidence of the utility which this commentary cannot fail to be even to the hard-working minister, the extent of whose ministerial circle, perhaps, prevents from much study. Dr. Lange divides his remarks on each passage into three heads: 1, the critical notes; 2, the doctrinal reflections; and 3, the homiletical hints. He makes extensive use of the labours of the scholars and divines who have preceded him, and his remarks are free from verboseness. He is an able critic, and always keeps in view the requirements of the preacher. We need not, perhaps, say that he is an earnest believer in the Written Word.

As one instance of his doctrinal reflections, we take a passage from those on "The Sermon on the Mount":—

The contrast between the Old and the New Covenant is here strikingly brought out—in its representations and outward manifestations: Moses and Christ—Mount Sinai in the rocky wilderness, and the Mount of Beatitudes in the midst of a populous district in the Holy Land—Moses alone, concealed from view by the clouds of an awful thunderstorm; Christ surrounded by His disciples, and sitting among them—Mount Sinai, with bounds set about it and the people at a distance; the Mount of Beatitudes encompassed by multitudes—in the one case, the people fleeing from the mountain; in the other, crowding towards its summit, and waiting on its ridge. b. In its essential characteristics: Moses received the law from Jehovah by the ministry of angels, while in a state of ecstasy; but Christ brought it forth from the depths of His theanthropic heart, in full and calm consciousness—The law of Moses written upon tables of stone, the Word of Christ on the hearts of His disciples. In the one case, thunder and lightnings; in the other, only beatitudes. In the one case, successive demands, each isolated, and each taking away all hope of life; in the other, successive blessings, connected together and creative, almost like the six creative days. In the one case, the first tables of the law broken to pieces by Moses, in his wrath at the apostasy of the people, and other tables substituted with sacrificial injunctions, stricter than the former; in the other case, the first sermon delivered on the Mount, and, at its second delivery, adapted to the wants and the weaknesses of the people. In the one case, everything from without, in the objective form of outward commandments; in the other, everything committed to the heart—everything from within, wafted, so to speak, in the life-giving breezes of the holy mountain. In the one case, the ancient Gospel-promise transformed into law; in the other, even the law with its demands—such as poverty of spirit, &c.—transformed into the Gospel. In the one case, the theocracy founded in the shadows of the letter; in the other, the kingdom of heaven in the reality and life of the Spirit. c. In its results: Sinai was adapted to a particular era, to a particular nation, and for a definite educational purpose. But the Word of Christ equally applies to all times and to all peoples, being the guide to salvation. The law terrifies the people, and makes them flee; the Sermon on the Mount addresses itself to their hearts, and draws them to the Lord.

There is an obvious connexion between the Mount of Beatitudes and the other holy mountains. The first beatitude—that of the poor in spirit—brings us to Sinai; the second and third (the mourning and meek) point to Moriah and Zion; the fourth and fifth (those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, and the merciful) direct to Golgotha, in its twofold import (as the Mount of the Curse and that of Reconciliation); while the sixth and seventh remind us of Gethsemane and the Mount of Olives, and of Bethany and the Mount of Olives, or also of Mount Tabor.

As a specimen of the “homiletical hints,” we cite a few extracts from those given on chapter ii. 1—13:—

The Saviour of the world in the form of a child: 1, concealed, and yet well known; 2, a child hated and feared, yet longed for and loved; 3, signally despised, and yet marvellously honoured; 4, beset by extreme dangers, and yet kept in perfect safety.—The holy child viewed as the central-point of the world: 1, setting everything in motion; 2, attracting all that was congenial; 3, repelling all that was hostile. Christ had come to the wise men before they came to Him—or the mysterious working of prevenient grace.—The threefold knowledge of Christ in the Gentile world: 1, information by tradition; 2, a star in the sky; 3, the influence of the Spirit in the heart. On the Gentile world also a star, if no brighter light, shed its lustre.—The star of heaven and the star of earth.—In what sense are the wise men from the East to be regarded as really kings from the Gentile world? In preaching to the heathen, let us bear in mind that there is a star in their firmament.—Let us go and meet the Gentiles.—Even the best among the heathen may serve as evidence of the spiritual destitution and need of the heathen world.—The clearest light among the heathen is but star-light.—Candid philosophy must lead to Christ.—Genuine science, if true to its aim, points to the centre of all knowledge.—Every department of knowledge a mere potsherd, unless completed by faith.—Nature's testimony to Christ: 1. The various stages in Nature tending upwards to what is spiritual, or to Christ. 2. By the travailing and groaning in pain of all Nature, she points forwards to salvation in Christ. 3. Through the varied imagery and symbols of Nature, she points inwards to the spiritual meaning.—How everything replies to the inquiry, Where is He that has been born King of the Jews? 1. Scripture. 2. The scribes. 3. Even the enemies of the King Himself. 4. The star in the sky. 5. The convictions of the heart.—Infinite importance of the question, Where is the new-born King of the Jews? 1. Its deep meaning. 2. The eager interest attaching to it. 3. The glorious hope connected with it.—The glory of the King of the Jews: 1. He is the King of the Jews, or the Messiah. 2. The King of all nations, or [the Saviour of the world. 3. The King of kings and Lord of lords.—Jesus is still the King of the Jews—a watchword for our missionary enterprise.—The King of the Jews is not to be found at Jerusalem, the city of the King.—The alarm of a tyrant spreads terror among his subjects.—Even inquiry after Christ alarms an unbelieving world. The hatred of the wicked must serve as a testimony to the truth of the Gospel.—Herod consulting Scripture, as if it had been a heathen oracle.—The value of lifeless orthodoxy, and the worthlessness of lifeless theologians.—Those who are near are often afar off, and those who are afar off near.—The callous and unmoved guides to Bethlehem.—Without the light of Scripture, all the stars in the sky will not suffice to clear away our darkness.—If we but truly know that Christ has come, we shall soon learn where He is to be found.—The Gentile magi and the Jewish scribes: 1. The former obtain, by their star, the Scriptures also; the latter lose, with the Scriptures, also the star. 2. The former become scribes (or learned in the Scriptures) in the best sense; the latter magi, in the worst sense, &c.

We have given such extracts in the hope of inducing some among our readers, especially those who are engaged in the ministry of the Gospel, to procure this work for themselves. Dr. Lange's introduction is well worth a study, and his criticisms, in many places, are of great value. We intended to have remarked on some of these, and we may yet return to this subject; but for the present, at least, have preferred, for practical purposes, to adopt the method of giving extracts from, rather than of reviewing in a regular manner, these volumes.

Sunsets on the Hebrew Mountains. By the Rev. J. N. MACDUFF, Author of "Memories of Genesaret," "Morning and Night Watches," &c. Fourth thousand. Nisbet and Co. 1862.

We took up this book expecting a journal of wanderings in Palestine, which is a path somewhat overbeaten; but, instead, we are presented with a series of most beautiful sketches, depicting scriptural characters and incidents in connexion with the last solemn scenes of life—or metaphorical sunsets. The well-known aptitudes of the author have never, that we are aware of, been so happily manifested as in this very charming volume. We are not quite sure that we like or liked the idea of the symbolical title; but all spirit of adverse criticism melts rapidly away in the contemplation of these lovely "sunsets;" and though the author, in his preface, advances a deprecatory explanation of the title he had chosen, his admirable execution of the plan is his best apology. The same symbolical idea, too, has doubtless been often suggested to others. And with reference to the death of Simeon, the sonnet of Professor Wilson, which is quoted, sufficiently vindicates the use of the metaphor; nor can we more appropriately conclude our notice than by those very lines:—

A cloud lay cradled near the setting sun,
A gleam of crimson tinged its braided snow.
Long had I watched the glory moving on O'er the still radiance of the lake below.
Tranquil its spirit seemed, and floated slow;
Even in its very motion there was rest,
While every breath of eve that chanced to blow
Wafted the traveller to the beauteous west.
Emblem, methought, of the departed soul,
To whose white robe the gleam of bliss is given,
And by the breath of mercy made to roll
Right onward to the golden gates of Heaven,
Where, to the eye of faith, its peaceful lies,
And tells to man his glorious destinies.

Passages in the History of a Shilling. By Mrs. C. L. BALFOUR. S. W. Partridge.

A LITTLE book written to support the teetotal temperance cause. The idea of the allegory is good, and in some respects well handled; but the artifice is somewhat stale, and unworthy of any moral or religious cause, which coarsely caricatures all those who differ in opinion, and attributes more efficacy to any particular theory than a sober judgment can confirm. Ruinously dreadful as are the effects of drink, exaggerations of the kind so much in vogue do not commend themselves to piety and good sense.

New Wine in Old Bottles. By the Rev. J. B. HEARD, A.M., Minister of Percy Chapel, Fitzroy-square. Hatchard and Co. Dublin: Hodges, Smith, and Co.

AN excellent series of seven replies to "Essays and Reviews," under a somewhat inappropriate title. There is, in addition to the seven replies, an "Eighth Essay on Inspiration," most untowardly printed "Interpretation." Mr. Heard's analogy between the controversy on the doctrine of the person of Christ and that on the doctrine of inspiration is a happy one, and so far as we know it is novel and substantially original. The whole volume is brilliant, logical, and scholarlike.

The Life of Arthur Vandeleur, Major Royal Artillery. By the author of "Memorials of Captain Hedley Vicars," &c. Nisbet and Co.

THERE is something in this life of Major Vandeleur entirely different from that of Hedley Vicars; and to us the difference is much in favour of the present volume, though possibly it may not be so popular. We have heard it questioned whether a Christian man could remain voluntarily in the profession of arms after receiving full Gospel light. This question obviously assumes that an enlightened man would not, in the first instance, voluntarily become a soldier. It is stated, however, that Major Vandeleur was, by the grace of God, a true Christian from childhood to death; and that his history is that of one "who never felt that his early consecration of himself to the services of his God could be marred by embracing the service of his Queen and country." It is also further said, "that the snares of his profession were not permitted to alienate his heart from the life of faith upon the Son of God, will be proved by this brief but faithful record." These are deeply interesting problems; and every contribution to their discussion and solution is valuable. This life of Vandeleur, however, is otherwise very interesting, and edifying also.

The Story of Martin Luther. A Book for Young Persons. Edited by Miss WHATELY. John F. Shaw and Co.

THE authoress needed not to have advanced the semi-apology of her preface for this most welcome contribution to the cause of the religion of the Reformation. Not young persons only, but those who possess many bulky histories and lives of Luther, will be glad of this condensed and perspicuous narrative of the leading events of his life and times. It is the very thing needed for families and schools and parishes; and we doubt not it will have a large circulation if widely made known. Miss Whately well declares that "it is a time when the young and the old alike need to be stirred up to a lively sense of the value of Gospel teaching and an open Bible. The great battle of Luther's days is still going on—openly in some places, secretly in others." We hear often of religious "reactions." What we wish to see is a sober reaction to the solid as well as learned theology of the Reformation. The book is enriched with a great deal of valuable poetical quotation, as well as an appendix of Luther's own poetry. We observe by the way that the very beautiful hymn—

Christ, whose glory fills the skies,

Christ, the true and only light,

Son of Righteousness, arise,

Triumph o'er the shades of night, &c.—

quoted by Miss Whately at chapter v., is attributed to Charles Weeley. In this she follows Edward Bickersteth, we presume, in whose collection it is so named. But we believe the real author was the Rev. Augustus Toplady. It is printed in the collection of his entire works as undoubtedly his. Suum cuique.

The Acts of the Apostles: An Exposition for English Readers, on the basis of Hackett's Commentary. By the Rev. SAMUEL GREEN, B.A., Rawdon College. With a new and literal version. Vol. I. J. Heaton and Son.

THIS is a laborious and learned, but somewhat ambitious-looking, attempt of a class whose utility we incline to doubt. We do not believe that the unlearned readers of Scripture, for their own edification, require or will be much helped by second-hand crutches of criticism. A sound presentation of well-ascertained results is all they need. And they who would aspire to be critical teachers, without the knowledge of the learned tongues, by help of such books as this, mistake, we fear, their vocation. There is no royal road or telegraphic wire to real solid learning. The present volume is the fourth of the Bunyan library by Baptist authors, and it rings of the sectarian metal too, a little. For instance, Acts i 5, "Baptized with the Holy Ghost" (ἐν Πνεύματι), is rendered "Baptized in the Holy Ghost." Surely the dogma of dipping does not require such a strain as this upon the preposition!

The Spirit of Jesus. By the Rev. WILLIAM REID, M.A., Author of "The Blood of Jesus." Nisbet and Co.

AN earnest and eloquent sequel to the author's former little book, which has obtained a wide circulation. We cannot, however, omit a caveat on our own part, as we do not subscribe to all the author's views, and are of opinion that some of them are in the true and legitimate use of the term "enthusiastic," notwithstanding the author's deprecatory repudiation of "worldly" judgments to that effect. Many sober and experienced Christians, who are by no means "Sadducean" as to the distinguishing doctrines of the Gospel, and the real and sanctifying operations of the Holy Ghost, would, with us, demur to these as extravagant notions, and calculated to excite unwarrantable expectations in the pious, and unnecessarily to prejudice a different class.

Sorrow. By GILBERT BERESFORD. Nisbet and Co.

A book in the shape and garb of a religious poem; but for what world of minds intended, or whether there exist any who can relish it, we don't know. It is simply the most extravagant tissue of nonsense we have had under perusal for a considerable period.

Monthly Retrospect.

H O M E.

FROM the deep interest the country feels in the movements of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, we are induced, under the home, rather than the foreign head, to notice his movements in the Holy Land. We learn that his Royal Highness has been visiting Hebron, and was admitted to the tomb of Abraham, where Christian was never allowed before; and that he has gone to Jerusalem by way of Beth-horon and the ever-memorable town of Ajalon. We are sure that many prayers will ascend to the Divine Throne that these excursions of the Prince to the land

Over whose acres walked those blessed feet,
Which, eighteen hundred years ago, were nailed,
For our redemption, on the bitter cross will be productive of lasting and salutary influences on his own heart. We are glad to learn that, in the presence of the infidel, he is not ashamed of his religion; and we anticipate much benefit to the poor persecuted Christians of the country from the visit of the heir-apparent of the first Protestant country in Europe and the kindly encouragement he has shown them in the course of his tour.

Just before Parliament adjourned for the Easter holidays an important debate took place in the House of Commons on the subject of Italy, which is likely to exercise considerable influence, not on that country only, but on Europe at large. The discussion was brought forward by Sir George Bowyer, who is generally known as the organ of Cardinal Wiseman. He undertook to prove that the government of the Romans by the Pope was the best that men could be subjected to, and that the people were supremely contented under it; and further, that the new Government was ten times more harsh and tyrannical than that of the Prince who, by the successful usurpation, had been driven into exile. He was answered on the part of the Government by Mr. Layard, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord Palmerston, who seemed to vie with each other in the strength of their denunciations against the temporal power of the Pope, which they all declared was doomed, and against the conduct of the Emperor of the French, who, by continuing to garrison Rome, not only keeps the Pope on his throne contrary to the will of his subjects, but affords a refuge and shelter to those crowds of brigands that infest the South of Italy. These bold and emphatic declarations coming from the head of the Government have made a great sensation on the Continent, where it was circulated that Lord Palmerston was favourable to French occupation; and his speech, as well as the silence of the Conservatives, has been much commented on, and is supposed to mark a new step in the negotiation of this question.

The Bicentenary agitation is yielding those fruits which, at its commencement, we dreaded and deprecated. Violence begets violence. Because lecturers of the Nonconformist party charge an Evangelical clergy with dishonesty for remaining in a Church part of whose liturgy they desire to see altered, therefore Canon Miller, of Birmingham, resolves and publishes his resolution, no longer to act with Dissenters in any work of Christian usefulness; and as the most emphatic mode of testifying his separation, he begins by resigning the office of president of the local Auxiliary Bible Society in Birmingham. We are happy to say that this, which we cannot but regard as a rash step, has hitherto found but few imitators among his brethren. Dr. Stowell, of Manchester, who is associated with Dr. Miller in the Nonconformist attacks, as equally with him the representative of Evangelical Episcopatism, has written to the Record to say that he shall certainly not follow his reverend and respected brother's example; and that if he were even to meet any of his personal assailants on the same platform, he hopes he should be able to treat them with Christian courtesy. This we firmly believe to be "a more excellent way" than Dr. Miller's plan. At the same time, we trust the leaders of the Bicentenary movement will be led by these and similar events to abstain from offensive and unseemly imputations on personal character.

That this caution is not unnecessary, will be the more apparent from a correspondence that has recently taken place on the subject in the columns of the Dissenting journals. Certain writers among the Nonconformists, at one with their brethren on the subject of the Bicentenary, and anxious to honour the memory of the ejected 2,000, yet ventured to suggest whether this might not be done without imputing conscious dishonesty to those members of the Establishment who assent to the Book of Common Prayer, while they disbelieve the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration. On this, the violent party was more violent than ever, and roundly declare that there is no meaning in the celebration if it is not to convict the Evangelical clergy of dishonesty. We are very sorry to witness this foolish and unchristian outburst. For our own part, we pity the intellect of the man, whether Churchman or Dissenter, who can say that there is nothing in the doctrine or practice of the denomination to which he belongs that he does not heartily and thoroughly assent to. We should take that as evidence that the individual has never examined the question for himself. Most men are content to bear with the lesser differences for the sake of the greater good to be derived from Church-fellowship, and they attach themselves to that body which on the whole comes nearest to their own views. In such a case, a Dissenter is called forbearing: why should a Churchman in similar circumstances be considered dishonest?

FOREIGN.

The accounts that reach us from America from time to time increase in interest and in sadness. There is no prospect of a close to the bloodshed that now flows there so freely—on the contrary, the war is carried on with increasing bitterness, rapine, and slaughter. The latest accounts speak of two days' fighting in the south-west, where, after terrible slaughter, both sides retreated to their original positions. In the East, General M'Clellan is checked by the entrenchments at Yorktown, a place which has already a historical interest, from the fact that it was there Lord Cornwallis surrendered his army in the first American War. They have, however, gained a great success in the capture of Island No. 10, on the Mississippi, a place which the Southerners had strongly fortified to bar the passage of their opponents down the river, and which they were at last compelled to surrender, with its garrison, guns, ammunition, and provisions to an immense extent. It is the greatest blow the South has yet received. Still, there are no symptoms of yielding on the part of the South. There is, on the contrary, an increase of ferocity and savage hatred on both sides, which, even if the South were subdued to-morrow, would require as great an army to hold it in subjection as it does now to conquer it. The only cheering feature in the intelligence is the blow that the Federal Legislature has aimed at slavery. A committee of Congress has been appointed to consider of the best way in which slavery can be abolished in the Border States, and that inquiry is to be afterwards extended to all the States in the South. These, however, are anticipations, and may never bear fruit. The Congress has given an earnest of its sincerity by passing an act, to which President Lincoln has signified his assent, for the abolition of slavery in the district of Columbia—that strip of land which was originally set apart for a territory on which the capital of Washington might be erected, and over which, of all the territories of the Union, Congress alone has control. The North is now fairly committed to anti-slavery policy; and we may hope that the war, however otherwise it may end, will put an end to that evil all over the Continent.

The affairs of Italy slowly move towards a complete severance between the temporal and the Papal power. Every day brings out in clearer light the fact that the city of Rome and the Government of the Pope form the great centre from whence emanate all the disturbing elements of Italian policy; and, in consequence, the indignation of all Italian patriots is concentrating on the Pope. There was a time when the imaginations of the people were excited with the brilliant prospect of having the head of the Roman Catholic Church as the first bishop of their kingdom; and to secure that, they would have given the Pope any terms, on condition of his falling in with their designs. But the obstinacy of Pius has completely foiled that expectation; and the Italians are beginning to understand that spiritual despotism was wholly incompatible with civil liberty. It is very trying to those statesmen who have to guide the helm of affairs in that country that the Pope should be such a thorn in their side, and that the Emperor of the French should uphold him in his stubbornness; but a devout mind can hardly fail to recognise in these events a Providential purpose, in thoroughly disgusting the Italians with the idea of a priest-king, and smoothing the way for their emancipation from his spiritual as well as his temporal yoke.
